"NO, YOU SHALL COME HOME WITH ME," RETURNED BESSIE."

CHAPTER I.

BESSIE MEETS WITH AN ADVENTURE.

I was extremely tiresome!

It was vexatious; it was altogether annoying!

Most people under similar circumstances would have used stronger expressions, would have bemoaned themselves loudly, or at least inwardly, with all the pathos of self-pity.

To be nearly at the end of one's journey, almost within sight and sound of home fires and home welcomes, and then to be snowed up, walled, imprisoned, kept in durance vile in an unexpected snowdrift—well, most human beings, unless gifted with angelic patience and armed with special and peculiar fortitude, would have uttered a few groans under such depressing circumstances.

Fortunately, Bessie Lambert was not easily depressed. She was a cheerful young person, an optimist by nature; and thanks to a healthy organisation, good digestion, and wholesome views of duty, was not given to mental nightmares, nor to cry out before she was hurt.

Bessie would have thought it faint-hearted to shrink at every little molehill of difficulty; she had plenty of what the boys call pluck (no word is more eloquent than that), and a fund of quiet humour that tided her safely over many a slough of despond. If anyone could have read Bessie's thoughts a few minutes after the labouring engine had ceased to work, they would have been as follows, with little staccato movements and pauses—

"What an adventure! How Tom would laugh, and Katie too! Katie is always longing for something to happen to her; but it would be more enjoyable if I had someone with me to share it, and if I were sure father and mother would not be anxious. An empty second-class compartment is not a particularly comfortable place on a cold afternoon. I wonder how it would be if all the passengers were to get out and warm themselves with a good game of snowballing. There is not much room though; we should have to play it in single file, or by turns. Supposing that instead of that, the nice, white-haired old gentleman who got in at the last station were to assemble us all in the third-class carriage, and tell us a story about Siberia: that would be nice and exciting! Tom would suggest a ghost story, a good creepy one; but that would be too dismal. The hot water tin is getting cold, but I have got a rug, I am thankful to say, so I shall not freeze for the next two hours. If I had only a book, or could go to sleep—oh!" in a tone of relief, as the guard's face was suddenly thrust in at the open window.

"I beg pardon, miss, I hope I did not startle you, but there is a young lady in the first-class compartment who, I take it, would be the better for a bit of company, and as I saw you were alone I thought you might not object to change your carriage."

"No, indeed, I shall be delighted to have a companion," returned Bessie, briskly. "How long do you think we shall be detained here, guard?"

"There is no knowing miss, but one of our men is working his way back to the signals; we have not come more than three miles since we left Cleveley. It is only a bit of a drift that the snow-plough will soon clear, but it will be a matter of two or three hours, I daresay; but it has left off snowing now."

"Will they telegraph to Cliffe the reason of the delay?" asked Bessie, a little anxiously.

"Oh, yes, they will do that right enough; you needn't be uneasy; the other young lady is in a bit of a fuss, too, but I told her there was no danger. Give a good jump, miss; there, now you are all right. I will take care of your things; follow me, please; it is only a step or so."

"This is more of an adventure than ever," thought Bessie as she followed the big burly guard. "What a kind man he is! Perhaps he has daughters of his own." And she thanked him so warmly and so prettily as he almost lifted her into the carriage, that he muttered as he turned away—

"That is a nice, pleasant little woman; I like that sort!"

The first-class compartment felt warm and snug. Its only tenant was a fair, pretty-looking girl, dressed very handsomely in a mantle trimmed with costly fur, and a fur-lined rug over her knees.

"Oh, thank you! How good of you to come," she exclaimed, eagerly; and Bessie saw at once that she had been crying. "I was feeling so frightened and miserable all by myself. I got it into my head that another train would run into us, and I was quite in a panic until the guard assured me there was no danger. He told me there was another young lady alone, and that he would bring her to me."

"Yes, that was so nice of him; and of course it is pleasant to be able to speak to somebody," returned Bessie, cheerfully; "and it is so much warmer here."

"Take some of my rug, I do not need it all myself, and we may as well be as comfortable as we can under the miserable circumstances."

"Well, do you know I think it might be worse!"

"Worse! How can you talk so!" with a shudder.

"Why, it can hardly be a great hardship to sit for another two hours in this nice warm carriage, with this beautiful rug to cover us. It certainly was a little dull and cold in the other compartment, and I longed to get out and have a game of snowballing to warm myself." But here her companion gave a little laugh.

"What a funny idea! How could you think of such a thing!" And here she looked for the first time rather scrutinisingly at Bessie. Oh, yes! she was a lady—she spoke nicely and had good manners; but how very shabbily she was dressed!—at least not shabbily, that was not the right word; inexpensively would have been the correct term.

Bessie's brown tweed had evidently seen more seasons than one; her jacket fitted the trim figure, but was not made in the last fashion; and the brown velvet on her hat was decidedly worn. How was the young lady to know that Bessie was wearing her oldest things from a sense of economy? and that her new jacket and best hat—a very pretty one—were in the neat black box in the luggage van?

Certainly the two girls were complete opposites. Bessie who, as her brother Tom often told her, was no beauty, was notwithstanding a bright, pleasant-looking girl, with soft grey eyes that could express a great deal of quiet sympathy on occasions, or could light up with fun. People who loved her always said Bessie's face was better than a beautiful one, for it told nothing but the truth about itself; it did not say, "Come, admire me," as some faces say, but "Come, trust me and like me, if you can."

The fashionably-dressed young stranger had a very different type of face. In the first place, it was undeniably pretty; no one ever thought of contradicting that fact, though a few people might have thought it a peculiar style of beauty, for she had dark brown eyes and fair hair—rather an uncommon combination.

She was small, too, and very pale, and yet not fragile-looking; on the contrary, she had a clear look of health, but there was a petulant curve about the mouth that spoke of quick temper, and the whole face seemed capable of great mobility, quick changes of feeling that were perfectly transparent.

Bessie was quite aware that her new acquaintance was taking stock of her; she was quietly amused, but she took no apparent notice.

"Is Cliffe-on-Sea your destination?" she asked presently.

"No, is it yours?" with a quick note of alarm in her voice. "Oh, I am so sorry!" as Bessie nodded. "I hoped we should have travelled together to London. I do dislike travelling alone, but my friend was too ill to accompany me, and I did not want to stay at Islip another day; it was such a stupid place, so dull, so I said I must come; and this is the result."

"And you are going to London. Why, your journey is but just beginning! Cliffe-on-Sea is where I live, and we cannot be more than two miles off. Oh, what will you do if we are detained here for two or three hours?"

"I am sure I don't know," returned the other girl disconsolately; and her eyes filled with tears again. "It is nearly five now, and it will be too late to go on to London; but I dare not stay at an hotel by myself. What will mamma say? She will be dreadfully vexed with me for not waiting for Mrs. Moultrie; she never will let me travel alone, and I have disobeyed her."

"That is a great pity," returned Bessie, gravely; but politeness forbade her to say more. She was old-fashioned enough to think that disobedience to parents was a heinous offence. She did not understand the present code, that allows young people to set up independent standards of duty. To her the fifth commandment was a very real commandment, and just as binding in the nineteenth century as when the young dwellers in tents first listened to it under the shadow of the awful Mount.

Bessie's gravely disapproving look brought a mocking little smile to the other girl's face; her quick comprehension evidently detected the rebuke, but she only answered flippantly—

"Mamma is too much used to my disobedience to give it a thought; she knows I will have my way in things, and she never minds; she is sensible enough to know grown-up girls generally have wills of their own."

"I think I must have been brought up differently," returned Bessie, simply. "I recollect, in our nursery days, mother used to tell us that little bodies ought not to have grown-up wills; and when we got older, and wanted to get the reins in our own hands, as young people will, she would say, 'Gently, gently, girls, you may be grown up, but you will never be as old as your parents—'" But here Bessie stopped, on seeing that her companion was struggling with suppressed merriment.

"It does sound so funny, don't you know! Oh! I don't mean to be rude, but are not your people just a little bit old-fashioned and behind the times? I don't want to shock you, I am far too grateful for your company; mamma and I thoroughly understand each other. I am very fond of her, and I am as sorry as possible to vex her by getting into this mess," and here the girl heaved a very genuine sigh.

"And you live in London?" Bessie was politely changing the subject.

"Oh, no, but we have some friends there, and I was going to break my journey and do a little shopping. Our home is in Kent; we live at Oatlands—such a lovely, quiet little place—far too quiet for me; but since I came out mamma always spends the season in town. The Grange, that is our house, is really Richard's—my brother's, I mean."

"The Grange, Oatlands! I am sure I know that name," returned Bessie in a puzzled tone; "and yet where could I have heard it?" She thought a moment, and then added quickly, "Your name cannot be Sefton?"

"To be sure it is," replied the other girl, opening her brown eyes rather widely; "Edna Sefton; but how could you have guessed it?"

"Then your mother's name is Eleanor."

"I begin to think this is mysterious, and that you must be a witch, or something uncanny. I know all mamma's friends, and I am positive not one of them ever lived at Cliffe-on-Sea."

"Are you quite sure of that? Has your mother never mentioned the name of a Dr. Lambert?"

"Dr. Lambert! No! Wait a moment, though: mamma is very fond of talking about old days, when she was a girl, don't you know, and there was a young doctor, very poor, I remember, but his name was Herbert."

"My father's name is Herbert, and he was very poor once, when he was a young man; he is not rich now. I think many years ago he and your mother were friends. Let me tell you all I know about it. About a year ago he asked me to post a letter for him. I remember reading aloud the address in an absent sort of way: 'Mrs. Sefton, The Grange, Oatlands, Kent,' and my father looked up from his writing and said, 'That is only a business letter, Bessie, but Mrs. Sefton and I are old correspondents. When she was Eleanor Sartoris and I was a young fellow as poor as a church-mouse, we were good friends, but she married, and then I married, but that is a lifetime ago; she was a handsome girl though.'"

"Mamma is handsome now. How interesting it all is! When I get home I shall coax mamma to tell me all about it. You see we are not strangers after all, so we can go on talking quite like old friends. You have made me forget the time. Oh, dear, how dark it is getting, and the gas gives only a glimmer of light."

"It will not be quite dark because of the snow. Don't let us think of the time; some of the passengers are walking about. I heard them say just now the man must have reached Cleveley, so the telegram must have gone—we shall soon have help. Of course if the snow had not ceased falling, it would have been far more serious."

"Yes," returned Miss Sefton, with a shiver; "but it is far nicer to read of horrid things in a cheerful room and by a bright fire, than to experience them oneself. Somehow one never realises them."

"That is what father says—that young people are not really hard-hearted, only they do not realise things; their imagination just skims over the surface. I think it is my want of imagination helps me. I never will look round the corner to try and find out what disagreeable thing is coming next. One could not live so and feel cheerful."

"Then you are one of those good people, Miss Lambert, who think it their duty to cultivate cheerfulness. I was quite surprised to see you look so tranquil, when I had been indulging in a babyish fit of crying, from sheer fright and misery; but it made me feel better only to look at you."

"I am so glad," was Bessie's answer. "I remember being very much struck by a passage in an essay I once read, but I can only quote it from memory; it was to the effect that when a cheerful person enters a room, it is as though fresh candles are lighted. The illustration pleased me."

"True, it was very telling. Yes, you are cheerful, and you are very fond of talking."

"I am afraid I am a sad chatterbox," returned Bessie, blushing, as though she were conscious of an implied reproach.

"Oh, but I like talking people. People who hold their tongues and listen are such bores. I do detest bores. I talk a great deal myself."

"I think I have got into the way for Hatty's sake. Hatty is the sickly one of our flock; she has never been strong. When she was a tiny, weeny thing she was always crying and fretful. Father tells us that she cannot help it, but he never says so to her; he laughs and calls her 'little Miss-Much-Afraid.' Hatty is full of fear. She cannot see a mouse, as I tell her, without looking round the corner for pussy's claws."

"Is Hatty your only sister, Miss Lambert?"

"Oh, no; there are three more. I am the eldest—'Mother's crutch,' as they call me. We are such a family for giving each other funny names. Tom comes next. I am three and twenty—quite an old person, as Tom says—and he is one and twenty. He is at Oxford; he wants to be a barrister. Christine comes next to Tom—she is nineteen, and so pretty; and then poor Hatty—'sour seventeen,' as Tom called her on her last birthday; and then the two children, Ella and Katie; though Ella is nearly sixteen and Katie fourteen, but they are only school-girls."

"What a large family!" observed Miss Sefton, stifling a little yawn. "Now mamma has only got me, for we don't count Richard."

"Not count your brother?"

"Oh, Richard is my step-brother; he was papa's son, you know; that makes a difference. Papa died when I was quite a little girl, so you see what I mean by saying mamma has only got me."

"But she has your brother too," observed Bessie, somewhat puzzled by this.

"Oh, yes, of course!" But Miss Sefton's tone was enigmatical, and she somewhat hastily changed the subject by saying plaintively, "Oh, dear, do please tell me, Miss Lambert, what you think I ought to do when we reach Cliffe, if we ever do reach it. Shall I telegraph to my friends in London, and go to an hotel? Perhaps you could recommend me one, or—"

"No, you shall come home with me," returned Bessie, moved to this sudden inspiration by the weary look in Miss Sefton's face. "We are not strangers; my father and your mother were friends; that is sufficient introduction. Mother is the kindest woman in the world; everyone says so. We are not rich people, but we can make you comfortable. To be sure there is not a spare room; our house is not large, and there are so many of us, but you shall have my room and I will have half of Chrissy's bed. "You are too young—and here Bessie was going to add "too pretty," only she checked herself—"to go alone to an hotel; mother would be dreadfully shocked at the idea."

"You are very kind, too kind; but your people might object," hesitated Miss Sefton.

"Mother never objects to anything we do; at least, I might turn it the other way about and say we never propose anything to which she is likely to object. When my mother knows all about it, she will give you a hearty welcome."

"If you are quite sure of that, I will accept your invitation thankfully, for I am tired to death. You are goodness itself to me, but I shall not like turning you out of your room."

"Nonsense! Chriss and I will think it a bit of fun—oh, you don't know us yet."

So little happens in our lives that your coming will be quite an event, so that is settled." And Bessie extended a plump little hand in token of her goodwill, which Miss Sefton cordially grasped.

THE ART OF TRANSLATING VERSE FOR MUSIC.

By LADY MACFARREN.

IF my accepting an invitation to write a paper on "the art of translating verse for music" should appear somewhat invidious, I will take courage in the belief that those who practise may preach, rather than the sign-post class, who point to the way they never travelled—and record the aim and the method I have pursued with this kind of work during many years.

Translation is not imitation, not the paraphrasing of a set of lines from one language into another; it is the transference of its underlying meaning and intention. Words are but surface; there is that behind them, their "human nature," which has to be seized, clearly seen by the mind, and from this central living germ the poem has to be reconstructed with as much of its original colouring as can be assimilated in the new idiom.

Many charming expressions are quite untranslatable; they convey nothing in another tongue, and as many volumes of "English as she is spoke" could be produced as there are different languages, by a literal translation of their idiomatic phrases. These can only be rendered by analogous expressions, if such exist, or rejected as detail, together with similes, expletives, etc., when their literal translation would give a forced or foreign air to the phraseology. Literal exactness should be secondary to the spirit and intention of the whole, which is the main point to hold in view. And here comes the consideration: in what association is the central idea to be expressed? The translator must be sure whether his original is literary or popular, archaic or romantic in character, and adjust his diction accordingly.

Every language possesses a verbal oasis, where, amid the vast desert of colloquial common-place for purposes of business, chatter, and the like, the emotional side of life is conveyed from spirit to spirit—the heart-language; this is the language of song. It is the language of imaginative children, and of all Volkslieder in whatever land. The Folksong deals with the lyrical side of life only—the dawn of love, unkindness, faithlessness, parting, regret for the loved one through absence or death, etc. The intellect has no part in them; it is the poetry of every day, the central feelings that stir us to life and action, whether on the sunny seas of sympathy or under the low grey skies of alienation. Books and newspapers, social gatherings or political meetings tell us nothing of this primal element, but it underlies them all, for without it there is nothing but death. The people, whilst yet in the rudimentary stages of undeveloped thought, are the everlasting children of humanity and the fountain of song. What art has ever equalled the greater part of the Irish melodies? Though we mostly know these bereft of their original pentatonic limitations, and thus of their specially Celtic character, for variety and richness of invention, of rhythm, of all that is enchanting in music, they are without parallel. And the words of such songs are always simple, with few tropes, and these of the most obvious nature, and with no many-syllabled words.

But there is a universal tendency to outgrow this natural song-language as civilisation advances, and to become literary and artificial. How this tendency works its fatal way we can see in the lyrical poetry of Italy within this century. From the sweet conventionalities of Metastasio, whose world is bounded by "amore" and "dolore," scarcely a trace of individual temperament rippling the smooth monotony of his verses, up to the magnificent libretto of Bellini's Norma (the finest, perhaps, ever written), we have in the last important work young Italy has produced, the German-Hellenic intricacies of Boito's Mefistofele, music most stirring and suggestive to read, but for the most part not sympathetic to sing or hear.

But perhaps we should not look for the development of lyrical poetry to the opera, which has from the first been only an air-plant of fashion; the great treasury of home song is the German Lied, and here, too, we see that, though remaining true to the natural lines of human emotion, this emotion has been infinitely ramified and differentiated also within this last century. This growing complexity of feeling and of individualisation in the words has led to a corresponding "pointedness" (as a transition from 13th to 16th century Gothic) in the voice part, so that every minute wave of the poetry might be fitted by the melody, which often sacrifices continuity in consequence, and to a more and more complicated background in the accompaniment. In Schubert's and Schumann's first songs we have the culmination of the Lied; it is not yet overloaded with detail outside the governing sentiment, and as typical of their most admirable art we may take the Winterreise and Dichterliebe. In each of these masterpieces, consisting respectively of twenty and of sixteen songs, the underlying feeling is absolutely the same—regret for a false love. Yet in the twenty of one and in the sixteen of the other, each song has a distinct physiognomy of its own whilst subtly related to all the others. These works are unique; as Jean Paul says of the angels, each is its own species, and their worth will last while music is an art.

Two equally perfect works by the same masters, Müllerlieder and Frauentiebe und Leben, show the development of a feeling from its first inception to its fatal doom. Wilhelm Müller and Heinrich Heine spoke the heart-language, and the musicians found the heart-accents to fit them.

Will the reader ask, "What! has all this to do with the method of translating?" Yea, indeed it has. Out of an intelligent love of the masterpieces, out of a thorough knowledge of them only, can we form a standard by which to make our humble replicas. "Is it necessary to study the music of a song in order to translate it?" I have often been asked this question. Most assuredly it is imperative that the music should be read or known in all its details, or the translation will be cold and foreign to its nature.

Sense and song must be severally grasped and flow back together into sense, then all is well. Syllable for syllable, rhyme for rhyme, accent for accent, and, wherever possible, analogous vowels to the original ones on the culminating notes of phrases, and then it is a translation. My rule is when I understand a poem, to write it all out into prose, choosing as simple Saxon words as I can find, avoiding all colloquialisms, and then, holding in mind the character of the original, to assimilate my rough version to the music and gradually to work it into a corresponding poem. Three, four, as many as nine times I have had to throw away the outcome of this process before there seemed any life in it; sometimes it comes out at once. And this—is no light labour; money cannot pay for it, there must be love. Unless some grace, some lovely turn of thought, some fresh glimpse into the depths of the universal mind,

"Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony,"

"That ocean where each kind Does straight its own resemblance find," strike the imagination, the work will be dull and mechanical, but for the sake of such glimpses into the everlasting, ever living beauty one will follow as does the African traveller on the traces of new flowers or butterflies, or of the cunning little frauds that live by simulating death; these are for Science, which is knowledge; those are for Art, which is joy.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK MAKES SOUPS.

SOUPS are an important item in a French household, for a dinner is rarely served without, though often the stewpan serves to cook the three courses (soup, meat, and vegetables) which compose the meal. Some of these soups may with advantage be used in English houses; they are, as a rule, lighter, simpler, and more economical than our soups, and are not much trouble to prepare.

I assume that everyone knows that vegetables must be properly washed or otherwise prepared before being used for soups, so have not given these directions in the following recipes. When vegetables are cooked in butter first, it is best to let the butter melt in the stewpan, and to put the onions and leeks in before the other vegetables.

By passing vegetables through a sieve, is meant turning a hair sieve upside down, putting the vegetables on it, and working them through with the back of a wooden spoon, moistening with the stock or water from time to time to get them through. Vegetables or grains so passed are called a purée of—.

Bouillon gras (ordinary stock or broth).—Take four pounds of beef—a piece of the neck or shoulder will do, but if the meat is to be served as in France, the better pieces of beef are preferable; a piece of rump, tops of ribs, the chuck rib, or a piece of the top of the round are all good. Of course, a little more in weight must be allowed if there is bone with the meat, and it must be as fresh as possible—meat cannot be too fresh for stock; add a small piece of liver (about two ounces), no veal, some bones pounded for boiling; put in an earthenware stewpan that has been used before (a new one gives a disagreeable flavour to the broth) if you have one, if not in an ordinary stockpot or saucepan, add five or six pints of cold water, let it come to a boil, skim it, add some salt and a little cold water to make the scum rise; skim well, then add an onion stuck with four cloves, a clove of garlic, half a burnt onion, three carrots, half a parsnip, two leeks, two turnips, a small head of celery, a bay leaf, a few whole peppers, and a lump of sugar. These will make a little more scum rise, which must be at once removed; then cover the pot close (if an earthenware one it is best to put a weight on the lid to keep it down), put the saucepan back on the stove, where it will continue to boil slowly, but take care that it does boil, for broth is never good if it boils and then stops; it should boil four or five hours. Take the fat off, put it aside for frying or dressing vegetables with. Place the beef on a layer of parsley, or surround it with onions lightly fried, or with vegetables cooked separately and cut; strain the broth through a hair sieve; if well made it will be clear and of a pale gold colour; it is either eaten as it is, or used as the base of other soups.

NOTE.—For good stock the meat and vegetables must be of good quality, and fresh; the stewpan or stockpot must be kept close shut, and the contents must boil without intermission. By adding the giblets of a turkey to the above ingredients an excellent soup is obtained. Burnt sugar is used for colouring, if burnt onion is not to be had.

Consommé is a much stronger stock; it is made in the same way, with the addition of some ham and a fowl or veal, perhaps a part-ridge; it is stewed six or seven hours to reduce it.

Soupe au naturel is the broth poured over crusts dried on the stove or over slices of bread.

Soupe à l'oseille (sorrel soup).—Put an ounce of butter or a little fat from the top of the stock into a stewpan, throw in a large handful of chopped sorrel, a little chervil chopped separately very finely, and five or six chopped lettuce leaves; cover and let the sorrel soften; stir now and then; when well cooked add about one pint and a half of water or stock, or half milk and half water, salt to taste, and simmer for a quarter of an hour. When stock is used no thickening is needed, but if made with water the soup must be thickened with the yolks of one or two eggs; after the eggs are added the soup must not boil. Put some peppered slices of bread in the tureen, pour the soup over, and serve.

Soupe d'été à l'oseille (summer soup with sorrel).—Take a handful of sorrel and a lettuce, cut them up, put them in a stewpan that you have rinsed with cold water, but do not add either water or butter; they contain sufficient moisture to cook themselves; put the stewpan over a slow fire, and stir occasionally until the contents are quite soft. In another stewpan put a pint of green peas, a good teaspoonful of chopped parsley, and a small chopped onion, some salt, and two ounces of butter; put over the fire, put on the lid, shake the whole now and then to prevent the vegetables colouring, cook for about fifteen minutes, then if the sorrel is soft, add it to the peas, etc., stir, and add about a quart of stock, milk, or water, put a few pieces of bread and a little pepper in the tureen, and pour the soup over it. If liked, the vegetables may be passed through a fine sieve.

Soupe à l'oignon (onion soup).—Skin three large or six small onions, cut them in halves and make many horizontal and perpendicular cuts across them, so as to result in a number of little square pieces, which throw into a stewpan with two ounces of butter; put over the fire, turn about with a wooden spoon, put the lid on the stewpan, and leave over a slow fire until the onions begin to colour; then sift in a tablespoonful of flour, stir for two minutes, and add slowly one quart of boiling water or milk, and some salt; let it boil, draw to the side of the stove, and simmer for half an hour; add a little pepper. Cut some thin pieces of bread; and dry them on the stove while the soup is cooking; put them in the tureen with a little bit of butter on each, dish up the soup, and cover it quickly.

Soupe à l'oignon au fromage (onion soup with cheese).—Make the soup in the same way, cut some Gruyère cheese in small dice, put it amongst the bread in the tureen, with a little more pepper; add if you like a tablespoonful of Parmesan, and do not forget the butter; turn the soup out, let it stand a minute before serving, and stir to make the cheese rise.

Potage au lait (milk soup).—Boil one pint and a half of milk with a bay leaf, a little salt, and a lump of sugar. Fry some small squares of bread in butter, drain them, and place them in the tureen; beat the yolks of two eggs, stir a little cold milk into them, take the bay leaf out of the milk, stir the eggs in, let the soup thicken a little, but do not let it boil; pour on the fried bread, and serve. The milk is sometimes flavoured with orange flower water or cinnamon instead of bay leaf.

Soupe au lapin (rabbit soup).—Wash and drain a cabbage, put a stewpan on the fire with three pints of water, a bunch of thyme, two bay leaves, a clove of garlic, two small onions, some parsley, two carrots, two turnips, half a small head of celery, pepper, salt, an onion stuck with four cloves, about half a pound of bacon, and the cabbage; tie the rabbit round, and put it in on the vegetables at the same time if it is old. If young stew the vegetables an hour and a half, and then put the rabbit in to stew half an hour before serving. When done, serve the rabbit on a dish with the cabbage round and the bacon cut in pieces. Serve the other vegetables separately, and strain the broth on to some slices of bread placed in the tureen.

Soupe au gigot (leg of mutton soup).—Take a leg of mutton weighing five or six pounds, beat it with a steak beater or the flat of a chopper. When it is quite soft open the muscles of the thick end with the fingers, and stuff in some pepper and salt; make some holes in the knuckle, and put in some butter and a clove of garlic cut in small pieces; tie all up tightly, bend the knuckle to make the joint as short as possible; take a saucepan deep enough to let the leg of mutton stand nearly on end, the thick part at the bottom; put in a slice of ham, a bunch of herbs, three carrots, half a parsnip, two leeks, one onion stuck with cloves, salt, pepper, and sufficient hot water to cook the meat in. Let it boil fast until the vegetables are tender, then put the mutton in, cover the saucepan, and let it simmer gently a quarter of an hour for each pound of meat; when done skim off the fat. Strain the soup on to slices of bread; serve very hot. Untie the mutton, and serve after the soup.

Potage au gibier (game soup).—Put in a stewpan a rabbit, an old pheasant, or some old partridges, and a fowl that is too old for eating; add a slice of ham, two carrots, two onions, clove and garlic, four cloves, bunch of sweet herbs and parsley, pepper and salt, and two or three pints of water, according to the quantity of game. Boil four or five hours; take out some of the best of the meat, chop and pound it, then pass it through a sieve; strain the soup to the pounded meat, make it hot again, and serve with fried bread.

Soupe aux choux (cabbage soup).—Put in a stewpan two pounds of beef (or preferably chuck) steak, one pennyworth of liver, half a pound of ox-tail, and a quart of water; boil gently and skim well; then throw in an onion stuck with cloves, two cloves of garlic, celery, six young carrots, two leeks, two turnips, half a parsnip, a sprig of chervil, and some salt; let it stew an hour; then have a round cabbage cut in quarters, and half a pound of fat bacon cut small, put into the soup, and stew another hour; skim the fat from the top, pour the broth on some peppered slices of bread, and serve. Drain the cabbage, add pepper and salt to it, put on a dish and serve. Place the meat on another dish, and send to table with carrots and turnips round it. In France the soup, cabbage, and steak would be served as three courses.

Soupe aux choux à la Henri Quatre (another cabbage soup).—Put a stewpan on the fire with an onion stuck with cloves, three or four carrots, two turnips, two leeks, some chervil, and when in season some cos lettuce leaves tied in a bunch, and a pound of good bacon; add about one quart of water, and boil three-quarters of an hour. Take one or two good cabbages, according to size, cut them in quarters, blanch them by throwing them into a saucepan of boiling water with a little salt, and leaving them on the stove until the leaves bend in the fingers; then take them out, drain them in a sieve, put them into the soup, and cook till thoroughly done. Fry some slices of bread, and put in a soup tureen; pepper them, and put in some little bits of butter; strain all the broth out over the bread. Heap the cabbage on a dish, put the bacon on the top of it, with the carrots and turnips round, serve after the soup.

Soupe aux poireaux (leeks).—Cut up half a dozen leeks, fry them in butter in a stewpan until they are a good colour, add a quart of water or broth, some salt and pepper, and a little piece of cinnamon; boil half an hour, and then pour (on to fried bread) into the soup tureen. If made with water a little piece of butter is put in the tureen; if made with stock the leeks can be fried in skimmings instead of butter.

Soupe aux poireaux et pommes de terre.—Fry a light colour in butter the white part of three leeks chopped small, add a pinch of white sugar and of salt; when done add a quart of water; as soon as it boils put it on one side for twenty minutes, then add one pound of raw potatoes peeled and cut in slices; stir the soup occasionally with a wooden spoon; when the potatoes are cooked to a mash finish the soup with a pinch of pepper and salt to taste.

Croûte au pot.—Place at the bottom of a stewpan some pieces of crust of bread well cooked on the stove, and throw on them just enough stock to moisten them; leave them on a slow fire till they stick to the pan a little, then moisten them again; cook them a minute or two longer, and serve hot. Eat with a little broth over them.

Soupe purée à la Crécy.—Cut one pound of carrots (young ones are best) in thin slices, put them in a stewpan with a lump of butter, an onion, and piece of celery cut small, a little salt and sugar; cook slowly, but do not let them get brown; when light gold colour add two large mealy potatoes and a little broth; when the vegetables are soft enough to crush easily rub them through a sieve with a wooden spoon, and put them back in a clean stewpan, with sufficient broth to make the soup a proper consistency. It will take about a quart of broth, including what is boiled with the vegetables. Boiled rice or fried bread is served with this soup.

Soupe à la purée de navets (turnips).—Slice one pound and a half of turnips, put them in a stewpan with an ounce of butter, turn them about, add some salt and a tablespoonful of flour, add sufficient hot water, stock, or milk and water (about three pints), stirring it in slowly; when the turnips are done rub them through a sieve, put back in a clean stewpan, season with pepper and salt and a little sugar, and if made with water or milk and water, a little cream or good butter may be added, but either should be put in the tureen and the soup stirred into it, not in the stewpan.

Soupe à la purée de carottes.—Proceed in the same way as for turnip soup.

Soupe purée de potiron (pumpkin soup).—Take one pound and a half of pumpkin without rind, cut it small, and proceed as for Crécy soup, or else proceed as for turnip—soup it is made either way; it should be moderately thick.

Potage à la julienne.—Cut very finely with a knife, if you have not a julienne cutter, four young carrots, two turnips, two stalks of celery, half a parsnip, one leek, one onion, one cabbage leaf, the heart of a small lettuce; add a handful of young peas, some asparagus tops, and a few very small sprigs of cauliflower. Put one ounce of butter in a stewpan, throw in the leeks and onions, turn them about for a few minutes over a moderate fire, add the rest of the root vegetables, with a little sugar and salt; cook a few minutes, then pour in one quart of hot stock; as soon as it boils up add the rest of the vegetables; cook until they are done (about twenty minutes); break into little pieces a few leaves of chervil, put them in the tureen, skim the soup, and serve. Julienne is made with any vegetables; of course, peas and asparagus have often to be left out.

Soupe julienne aux œufs pochés.—Prepare the soup as above, poach as many eggs as there are people to eat them, keep them in cold water until the moment of serving, then put them in a deep dish, pour hot stock over them and send them to table with the soup.

Soupe julienne bourgeoise.—Prepare as for Julienne, but only put half a pint of water or stock to the cut vegetables. Take the remains of the roots and vegetables, put them in a stewpan, with five or six raw potatoes, peeled, add one quart of water or stock, and a little salt; when well cooked pass through a sieve; add to the Julienne, put in a pinch of sugar and two or three chopped sorrel leaves, boil up, and serve.

Soupe printanière.—Cut some little balls or rounds of young carrots and young turnips, throw them into boiling water for ten minutes, then cook them in a little fresh water with a lump of sugar. Take some green peas, some French beans cut in diamonds, asparagus points, a lettuce leaf shred, and some very small sprigs of cauliflower; put these in a quart of hot broth, boil twenty minutes, add the carrots and turnips, with a small lump of sugar, boil up, and serve.

Soupe brunoise.—Cut into dice two carrots, two turnips, some pieces of celery; boil them ten minutes in salt and water; drain them, then cut up an onion and a leek, which cook in a little butter without letting them take colour; then add the other vegetables and a little sugar; as soon as the vegetables are dry put a few spoonfuls of broth to them; let this also dry up, then add a quart of clear hot broth, boil up, then put on one side to simmer for three-quarters of an hour, add a teacupful of boiled rice, and serve.

Tomato soup.—Put two ounces of butter in a stewpan, throw in an onion cut in slices, cook five minutes; then add some parsley, a laurel leaf, one pound and a half of tomatoes, three cloves, a very little nutmeg, pepper, salt, and a little sugar; when the tomatoes are done pass them through a sieve. Boil two table-spoonfuls of whole rice in some white stock or water with a lump of butter in it; when the rice is done add the purée, and more broth or water if too thick. Ground rice may be used instead of whole. Serve the soup with fried bread.

Soupe purée de tomates, au vermicelle.—Take three ounces of butter and the same of flour, cook together in a saucepan without letting it brown, moisten it gradually with sufficient broth or water to make it a moderate consistency, put on one side, and cook half an hour. Cook without colouring a large sliced onion in a little butter, add ten tomatoes, a little parsley, a bay leaf, salt and pepper; cook until the tomatoes are done, rub through a sieve, and add this purée to the soup; boil five minutes. Boil some vermicelli in salt and water, drain it, put it in the soup tureen, and pour the soup over it.

Soupe à la crème d'orge (barley soup).—Melt an ounce of butter in a stewpan, add a dessertspoonful of flour, cook two minutes; add a quarter of a pound of pearl barley, then in two minutes put in one pint and a half of hot water, boil up, and draw aside to simmer; add more water to the barley, if needed, to cook it; when quite done pass through a sieve, add sufficient veal stock or water to the purée to make it thin enough, season with salt and sugar, boil up, and thicken with the yolks of two eggs, a little cream and butter. Cook the thickening without letting it boil, and serve immediately. A very little nutmeg is sometimes added.

Soupe purée de pois sec (peasoup).—Take a thick slice of pickled pork, cooked or uncooked, two quarts of water, and one onion; boil half an hour; add three-quarters of a pint of split peas, boil two hours, or until the peas will mash (sometimes they take much longer); pass them through a sieve, put the purée and liquor back in the stewpan, mince the pork, and put in the soup, and serve. For purée de lentilles and purée de haricots proceed in the same way.

Soupe purée de pois secs aux épinards (dried peas and spinach).—Proceed as above, but do not put the minced pork in the soup; chop two or three handfuls of spinach finely, press out the moisture, put it into a stewpan with a small piece of butter, stir it until it is nearly dry, then mix with the soup; boil ten minutes, and serve.

Soupe purée de pois verts.—Take some fresh green peas (about one quart) and a large handful of spinach; chop the latter very small, and throw it with the peas into some boiling water with a little salt; boil fast with the lid off the saucepan; when done, strain off the water, and rub the peas and spinach through a sieve, moistening with white veal stock, with milk, or with the water they were boiled in, until the soup is the required consistency; put on the fire for twenty minutes before serving, stir in a little sugar, salt if required, and a lump of butter. Serve with fried bread; never add any colouring.

Soupe au poisson (fish soup).—Take a carrot and an onion, cut them small, add a bunch of herbs and a suspicion of garlic, put on the fire in a stewpan with a little butter, stir, moisten by degrees with hot water or broth, according to the quantity of fish you have for your soup. Cut whiting, soles, dabs, or eels in pieces, put them into the stewpan with the vegetables, add pepper and salt, and stew half an hour. Put some fried bread in a tureen with a little piece of butter, strain the soup on to it, and serve very hot. Fish soup may be made very quickly by cutting some fish small, and cooking it in a stewpan with butter or oil, adding chopped parsley, bay leaf, fennel, and a little garlic, moistening with water, adding pepper and salt, and straining on to fried bread.

Soupe aux moules (mussel soup).—Chop an onion and the white part of a leek, put them in a stewpan with a little oil, turn them about over a slow fire, without letting them brown, add a quart of hot water. Drain the liquor from two dozen mussels, and add that, and boil; add a bunch of parsley tied up with a laurel leaf, a quarter of a pound of rice, a bit of saffron, a little pepper and salt, and three cloves. Cook the rice slowly; when it is soft take out the parsley and laurel leaf, add the mussels, and serve. This soup should be rather thick.

Bouillabaisse Provençale.—This is a soup composed of a great variety of fish cooked together (mackerel, sardines, and some other oily fish must be excluded). Take two perch, a tench, a carp, and a small eel, or if sea fish is to be used, whiting, flounders, brill, small turbot, plaice, or any similar fish, or small lobsters; some or all may be used, for it is supposed that the more varieties of fish used the better. Cut the fish in pieces, and salt slightly; chop an onion and the white part of a leek, put them in a stewpan with a little oil, a clove of garlic, and a bay leaf; cook until they are a gold colour; add a teaspoonful of flour, then add the fish and sufficient hot water to rather more than cover it; then one tomato chopped, or a little tomato purée, a little powdered saffron, and a little lemon-juice; boil very quickly from twelve to fifteen minutes, when the fish should be done; taste to see if more salt is required, add some chopped parsley, give a boil up. Arrange the fish on a dish, in another deep dish lay some slices of bread, pour the broth on them, and serve at the same time as the fish. The excellence of this soup depends on the freshness of the fish. It is served at luncheon, not dinner.

Bisque aux écrevisses (crayfish soup).—Take about thirty crayfish, boil them with chopped vegetables and salt, in sufficient water to cover them. Take off the tails and remove the shells from them; pound these tail shells with butter, until quite smooth. Pound the remainder of the fish, add four ounces of bread crumbs that have been soaked with broth, or three ounces of boiled rice; add the water in which the fish was cooked (without the vegetables), and a quart of fish or other white veal stock, more if the soup is too thick; add one or two tablespoonfuls of tomato purée, boil up, then draw back, and simmer twenty-five minutes; rub through a sieve, season, add a little cayenne, the crayfish butter—that is, the pounded tail shells, and the tails cut in pieces.

One might prolong indefinitely the variety of soups, but as a French cook said, "In cooking, as in every art, one must leave the field open for the intelligent." And I think readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER will be able to think of many things that can be used to vary these soups.

REMOVE THE CAUSE.

By MEDICUS.

LET me see now—we sailed upon a Thursday morning, bound for the distant Cape of Good Hope. Well, upon the Tuesday before I had been at work nearly all night; then on the Wednesday I had gone to dine with and say good-bye to friends in the country, and it was broad daylight on a spring morning, birds singing and cocks crowing, before I drove into the town of Cain. That all meant the loss of sleep for two nights. It is no wonder I felt tired, and went to snatch forty winks in my cabin, as soon as we were clear of the breakwater. Down I lay, and was soon as fast asleep as ever Rip Van Winkle was. Rat-tat-tat at my door.

"Doctor, you're wanted," said the steward.

"Who wants me?"

"The ladies, sir."

"Bother the la——! I mean, steward, give my compliments to the ladies, and say I'll be there in a brace of shakes."

I found six officers' wives in one cabin, and half a dozen in another, each one worse than her neighbour, and all resigned to die, because they were so sea-sick. I did all I could to cheer them up, I gave them everything I could think of, then retired to finish my nap.

Rat-tat-tat. "Doctor, you're wanted!"

"Repeat the doses," I murmured, and once more I dozed too.

Rat-tat-tat. "Doctor, you're wanted!"

"Steward, steward!" I cried, "give them anything they like to ask for, but for pity's sake leave me alone."

"Ah! that's just it!" replied the steward; "and it's you, sir, they ask for, and they won't do without you either."

Well, it was four o'clock next morning before I got back to my berth, and—would you believe it?—I had not turned in ten minutes when—

Rat-tat-tat. "Doctor, you're wanted!"

Then I lost my patience, and when one of my patients entreated me to cure her at any cost, I said—

"Dear lady, the only way to cure you would be to remove the cause."

"Oh, do it then, and do it quickly!"

"I would not do it even if I could, for the cause is the sea itself, and I dearly love it."

Now thousands, perhaps, of my girl readers, whose eyes are scanning these columns, may be ailing; still doing their work, still attending to their duties, but altogether half-heartedly. They may have been ill for many a day, but do not know what is the matter, nor how to get well. The cure is: remove the cause, and as this is not an impossibility, like mopping up the ocean, I am going to try to teach you how it is done.

To be sure I can only generalise, but in this sort of generalisation, anyone, who like myself has had considerable experience, may hit the nail on the head nine times out of ten.

I must premise or tell you, to begin with, that this is a working girl's paper, and so I have to deal with working girls' troubles.

One of the hardest things to bear about complaints that do not actually confine you to bed or to the house, lies in the fact that you receive neither pity nor sympathy for them.

A girl complains, probably to a friend, and the "friend" just takes one half careless glance at her face, and remarks, "Well, now that you mention it, Ada, you do look a little pale."

Ah! if she only knew how poor Ada is suffering, has suffered, and may have to suffer. Well, I feel for Ada if her friend does not, and feel for many a pale face I meet on the street, or see behind a counter.

If I were to be asked the two chief reasons for working girls, of any occupation or any rank, being sometimes quite a long time in a poor state of health, I should give them as (1) Injudicious food; and (2) Too much faith in physic. I will say a word about the latter first. You have a bottle of some tonic mixture there, or a box of tiny pills that some dispensary surgeon, who has too much to do to think much about you and your case, or some mere chemist and druggist, made up for you. Look at the contents of that bottle, thin and fluid; consider the size of those tiny pills. Now feel your own arm. This latter is soft enough, not to say flabby. You cannot touch it without the thought striking home to you that it wants building up—it wants to be harder, solider, firmer. Do you or can you expect to get solidity and firmness out of a bottle of fluid, or build up muscle and nerve from pills no bigger than peas?

Now, the most that either the mixture or pills can do for you is to correct little irregularities of the system, and so aid Nature in the blood-making process from the food; or the medicine may increase the appetite, and enable you to eat more; and it may, if it has been wisely prescribed, introduce into the blood the necessities of life in which it is deficient, such as several salts with phosphorous and iron. But all this will not tend to the support of life, nor make you one whit hardier, unless you supply Nature with the real building materials for bone and brain and muscle; and this is only to be procured from food.

I say, then, that the cause of a thousand ills in our working-girl population is this want of strengthening food in sufficient quantity. Remove that cause, support and nourish Nature, and she will smile in return. Your troubles will all fly away one by one, and happiness, which without good health is an impossibility, will return.

The human body is just like an engine; the fires want feeding, for every act we perform and every thought we think uses up a certain proportion of solid material. To supply the loss we eat. If we do not eat, the body eats itself. Truly, I have seen a sleep dug from under the snow after being weeks buried alive. They had been plump and hard when the storm came; what were they when the sun once more shone on them? why, living skeletons. Waste had gone on as usual, and the supply was taken from their own bodies.

Now, it would pain me to think I was misunderstood. I am not despising medicine. I am a very strict believer in the virtues of physic, and as auxiliaries in the treatment of debility and mal-nutrition, they, if well chosen, are invaluable, but they never did and never could take the place of food in the animal economy. The only medicine that comes any way near what is required for the nourishment of the body is cod-liver oil, and this is really more food than physic.

I will just mention a few of the troubles to which the work-a-day girl is liable to fall a prey, then suggest means whereby the cause may be removed so as to permit the wheel of life to run easily round once more, without a hitch, as sailors say. And I believe that the simple plan suggested, if firmly adhered to, would restore the vital energies of ninety per cent. of cases; the remaining ten per cent. would be those of girls who had some constitutional trouble, of, probably, a hereditary character, such as that curse of our English climate—consumption. Many girls have a distressing tendency to neuralgia, especially that form of it which goes by the name of faceache. Decayed teeth usually get the blame, and an attempt at removing the imagined cause is made by the dentist. Well, a bad tooth may produce faceache, but on the other hand the trouble, as often as not, proceeds from debility of the system, of which the decaying teeth are only a symptom. You may be surprised to know, but it is true nevertheless, that teeth want feeding as much as any other part of the body, and if the nerves and bloodvessels supplied to them be weakened, they speedily go to decay. Then you may go on pulling them out one by one, and the faceache will continue as before. Decay of teeth I may, however, state, parenthetically, is often hastened for the want of use of the tooth-brush, or from using tooth-powders that destroy the enamel. The safest tooth-powder is a little carbonate of soda (Howard's best).

Backache is a distressing complaint. With it there nearly always comes general debility and weakness of the whole system. The system ought to be kept open by some mild vegetable pill; but pray, dear girls, do not use the quack, much-advertised pills! The compound rhubarb pill of the pharmacopœia will do good in such case, or Wyatt's vegetable pill. A simple roborant plaster may be worn on the loins, and a flannel bandage round the waist and next the skin. This may be dusted with sulphur for those of mature years.

Sleeplessness, or bad rest, as it is called, is a wearying symptom. I feel, said a poor lassie to me one day, as if I need hardly have lain down; I am as tired in the morning as at night. Ventilation of bedrooms, sleeping with window open, a light supper, hardish mattress and little bed-clothes, help to put matters right.

"Cannot I take a sleeping draught?" said a gentleman to me one day. "Oh, yes," I replied, "and you will soon get into the sleeping-draught habit, and be unable to sleep without them. You will get weaker and weaker, till the woful end, which is always a measurable distance ahead of those who give themselves up to such practices."

Nervousness. This is a symptom which is always present more or less in cases of over-work and mal-nutrition. It is distressingly painful, and assumes a thousand different forms. It is after all but the bitter cry of the nerves for proper nerve food.

Depression of spirits. The cure here again is to remove the cause. The whole world and all its machinery of life is bound to look black or green to one in bad health.

Excitability and irritability of temper, with face flushings, heats and colds, and fluttering of the heart, are all symptoms that vanish when we remove the cause.

Pain in the legs and feet, weakness of the knees, loss of hair, roughness of the skin of the face, pimples, burning of hands and soles of feet, all these are also symptoms that betoken nothing more nor less than poverty of blood.

I could name scores of other ills and troubles that afflict our work-a-day girls, but there is no real necessity; for debility of body and lack of strengthening blood are the causes of all, and the causes for this state of matters have to be removed ere the sufferer can smile again; straight away from her heart, at all events.

Now, what are we going to do about it? Well, if you are really ill enough to wish and determine to do something radically decided concerning your state, then, instead of wondering what medicine you will take, you will set yourself to review your mode of living and remedy that. I might say to you, take more nutritious food. Yes, but can you digest it?

We must go further back than this—we must get you an appetite; at least, I can put you on the road to doing so. But at the beginning we must begin.

Here is my plan for your regeneration or rejuvenation, as the case may be. Adopt the plan of sleeping I have already mentioned. Take plenty of exercise in the open air. Do not tell me you have no time, or are too tired, else I will have nothing more to do with you. I say exercise daily and regular you shall take, in wind or storm, rain or shine. The rain and mud will not hurt you if you wear a light cloth—not indiarubber—cloak, and have strong shoes on. A "bluffert" of wind will prove the best stimulant you can have, and snow falling around you is a calnative to the spirits, and leads one's mind often enough to contemplation. I know you want to shirk clear of the morning tub, but I will not permit it, unless in very extreme cases. The girl's own bath, then, is a sine qua non part of my treatment.

Well, you must not read silly novels, especially those pretty little stories of love and murder which are all too fashionable. Get light reading, useful and amusing, which you can easily pick up on the bookstalls.

Having used the bath and exercise for a week, you must take the rhubarb pills about twice or even three times a week, if they seem to be needed. They are sure to be wanted twice at all events, and hardly ever fail to get the secretions into good working order. After this take a mild tonic. Just this one I so often recommend: a dose of quassia water before meals twice a day, with a few drops of dialysed iron and dilute phosphoric acid in it; any chemist can make you this.

And now you will be able to eat more and better food. The quality stands higher than the quantity, so I give you the following hints, and with these I must close my paper.

First, then, although meat is nourishing, it is not an actual necessity, and those who suffer from the debility consequent on over-work or indigestion should not touch it more than once a day.

Secondly: farinaceous or flour food supports nature exceedingly well, with the addition of plenty of milk and eggs. These latter are invaluable to the delicate. Peaflour and oatmeal are the most nourishing, though the latter is apt to be heating.

Thirdly: the food partaken of should be easy of digestion. Those which are most easy, ranging in order from one hour to nearly three as the times required for assimilation, may be briefly summed up as follows:—boiled rice; sago, tapioca, pea-flour, oatmeal porridge, barley broth, milk, eggs, fowl, goose, turkey, game, potatoes, peas, beans, raw oysters, beef-steak, boiled mutton. Then come those foods which require from three up to five hours:—roast mutton, sausages, butter, cheese, pastry, stewed oysters, fresh made bread, boiled turnips, cabbage or beetroot, suet pudding, salmon, mackerel.

Fourthly: many articles of diet can be eaten with safety in the morning which would do injury later in the day.

Fifthly: time must be taken at each diet, and one ought to have some feeling of appetite before sitting down to another. No food should be taken between meals unless there be a feeling of faintness. Stimulants should be abjured. Tea should be weak, and not allowed to stand over the leaves. Cocoa is better than tea, but coffee is apt at times to affect the heart.

Sixthly: never take food immediately after exercise, nor before it.

Lastly: use the dumb-bells ten minutes before breakfast, and take five minutes in the open air before sitting down to that meal.

If you do all I tell you in this paper regularly for six weeks, you will in all probability have completely removed the cause of your trouble.

IN AN OLD GARDEN

By M. HEDDERWICK BROWNE.

YELLOW roses, purple pansies,
Tufts of heavy-headed stocks;
Either side the quaint old gateway
Blazing, torch-like hollyhocks.

Sweet peas tossing airy banners,
Saintly lilies bending low,
Daisies, powdering all the green sward
With a shower of summer snow.

Boxwood borders—yews fantastic—
Wallflowers that with every sigh
Spill such scent that e'en the brown bees Reel with rapture wandering by.

And the pear trees, long arms stretching O'er the sunny gable wall,
Scarce can hold their ruddy nurslings
Ripening where the warm beams fall.

Oh, the ecstasy of living!
How it thrills my life to-day!
I can almost hear the flower bells
Tinkle where my footsteps stray!

In a garden God first placed man,
There first woke Love's magic thrill;
And methinks a breath of Eden
Clings to earth's old gardens still.

YELLOW ROSES.

POULTRY KEEPING:

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

HAVE often wondered how many readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER know anything about the delights of poultry keeping.

Perhaps I ought to explain what I mean by poultry keeping; for by this expression I do not mean allowing a few miserable hens to wander disconsolately about in a backyard, picking up what they can, sleeping in some draughty shed, neither being happy themselves nor giving pleasure or profit to those who own them.

Poultry keeping means a great deal more than this; and I would advise no one to start unless she be prepared to take it up, on however small a scale, diligently and patiently, only expecting success after a proportionate amount of attention and practical experience.

That profit can be made in poultry there is no doubt, especially where about one for every member of the household is kept; but I do not intend to enter fully upon this question until later, only remarking in passing that profit depends on care and thought, and, above all, on doing everything in a thoroughly business-like way; by which I mean keeping strict accounts, buying food in the cheapest market, preventing waste, etc., etc.

I cannot tell you what a pleasure my hens have been to me, and I have come to the conclusion that poultry keeping as a recreation and quiet outdoor hobby is almost unequalled.

I, like many of my fellow-readers, live a quiet home life, and I would not do without the daily interest of my hens for anything. They take me out three or four times a day; they cause a constant healthy excitement as to the number of eggs they will lay; they create a kindred topic of conversation with my friends; and even the pleasure of my walks is vastly increased if I behold a fowl drinking in the gutter.

I have a name for each of my birds, and am constantly surprised at the individual characteristics they display; and they always welcome me most warmly, the greediest being perhaps the most affectionate.

Something of interest is constantly arising in the hen-yard; as, for instance, yesterday morning I found one of my home-reared chickens of six months, a dear little cross-bred Houdan, sitting on the nest where she afterwards left me her first tiny egg.

Again, the pleasure of being able to supply the household with really new-laid eggs is very great, and people who seldom enjoy them little realise the difference between the ordinary "fresh egg" and one just brought in from the home yard. The luxury is all the sweeter when it is the combined result of personal care and attention, and an economical use of scraps which might otherwise have been entirely wasted.

I do not unfortunately always find everything progressing happily in the yard. Sometimes a fowl is ill; sometimes a cat will make sad inroads upon special chickens, or I find that a sitting hen has allowed her eggs to get chilled, which latter contingency, I may tell you, is a most discouraging disaster.

With experience, however, one gradually learns how to ward off many troubles and dangers, and I should indeed be glad if a few words of mine would help any girl in her first attempts at poultry keeping.

I am sure that a great deal may be learnt from others, though of course practical experience is the real teacher whose lessons we seldom forget, and therefore I would advise beginners most strongly to begin in a very small way, so that if they get into difficulties, which they most assuredly will do, the loss may not be too great.

Some girl may perhaps be saying, "But I cannot keep hens; I live in a smoky town, and we have only a small back yard or a tiny garden."

Well, you are just the one I want to speak to! It is quite surprising what can be done in the way of poultry keeping with the most limited accommodation; so I would propose at once to enter into the question of houses and runs, and to find out what is necessary to secure the health of the birds and profit to the owners; and we will talk of breeds, chickens, feeding, and general management in a later paper.

There is no doubt that hens do thrive better and with less trouble when they have a good grass range, but with careful feeding and extra cleanliness grass is not an absolute necessity. I know a girl in Birmingham who keeps eight hens, with a run only six yards square; and I read a letter only the other day from a gentleman stating that his six pullets laid in one year 1,184 eggs (average 197), though they were only kept in a small back yard, and had never seen grass. Of course they were from a specially good laying strain, and had been fed by an experienced owner. Nevertheless, I am convinced that any girl giving her mind to the subject could attain to very good results even the first year.

Another girl I know keeps hens in a small run at the bottom of her garden, and lets them out on to the lawn for half an hour daily. They then do little harm if they are watched, but I must confess that hens let loose into a garden have a decided tendency to dig holes, and to nip off the heads of the gardener's choicest possessions.

The house is the first and most important item in the poultry establishment, and I propose to lay down a few general principles, and then to describe a typical house suitable for a dozen hens, from which you can work and adapt each to your own special surroundings and to the number of your birds.

The first essential for health for fowls is that the house should be kept thoroughly clean; there should be no smell whatever, and all should be arranged in such a way that the excrement can be removed daily; this is little trouble when done regularly, and is in fact one of the surest ways of keeping fowls free from disease.

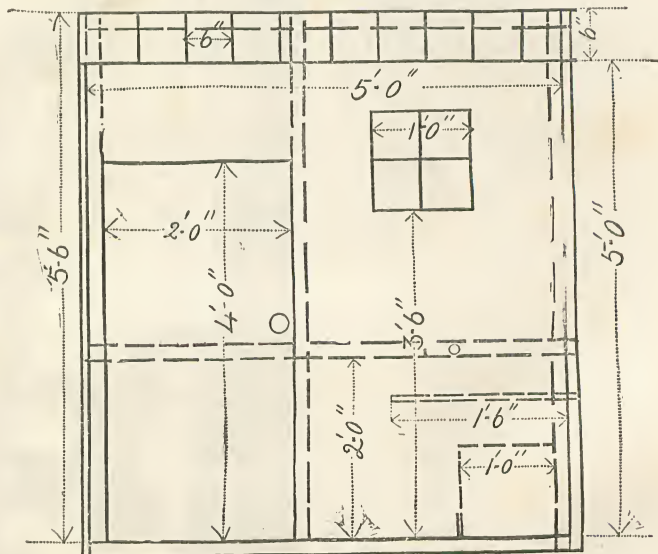

Next, the sides and roof of the house must be as tight and secure as possible, as anything in the way of a draught is most hurtful, although thorough ventilation must be provided.

The floor must be dry and free from damp, and as fowls are fond of light there ought to be a window.

As to situation, a south, or south-east aspect is best, but if it be impossible to obtain this, any other will do as well, provided always you secure dryness and warmth.

(a). DOOR FOR HENS.

Scale, $\frac{1}{2}$ inch to 1 foot.

FRONT ELEVATION.

For twelve hens you would require a house about 5 ft. square and 5 ft. high, the roof rising to 5 ft. 6 in.

As no doubt expense is an object to most of us, we will consider the cheapest way of setting to work.

It is a good plan to buy from a grocer or ham and bacon dealer some strong cases which, when taken to pieces, supply good wood of one inch in thickness.

I did this myself, and got a jobbing carpenter to erect the house in a corner of the garden where, happily, two sides were already provided for by the stone wall.

If this sort of wood cannot easily be obtained, ordinary rough boards do very well, and make a nicer looking house, though they are considerably more expensive.

The roof is best made of corrugated iron (this would cost you about 5s.), or else of wood covered with felt roofing at 6d. a yard, well tarred twice a year, along with the sides of the house.

A small glass window 1 ft. square should be placed at the sunniest side of the house; and thorough ventilation can be obtained by boring a number of small holes as high as possible on two sides of the building, so as to secure a thorough draught over the birds' heads. Or another way is to make an opening about 6 in. square, and cover it with perforated zinc. The floor must be well drained if in a damp situation, by digging a deep, sloping trench, and filling it with coarse gravel up to the level again. Having obtained dryness, there are many different ways of flooring, of which I might mention a few.

Hard trodden earth is very good if sprinkled with sand or fine ashes, and swept up daily. A concrete floor is much the same, but is, I think, rather cold unless well covered with loose ashes, and some people tile or brick their floors. All these ways are good, though I myself prefer the following:—A hard-trodden earth floor first, this covered with a very thick layer of dry ashes, which should be raked over twice a week and changed once a month, or better still with peat moss litter, which makes a very warm comfortable floor, absorbing the moisture from the hens' damp feet, and acting also as a disinfectant. Where peat moss is used it requires to be raked over once a week, and if five inches deep will last as long as six months if the night accumulations are removed daily.

When it is changed it should be done thoroughly. All should be swept out and the house lime-washed, the peat moss being used for the garden, where it forms a most excellent manure.

The door may be at any convenient side, but should be a good fit, and be fastened with a padlock. In some places it is well to have a bell fastened inside to ring when the door opens as a slight protection against thieves.

For twelve hens four nest boxes will be sufficient, placed along the darkest wall out of the draught.

On the ground is the best place, when they will consist simply of four compartments, 1 ft.

3 in. long and 1 ft. deep, with a 3 in. high board running in front to prevent the hens scratching too much into them.

The perch should be placed on the same side as the nests, and should be fastened from two to four feet from the ground, according to the heaviness of the birds. It is a very common mistake to put the perches too high, often causing great injury to birds of the heavier breeds.

The perch should be 2 in. broad, flat, and with the edges bevelled off.

All along under the perch must be placed a board which serves three purposes, i.e., forming a covering for the nests, which you will remember are underneath, preventing an upward draught on the birds, and for catching all dirt, which thus will never defile the floor of the house. This in a small house is a great consideration.

The board can easily be cleaned every morning with a small iron scraper and shovel, and sprinkled lightly with dry ashes.

With the number of birds I have given it would be better to run the perch round two sides of the house about 1 ft. from the wall, always remembering that wherever you put a perch, you must put a board underneath.

A hole 1 ft. square, with a sliding door, must be cut in the side towards the run, and should be shut every night.

The smallest run that you can keep twelve hens in, and then only with the greatest cleanliness, is one eight yards long by three wide, and if you have not space for this it would be better to keep fewer hens.

The run should be covered with loose gravel, earth, or ashes, and must, like the house, be kept very clean.

It should be raked over twice weekly, and part of it dug over once a week; the hens will enjoy this process and will scratch about finely, picking up insects and worms in abundance during the season.

As often as the run appears to be getting dirty and causing the least smell, the top must be removed and fresh earth, ashes, or gravel put down. About twice a year it should be dug over thoroughly.

All this may sound a good deal of trouble, but without it hens will not thrive and lay well, and after all it is work in the open air and attended with a great deal of satisfaction.

In passing, I may remark that old ulsters, hats, and strong shoes are very necessary adjuncts to the poultry keeper.

The wire netting, 2 in. mesh, must be fastened to posts at each corner of the run, and should be from four to nine feet high according to the breed, as some birds, like Hamburgs and Leghorns, fly immense heights, whilst Brahmas and Cochins seem hardly able to rise from the ground.

The nicest way to accommodate all parties is to have the netting six feet high, and wired in over the top.

The door into the run should consist of a wooden framework with wire netting across.

You ought not only to have a house and run, but also to have in the run some sort of shelter for the birds during rainy and snowy weather. You will often find that they prefer the house to any other, but still it ought to be provided.

If, as is most likely, your house and run are sheltered on two sides by a wall, the shelter is easily managed, as a piece of corrugated iron or boards covered with felt, placed across from the house to the wall, is all that will be required.

The fowls should enter the hen-house from the shelter.

If there were no wall, and your house and run were in the middle of a field, you would be obliged to board in a piece of the two sides.

Under the shelter should be placed a box or heap of sifted ashes in which the fowls can dust themselves; this they should do as regularly every morning as we ought to take a cold bath.

If you neglect this you will find your hens moping and miserable because covered with insects.

It is good to occasionally put a little insect powder into the ashes.

I think I have now given you all directions as to the house and run. It is no use estimating the cost, as prices differ so much in different parts of the country, and probably my plan will be modified in every instance. You will notice that I have only spoken of fowls kept in close confinement; of course, if you have a chance of grass, take it, by all means, and the larger the run, even without grass, the better.

Some of you may be able to let your fowls out occasionally on to grass, and if you have only a limited supply it is the best plan to let them out daily for half an hour, when they will soon learn to eat what they want in that time, without spoiling it by constantly treading upon it.

Many girls will, no doubt, have sheds and out-houses at their disposal which they can adapt to their wants, and save the expense of building; and in all such cases it is best to use what there is first before launching forth into more.

Those who would like to keep from four to six hens, to try how they succeed, could make a house out of a packing case or a very large hogshead, whose sloping top makes a splendid roof when covered with felt roofing and well tarred. The slope of the bottom must be filled up level and supported on bricks to keep it from the damp ground; only one nest would be needed, and a run four yards square would be plenty.

These proportions I give at the lowest, and if a nice little house could be built on the same plan as the larger one, all the better.

There are many complete houses advertised at fairly reasonable prices in the live-stock journals, which are very convenient, but I always think home-made things are more interesting, and I need not remind you that brothers are a great help sometimes when they are judiciously treated, and often render valuable service to their devoted sisters.

I hope you will be able to understand the accompanying plan of the house I have described. If you were to give it into the hands of any carpenter, he would be able to work from it, as it is drawn to scale.

A PRINTER'S TALE.

Minion and brevier are two different sizes of types, and about them printers tell the following story:—

An intelligent compositor was setting up a story for THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, when he came across the following passage:—

“‘Elvira,’ he cried, in a passionate voice, ‘Elvira, fly with me.’

“‘Antonio,’ she sobbed, smiling through her tears, ‘I will; certainly I will.’

“‘At that moment a tall figure stepped between them, and the sullen voice of Hugo de Grubbs was heard:—

“‘Avaunt, slight girl! And as for you, base minion—,’”

The intelligent compositor had just got as far as this when an idea struck him. “The howling ignoramus!” said he to himself. “Why, minion wasn’t invented until 1654, and this is a story of the Middle Ages.” He then changed the passage to—“Avaunt, slight girl! And as for you, base brevier—”

And so it was published.

ARGUMENT.

How canst thou smile at my despair,

And bid me other nymphs adore?

Show me a girl but half so fair,

And I will trouble thee no more.

CHAPTER I.
NOAH IS ANGRY.

T was night.

Out of doors and indoors it was night.

Out of doors the sun had set, and the pale moon had risen in a mist, and was not yet high enough in the heavens to dispel the darkness.

Indoors, the young mother, in the heyday of her youth and beauty, had sunk to rest, had crossed that horizon from which there is no return, had already passed into that other world about which we speculate so much and know so little, and had left a feeble wailing infant, a few hours old, to cheer the darkness her absence made in her husband's heart.

Into the depths of that darkness we have no need to peer; the widower sat in his study, his head bowed down with grief, dimly conscious that henceforth his walk through life would be slower and sadder, now that the wife of his youth was gone before, when a servant knocked at the door and asked if her master would see one Noah Oldman, who had urgent business with him.

The rector—for the stricken man was the rector of the parish—signified his willingness to receive the visitor, and in a few minutes a tall, broad-shouldered, well-proportioned man entered. He was a grand-looking fellow, muscular and sinewy, with no redundant flesh upon him, good-looking too, but it was less the beauty than the nobility of his countenance which first struck you. The keen glance of his bright blue eyes shone from under the fair shaggy eyebrows which marked his fine forehead; his nose was aquiline, and the lower part of his face was almost hidden in a thick, long, golden pointed beard, which hung down almost to his waist; his complexion, naturally very fair, was deeply tanned by exposure to the wind and weather of the Norfolk Broads, on which he lived. He looked, and probably was, about forty years old, and he was dressed in a blue jacket, corduroy trousers and high jack-boots, and carried a large broad-brimmed straw hat in his hand.

"Good evening, Noah; what can I do for you?" said Mr. Leicester, languidly.

"Allow me to be a slight assistance to you in your great trouble, sir," said Noah, respectfully.

The rector shook his head as much as to say this was impossible.

"It is only a trifle, I know, sir, but we thought it might take a little weight off your mind. It is the child; they tell me it is delicate, while our little one, a few hours older, is strong and healthy. If you will allow me, my wife will bring ours up by hand and take charge of your motherless infant."

"The child! I had forgotten all about the child," muttered the rector, the new responsibilities of fatherhood dawning upon him when he felt least able to bear them, as responsibilities of all kinds have a happy knack of doing; but after consultation with the nurse, Noah's offer was accepted, and the little motherless girl carried there and then to Noah's Ark, as his home was called, where it lived till it was a year old.

But before Noah left the rectory that night he had a message to deliver, and though it was to his spiritual pastor, and Noah was only an eel-catcher, he delivered it while the infant was being wrapped up for the nurse to carry to its foster-mother.

"Sir," he said, "it is a terrible sorrow; but it is a grand opportunity the Lord has sent to you; to do His will is to be a good man, but to will His will is to be a saint."

Simple words, but words the rector, who was a younger man than Noah by ten years, never forgot.

Simple words, but words which deserve to be writ large on the hearts of men and women, for we are not wont to remember how much higher the last is than the first; to do His will is Martha's part, to will His will is Mary's, and few, alas! are the Maries; and yet it brings its reward even in this world, for while to do His will brings happiness, to will His will brings joy, and joy transcends happiness as the light of the sun exceeds the light of the moon.

Three weeks later two babies were baptised in Windham church. The name of the one was Grace; the name of the other, which Noah held in his arms throughout the service, was Eve.

Ten summers went and came, and one June afternoon during the eleventh, Noah Oldman, his golden beard, grizzly now, shaded his keen blue eyes with his hand and peered across the blue waters of the broad on whose borders he was standing. It was a sight worth looking at, that broad, or lake, which takes its former name from the broadening of the river from which it owes its existence, its sides lined with bulrushes and sedges, some eight or ten feet high; yellow irises shone amid the reeds, the wild spirea or meadow-sweet reared its graceful head in a cloudy mass of feathery blossoms near the water's edge, while a bed of purple loosestrife stretched far and wide in the marshy ground on which Noah stood, and here and there the foxglove shook its magenta bells among the loosestrife, while lower down the ground was blue with the starry blossoms of the little forget-me-not. The blue waters of the broad were enlivened by several boats, and one or two wherries, with their rich red-brown sails, were cruising about. Presently a boat laden with hay, and looking like a floating haystack, passed, polled along by two men; but Noah was not looking at the wherries nor the hay-boat; his glance was fixed on a small sailing boat, in which his keen eyes presently distinguished four children, and among them his daughter Eve.

Not far from where Noah stood were five or six herons, holding a committee meeting on the affairs of the heronry to which they belonged; some reed-buntings were chattering in the reeds, some reed-wrens singing softly and sweetly as they tended their young in the pollard willows close by; while overhead the larks were carolling forth their joy-laden songs, too high to heed the kestrel, which hovered at a lower level in search of prey; but Noah, though he knew the note and flight of every bird which sings and flies, was too intent on watching the boat to pay attention to any of the feathered tribe.

He stroked his long beard thoughtfully, and then, satisfied that the boat was making for a point higher up the broad, he turned away and strolled towards the clump of willows, from which he cut a long, strong, lithe branch, and trimmed it with his pocket-knife.

"It is my Eve; she has disobeyed me, the naughty girl. I must punish her. God bless her pretty face, but He will bless neither her nor me if I let her disobey me. It is the first time she has ever done such a thing, and it is my duty to see it is the last," he said aloud, for he had a habit of talking to himself. Then he walked past the reeds and the rushes, the purple loosestrife and the flags, till he came to an open space where he expected the boat to come in. On his right lay the broad, calm and fair in the sunlight, though none knew better than Noah how dangerous those waters, shallow though they were, could be if lashed by a sudden rodges-blast into fury, and to this the broads are liable at any moment, even during the fairest weather. On his left lay acre upon acre of marshy land; dotted about it stood little windmills, used to work the pumps which drain the marsh.

Narrowly and anxiously Noah watched the little boat and its white sail as he walked towards the landing place, a graver look than usual on his fine face; but it was not anxiety for the safety of the boat which made him grave; it was his darling's disobedience that darkened his countenance. Knowing, as he did, the danger of sailing if a sudden squall came up, as these rodges-blasts do spring up on the broads, he had told Eve she was not to accompany the other children on their excursion, although Adam Day understood sailing as well as any celman or wherryman in the neighbourhood. This was evident from the way he handled the boat as he tacked and then drove her ashore, but it did not lessen Eve's fault in Noah's opinion.

There were four occupants of the boat, two boys and two girls; Adam Day was the eldest of the party, a fine, tall, well-grown lad of fifteen or sixteen, with a clean face and remarkable grey eyes; he apparently belonged to the same rank in life as Noah, for he was dressed in the blue jersey, high boots, and large broad-brimmed hat of the broadmen; the other boy was younger and handsomer, and as evidently a gentleman; but of the girls it would be hard to say at a glance which was Noah's own daughter and which the Rector's, her foster-sister, for both were dressed in white frocks with sailor hats of white straw, and both were laden with water-lilies; but one hung her head with deepened colour as Noah caught hold of the boat and gravely bade the rest good-evening.

"Good evening, Noah; just look what beautiful lilies the boys have gathered for Eve and me," said Grace Leicester as Noah lifted her ashore.

She was a sweet-looking child, very fair, with long, pale, golden hair, large dreamy blue eyes, a delicate complexion, and a gentle, quiet manner.

"They are beautiful, Miss Grace, but Eve's are forbidden fruit, and must be sacrificed," said Noah, taking Eve's lilies from her and throwing them remorselessly into the water before he suffered her to land.

"Hold hard, Father Noah; what is that for?" exclaimed Adam Day, trying to rescue some of the floating lilies.

"I forbade Eve to go with you to-day; she has disobeyed me, and now I must punish her. Leave the lilies, Adam," said Noah, sternly, stooping to pick up the stick he had thrown down, and then laying his left hand on Eve's shoulder he continued—

"Children, my little girl has been guilty of a grave sin, not only against me her father, but against our Father in Heaven, and He suffers no sin to go unpunished, therefore her disobedience must be punished. Eve, if you were a boy I should flog you, but I can't strike my little daughter; instead you shall flog me; take this stick and lay it across my shoulders as hard as you can till I tell you to stop."

"Oh father, father, I cannot, I cannot," sobbed Eve, bursting into a passion of tears.

"Do as I bid you this moment, and don't dare to disobey me a second time," said Noah, so sternly that none of the children dared intercede, though

Grace's tears also began to fall, and even Adam looked alarmed. Noah's tone checked Eve's tears, and terror forced her to take the willow rod Noah handed her; he then knelt down and said in the same angry voice which he had never before this day used to Eve—

"Now hit me as hard and as fast as you can."

And Eve, feeling to disobey was worse than to obey when he spoke in that tone, obeyed.

"Go on," said Noah, in a voice of thunder, when Eve paused after half a dozen strokes, and Eve, terrified, went on, her loud sobs accompanying the blows.

"That will do; now go home at once," said Noah at last; and then rising and taking the stick from Eve, he broke it and threw it away.

Eve, sobbing wildly, ran off as fast as her legs would carry her, and Grace Leicester would fain have followed to comfort her, but Noah begged her not to go.

"Leave her alone, Miss Grace, please; she won't be herself again till I have forgiven her, poor little girl; and don't you go after her either, Master Clifford. I suspect it was you persuaded her to go."

"Yes, it was, but I didn't know you would mind so much, nor that you had forbidden it," said Arthur Clifford.

"Nor did I, or I would not have taken her for a ten-pound note," said Adam.

"No, Adam, my boy, I am sure you would not. I don't blame any of you," said Noah.

"But you have punished us all; Miss Grace is crying still, and I would rather have been beaten myself than have looked on at this scene," said Adam.

"Perhaps, but I hope I have taught you all a grand lesson—namely, that we are all knit together in such a wonderful way that one person cannot sin without others suffering for it, directly or indirectly; even our so called secret sins affect others, for we cannot sin without suffering for it sooner or later, and one member of the body to which we belong cannot suffer without all the members suffering with it. You may say a single individual sin is only a drop in the ocean, but remember the ocean is made up of drops, and the sins of the world are made up of single individual sins. No, we are gregarious animals; we can neither live alone, nor sin alone, nor suffer alone; our sins affect others in countless ways—by example, by lowering the tone of the society we live in, by increasing the flood of sin which does its best to destroy the peace and happiness of humanity, and more directly by the suffering sins against our neighbour cause him. But I must go after Eve, so I will wish you good night, Miss Grace; good night, Master Clifford. Shall I see you to-night, Adam?"

"Yes, Father Noah, after I have prepared my lessons I will come and help you to set the nets."

So Noah left the children to go their ways; Grace and Arthur to the rectory, where the latter was staying, and Adam to his home, and then he strode away in the direction Eve had taken.

EATING RUE PIE.

A SHORT STORY FOR WORKING GIRLS.

By RUTH LAMB.

CHAPTER I.

"I TELL you, Milly, we shall do first rate. I saw our manager this morning, and he gave me a pleasant nod as I touched my cap to him. Then after he had passed me he turned round again and called me back to where he stood. 'I want a word with you, Richard,' says he. 'You asked me for a rise a few months back, and then trade was not good enough to justify me in giving you one. But things are looking up a bit now, and I must say that you did not work any the worse, but harder, after the disappointment. I liked that in you, my lad. It seemed as if you believed that I had the will to help you on, and were determined to do your best towards bettering things for your employers.' 'That was just how I felt, sir,' said I, and it was true. 'I knew you would do your best for me when the time came.' 'You shall not lose by working hard and biding patiently. The firm can afford you a bit more wage now, so you may look for your rise next pay day.' I was pleased, and I thanked our manager with all my heart. It was not only the rise, you see, but his nice kind way of putting it, and it is so helpful to know that those you work for notice whether you put your heart into what you do or not."

The speaker, Richard Beckett, was telling his tale to a young girl whose bright face became brighter still as she listened. It was plain that she was deeply interested in the account of the approaching "rise," and she exclaimed, "How kind of Mr. Oldham! It is a pleasure to work under a man like that. How much are you to have a week from now?"

"I can't tell till Friday night. Very likely up to seventeen."

"Seventeen! Why, you have only fourteen shillings a week now. Three will be a capital lift," said Milly Burton, who, as Richard's intended wife, was no less interested than himself in the prospect before him.

"Only fourteen, but I have saved out of that. Mother has managed wonderfully for me and made every sixpence buy a good sixpenn'orth in return. Often when I should have bought a thing she has taught me it could be done without, and has made me save coppers till they mounted up to shillings and went into the savings bank. Ah, it's a good thing to have a good mother or a good wife."

"You have had one, Richard. I often wish—but it's no use wishing. We cannot pick mothers, and mine was always kind and meant well," replied Milly, taking no notice of the second allusion.

"But if you can't pick your own mother you can choose a mother-in-law," said Richard, "and yours will be a good one, Milly. She has only me at home, and she reckons on having a daughter when we get married. A man that has a good mother is well off, but if he has a good wife too, he is better still. And, Milly, if I get seventeen, I don't see why we should not—"

Dick dropped his voice to a whisper, for some of his companions were approaching, and his words were only meant for Milly's ear, not theirs.

Whatever they were they made the blush on her bonny cheek deeper still, and her voice had a frightened ring in it, as she answered, "Dick, we mustn't think of such a thing. Your mother would be against it, and so would mine for that matter. She would say we are a deal too young. I am only eighteen, and you are but just turned twenty."

"Your mother needn't talk. She got wed herself when she was but sixteen. I have heard her say so," replied Richard, in a triumphant tone.

"Aye, Dick, and I have heard her say how foolish she was and how wrong, if she had but known it. She has grieved many and many a time to think she should have undertaken such solemn duties as fall on a wife and mother when she was so ignorant and unfit for them. She has grieved for father's sake, for she says, with a better wife he'd have been a better man, and for us children, because she could not teach us what she did not know herself. Mother is young yet, only six and thirty, but she has had such a hard life she looks many a year older, worn out like before her time. With such a lot of children it has been a regular fight for bread. Always just from hand to mouth, and no more."

"I can see why your mother will be against you marrying. It is likely when you help her both with hands and earnings. It is everybody for self, never mind other folks," said Richard, crossly.

"Mother is not selfish, Richard. Only you see she has gone through it all, and she wants me to wait a few years, so that I may not be weighed down as she has been. She means well, I am sure."

"A few years!" Richard repeated the words as though they meant for ever. "And does she expect that I shall wait till I am thirty before I get married?"

"Thirty is not old, Richard. Better wait that long than make a foolish start, and eat rue pie ever after."

The girl spoke reasonably enough, and she had only one motive in speaking—the good of both. She had seen and suffered from the consequences of a too early marriage in the case of her own parents, only she was not able to put all her thoughts and experiences into words powerful enough to convince Richard. He would listen only to inclination, and was ready to doubt the love of the true-hearted young creature, whose very affection made her urge the wisdom of waiting.

He left her with a careless "Good-night, Milly. As we are going to have years and years of courting, I'll not stay any longer. There will be lots of time for that. Only this I will say, you have taken the shine out of my 'rise' that I was reckoning on, and all for your sake."

"Stay, Dick. Don't go like that," said

Milly, tears streaming down her cheeks. If Richard heard he did not heed, but quickened his pace, and without turning his head for another glance, was soon out of sight.

Milly could not speak of her own trouble to her mother, for as she reached home she heard cries which told of childish pain, and on entering she found that the youngest child but one had pulled a pot of scalding tea down upon himself, and was in great suffering. She put aside her own cares and did her best, but for several days she had to stay from work in order to help her mother in the nursing and house, for Mrs. Burton's unreasoning affection would not consent to parting with the little one that he might be tended at the hospital. She had to face a sudden parting, for the child died.

When Milly was returning from her first day's work after the funeral, she met Richard, full of sorrow for his last hasty words, and her recent trouble. He did not know how to speak kindly enough; he had good news too about the "rise," which was to eighteen shillings, with a promise of twenty at the end of three months more.

And Mr. Oldham said, "We give it because you are worth it to us, and if you go on as you are doing we shall not stop there."

Of course Milly was glad, and the smiles chased the tears from her pretty eyes as she looked up with a sweet sense of forgiving Richard's cross words, and being forgiven for venturing to have an opinion of her own.

"I shall wait till I get the pound, Milly, and then—"

She knew what he meant, and again prudence whispered how much too young they were. But the girl said to herself that it would be a pity to vex him now he was so happy; and there was a different parting from the former one already described, when the young man left her at her mother's door.

Indeed, Milly felt almost ashamed of herself for finding it possible to smile, and be more inclined to look forward with hope, than to continue grieving over a sorrow that was yet new in her own home.

She had dearly loved the little two-year-old brother, whose death had been brought about in such an untimely way; and as to the mother, she was like mothers everywhere. The labour of caring for her large family might be too heavy for her hands. The mouths might be too many for the supply of food, but her heart was large enough to hold them all. She mourned for her little one with unselfish sorrow, and ever pictured him who was gone as the fairest of all the flock, though there might be a child the less to feed, clothe, and as she sometimes put it, "to go on slaving for."

Mrs. Burton noted the bright look on Milly's face, and guessed the cause of it. "Eh, my lass," she said, "everything looks bright when you start in married life. But it's when you have a swarm of children round you, when you lose your rest at nights, and have to work o' days, all the same as if you'd had it. When at best of times you feel that to keep things going every sixpence that comes in ought to buy a shillingworth of stuff, if they are to be made fairly comfortable; it's then you know what getting married means. And if there's no work, or slack work, and illness, and doctor's bills—what then? Dick's a good lad, Milly, but be content—wait, my lass. Patience pays in the end."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

ANXIOUS.—The "L.L.A." degree is granted to women at St. Andrew's University only; the University of London gives women the degree of "M.D.," and "M.S.," and the Royal University of Ireland the degrees of "M.D.," "M.Ch.," and "M.A.O." The usual minimum cost of obtaining the diplomas in the London University is £30, and in the Royal Irish £18. Those who desire to work eventually as medical missionaries, may often obtain assistance from some four or more societies, amongst which are the S.P.C.K. (Church of England), Northumberland Avenue, London, W.C., and the Edinburgh Ladies' Zenana Committee (United Presbyterian), Hon. Secretary, Mrs. Duncan McLaren, St. Oswalds, Edinburgh, N.B.

E. L. MELNISH.—We have pleasure in naming the English Literature Society, patronised by the Rev. F. Jarrott, Goodleigh Rectory, near Barnstaple. The subscription from members is only two shillings per annum.

HARRIET should learn to spell before she attempts to "write a book" for the instruction of poor girls. Even when a book is one for which there is a need, and well expressed, the difficulty of finding a publisher is great, and an unknown writer would have to pay all the expenses herself.

MISS FRV.—We are happy to give the address of your society and union for reading about foreign missions, so as to awaken a more widely-spread interest about them. The members are required to read during two half-hours weekly. No subscription is required. For the benefit of our girls we may observe that the association is called the Church Missionary Reading Union, 55, Chepstow Place, Bayswater, London, W.

MISS M. GIBB.—We comply with your request to give a notice of your Society for the study of any Foreign Language. The terms commence half-yearly, in May and November. Address the secretary as above-named, Glenlyon, The Avenue, Beckenham, Kent.

EMMA THOYTS.—We are glad that your Sulhamstead Girls' Question Club, though especially designed for farmers' daughters, is open to all. At present it comprises sixty-nine or seventy members, but as many as 100 could be received. Address Miss E. Thoyts, Sulhamstead, Reading, Berkshire. Free education for a girl of thirteen, and training for a profession, might be obtained later on, by means of gaining a scholarship.

BLACK BESS.—1. In reply to your ill-bred letter, we beg to say that foreign pronunciation of words is determined by the sound of foreign alphabets, and must be orally taught. L'Allegro is Italian, yet in this instance it is pronounced much as it would be in French, the "a" as in "sad," the "e" as an English "a," as in "baby." Vive le Roi is French, the "i" as an English "e," the second "e" mute. The last two words need oral teaching. When answers are given gratis, there can be no question of right and injustice. 2. The skin of the head should be washed with a small sponge frequently, the hair at longer intervals, and when the weather is fine.

MISS ANNIE GRAHAM.—We are obliged to you for your kind letter, and willingly draw attention to the fact that, through failure of health, you wish to resign your principalship and direction of the Cambridge Academy Prize Musical Improvement Society, at 99, Bedford Street South, Liverpool. Also that all fees, fines, and donations (less working expenses) are applied to the fund for prizes. There is no remuneration for the work, save a small profit made on the sale of the book and rules.

MISCELLANEOUS.

IRA.—We consider your case far more hopeful and satisfactory than you do yourself. If you "earnestly pray for love to God," and you "feel much distressed at your cold, hard condition," and "long to love Christ," and "to have your faith strengthened," and "do really strive to serve Him," we can only say you contradict yourself. We cannot agree with you that you are "cold" or "hard." It is the Holy Spirit alone who has given you such desires and such regrets, and made you pray so earnestly, and to resolve to continue to do so by His help and grace. So, thank Him for His work in your heart so far, and take courage. Look away from self and your frames and feelings and accept the divine promise—"Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out." He never made any soul pray for grace that He did not mean to grant.

ONE IN NEED.—Certainly there can be no harm in praying for relief from pecuniary difficulties, since we are told to ask our Heavenly Father for "daily bread." We are also encouraged to do so by the comparison made between the request for food by our children to us, and the response our love must invariably give, and that which is more certainly made by our all-gracious as well as Almighty Father, and in a far more bountiful way, "to them that ask Him." But to pray for wealth rather than essential things, for fame and worldly distinctions, over and above an honourable name, and grace to preserve it unsullied by sin and ungodliness, is to ask what has not been promised, and what might be extremely hurtful to the soul. If God see fit to lay such responsibilities upon you, and such trials of humility, that is another matter. Try to glorify Him "in that state of life to which He may see fit to call you."

ONE IN EARNEST.—Apply to the St. John's Maternity Home and Training School for nurses of the description you name. Write to the matron at 6, Tadema Road, Chelsea, S.W. Should there be no vacancy there, apply to the matron of the Home and Training School at 42-46, Gunter Grove, Chelsea, S.W. You will obtain all information as to age and terms more satisfactorily by direct personal application.

P. P. P. should not write either to single or married men. Why should she? It is a want both of self-respect and of prudence to do so.

DAISY.—The words you quote are Latin, and mean "And is thy God."

OLIVE appears to be suffering from the society of too many young men. Do not allow any man to reach the point of proposing to you if you do not mean to accept him; and do not accept any man as an intended husband whom you do not love. If you ought to be ashamed of loving any man who does not love you and desire to win your love. If you need advice on such points, consult your mother.

IVANHOE.—Such books as those you name would be more suitable for you when older. Your friend was right: Ruskin's "Stones of Venice" would be quite a fit study for you. We thank you for your nice letter, and return all your good wishes sincerely for any work of yours.

SUFFERER.—The following is a dietary recently recommended by a well-known doctor as excellent for most complaints where the system is overloaded, or where pimples and blotches appear on the face. Three meals a day, five hours between each; to eat slowly, rest afterwards, take plenty of exercise, a tepid bath daily, and sleep in a ventilated bedroom. Go to bed at 10 p.m., and rise at 6.30. Take a Turkish bath every three weeks; eat no pastry, cheese, sugar, eggs, jam, nor sweets; drink water at dinner. Breakfast—wholemeal bread and butter, porridge of oatmeal, wheatmeal, or hominy, stewed fruit, milk, or cocoa. Dinner, four ounces of lean meat or fish, two vegetables; and three days a week, instead of meat, take a milk pudding of macaroni, rice, semolina, etc., always finish with stewed fruit and brown bread. Tea—brown bread, butter, weak tea, or cocoa and milk, lettuce or water-cress, boiled Spanish onion, tomatoes, or beetroot. This is a most useful diet for anyone suffering from digestive troubles, and if persevered in will do good. It is also simple to provide, inexpensive, and nutritious. The milk should be boiled before drinking, and all water should be filtered or boiled. Lemonade, made of fresh lemons, may be taken. So many people seem in a muddle about diet, that we have thought it better to give this in its entirety.

BIRD FANCIER.—The mocking-bird, a native of South America, may be had, when young, for five dollars each, and the older for twelve and upwards, to twenty-five dollars. Sometimes, however, they are sold for fabulous prices. The speed of a swallow's flight has been tested in Italy, two being selected for the purpose, and they showed a speed of eighty-seven and a half miles an hour.

ONE IN TROUBLE.—The affection of the spine which you name gives a clue to all you suffer. The condition of the brain is the cause, owing to the connection of the spinal cord with it. In its debilitated state you need complete rest—to do nothing, in fact, but sleep, take carriage exercise, or sit out daily when fine, and be carefully dieted by an experienced doctor; not even reading, except a few verses of the Scriptures daily. Nerve and brain-power are seriously lacking; and only absolute rest of mind and body, in some healthy but perfectly secluded country place, will, humanly speaking, give you a prospect of recovery.

ONE OF SCOTLAND'S DAUGHTERS must be patient; the redness will soon wear off. Scars sometimes remain red for some little time.

JUNE.—The money never became your brother's, as he died before your mother; on the death of your mother, unless there were any provision otherwise, the whole would be divided equally amongst the three remaining children—you and your two sisters.

HOPE will find, we fear, that the old adage is true, "There is no royal road to learning," and the systems, whatever they promise, will not falsify it. So she had better keep her money in her pocket safely.

DAPHNE.—Sir Bernard Burke has decided that Queen Victoria has no surname, so called. She is of the family of Guelph, but it was royal long before the days when people used surnames.

ADMIRER OF FRANK BUCKLAND.—We have pleasure in giving the following extract from your letter. "Toads lay their eggs in long chains. Frogs in bunches like grapes; and then take no further care of them. As soon as the young tadpoles leave the egg they look for food. They are voracious, and have good-sized mouths. The stalks of any pond-weed that has grown in stagnant water may be seen to have a fluffy, brown-green fringe growing all down them. This is a parasite which spreads very quickly, and forms the chief food of tadpoles. Place some of this weed, so charged with its parasite, into the water in which the tadpoles are kept."

PUZZLED ONE.—The task or art of keeping small boys in order during Sunday-school teaching is a difficult one to learn, the several dispositions of the children augmenting the difficulty. When so young, pictures teach more than mere words—the Kindergarten system recognising this fact. Tell them the little story represented, and then bid them to tell it to you again, and point out the figures of each person named in it. The great secret is to make them speak as much as yourself, which necessitates attention. If one be troublesome and rebellious, place him standing on a chair or in a corner for a time.

SCOTCH THISTLE might form her writing by taking some she likes, and copying it carefully for a short time.

MERCY LYLE might learn book-keeping in a very short time, and by writing copies could much improve her hand. But she must not give way to fear nor despair, remembering the sparrows that live in God's care, and the lilies that He clothes.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—We do not remember to have noticed the name of the Viking ship, and think it was not mentioned. There is an excellent account of her in "Norwegian Pictures."

AILEEN MAVOURNEEN, who is only seventeen years of age, should on no account be persuaded to marry any man she does not love. She should wait for at least four years, till she is twenty-one, and knows her own mind. Why take heavy cares on shoulders so young and inexperienced?

MAY MARGARET.—The "red nose" is owing, probably, to digestive troubles. Eat slowly, and choose only such things as can be easily assimilated. Find some good brown bread, and drink milk or cocoa instead of so much tea. Keep your feet warm and wear flannels; and take a morning tepid bath and as much gentle exercise as you can.

MARGUERITE SHARP.—Bathing the feet in salt and water is said to harden them and strengthen the ankles.

MOONLIGHT.—There are five Deaconesses' Institutions in London and six in the provinces. One, the London Diocesan, is at 12, Tavistock Crescent, Westbourne Park; address the Head Sister Deaconess, Christine Maurice. The East London Diocesan Deaconesses' Home, 2 and 3, Sutton Place, Hackney, E.; address Sister L. Collier. The Deaconesses' Home, Stepney Green; Deaconess Hepburn Lyall; and the Church Extension Association, 27, Kilburn Park Road, N.W.

EDITH.—Bad memories are often the result of lack of attention to what is going on about you. Try to be "wide awake" and interested in all around you.

MELANTHUS.—A physician takes precedence of a surgeon. A crown-piece, temp. Queen Anne, in good preservation, is worth more now. Parrots are very long-lived; the Memoranda of the Academy of Sciences in Paris mentioned one that lived in the family of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in Florence, for upwards of a hundred years. Viellot also speaks of having seen one near Bordeaux, which was at that time eighty-four years old. The average length of their life has not been accurately ascertained. Louis Figuier mentions the fact of a cardinal paying one hundred crowns for one that recited the Apostles' Creed correctly; and relates of another (on the authority of Le Vaillant) that the latter heard one say the Lord's Prayer, lying on its back and placing the toes together as we should join our hands! Meat is very bad for them. Should yours become diseased you may attribute it to this cause. Bathing is their natural habit.

ANXIOUS TO HELP.—The Society of Watchers and Workers for Invalids published a pamphlet or magazine called "The Watchword." The secretary is Miss A. Randolph, Bayford House, Hertford.

LILY, E. M. L.—The hair is generally worn at the top of the head at present, but you might continue to wear it with a plait at the back, tied with a ribbon bow. We always warn our girls not to mind "frames and feelings" in religion, but to try by God's grace, sought for in prayer, to live the life of Christ day by day in all they do and say. This is simply to do your very best in everything you undertake, "as to God;" for "Ye do serve the Lord Christ," and in loving and serving "Ye shall know Him."

M. A. B. might write to inquire of Mr. Tarn (56, Paternoster Row, E.C.), but she will probably have to purchase the whole monthly part.

HISTORICAL STUDENT.—A recent small book by the Rev. E. L. Cutts claims Colchester as being the earliest town in England, and certainly, so far as history is concerned, the claim seems to be substantiated.

THE SOUL'S AWAKENING.

By JEAN INGELow.

METHOUGHT in my sleep I rose and went
To walk by our shining river.

O, it was calm! The low sun lent
His golden glow to the last waves' flow
Of a soft, spent tide—

That spread forth wooingly far and wide,
As a word from the sea continually

A message it would deliver.

For it sobbed at the bank ere it turned to go,
And washed the bows of a ship that lay Safely anchored at dawn that day
In the well-belovèd river.

I looked, "O, safe in her berth, methought,
This fair ship rides from the rock,
From storm and breakers, apart from aught
Of deep sea-sorrow and shock,
Full sweet is rest."

But her sails she spread,
And weighed her anchor e'en then.

"Ah, she will go," in the dream, I said,
"Surely to dare the wave and the wind,

Take for guidance an alien star,
Leave this land of our love behind,
And be lost from kindly ken—

Sail by the crags of coasts afar,
And haply where, crowned with lurid light,
Mountainous cones make red the night;

Or in water-lanes where corals are,
And like fluttering ghosts the white waves rear,
Her devious pathway find;

Or, glad in her port and safe from fear,
Moor at the wharves of Eastern men,
Or—O! may after, far from these,
Very long drive on unfriendly seas;

In Northern glooms forget the day

In an ice floe shut away;

And it maybe come back never,
For ever and ever."

And I went close where she lay, to see
How with tremblement and shiver
Her sails went up, and fluttering free
Her blue flag played in the air,
And the wooing wind was fair;

And I prayed, "O Lord of our life deliver
From wreck; watch over, Thou safety-giver,
Her going, whose paths are known of Thee;
O guide this ship in the river."

And while I was looking, some one nigh,
Leaning towards me whispered low,
"Have you brought the book? The voyage is long;

'Tis yours to have it." I made reply,
"I brought it, but truly I know not why;
What mean you?" He answered, "YOU are to go
That voyage; the turning tide runs strong;
She will sail full soon—are you ready?" But fear Troubled me. "What of the coming again?"

I said. "Of this I would something hear.
Shall I return? for O, I would fain
Return,"—but "Not to this country—no,"
He said; and there fell, as it were, a sigh,
The echo of words—my words, "O never,
For ever and ever."

Then I thought that others were standing by.
"Ah yes," they said; "it was even so!
Childhood is over, hope is high;
We all must sail in that ship, we know
Not whither."

Thereon in fear I woke,—
My heart awoke, and my soul awoke,
Sleep was ended, the morning broke;

I turned to the light and spoke.
"That was the voyage of life, good sooth,
The voyage of life set forth to me
In a dream. Am I ready? Nay, in truth,
Not ready. Yet childhood is over, youth
Is come; I must sail to that great sea,
And knew it not; but my prayer, awake,
Pleads in the prayer of sleep

Some part to take.

I am a voyager now to the deep,

For that same boon of Thy clemency;

In those same words I wait upon Thee;
Guide our souls down the widening river;
Master and Lord of life, deliver

From wreck, from foundering free;
Bring us at last, when the voyage is past,
To the haven where we would be."

A GIRLS' TOUR IN BRITTANY.

All rights reserved.]

ST. MALO, FROM THE SANDS.

Our strong-minded sisters will be horrified to hear that it was with some misgivings Ruth and I set out to travel on the Continent, without the protection of a masculine relative.

Unfortunately

we are not strong-minded; we neither wear spectacles, carry walking-sticks, nor wish for votes; in fact (though it requires some moral courage to avow it), we prefer that our fathers, brothers, uncles, and cousins should attend to affairs of state unassisted by our maiden aunts.

Some friends, and neighbours too (of a very old-fashioned type, no doubt), were "shocked" that we should venture forth alone, especially into an unbeaten track in Brittany. What added to our perversity was the fact (patent to all) that we each possessed a brother, either or both of whom could have been laid under requisition to escort us. There was, however, an objection to this plan sufficient for us; we wished to sketch, and no one could sketch with a brother wandering round.

There are two sides to every question, often many more; we left our friends to discuss the theoretic side of this one, from their armchairs, while we put the practical side to the test of experience.

Having now returned safely, I do not mind confessing that it was not without some trepidation I abandoned myself to the adventure. Ruth sent me the papers which had roused her to such a pitch of enthusiasm about Brittany that no other place would do. They had the contrary effect on me. I noticed how the writers concurred in describing a grey and sombre landscape, men in keeping with it, melancholy, silent, unkind to animals, tyrannical to their wives, generally drunk; women, picturesque indeed, but dirty and superstitious; a pitiless sea and rock-bound coast; islands inhabited by the widows and children of seamen. And (most important to us) accommodation of a very rustic kind. One writer artlessly alluded to wolves which were held responsible for the disappearance of sheep dogs, and to a shrieking maniac who wandered at will among the Menhirs.

In the state between sleeping and waking, I had awful visions of two errant ladies driving towards nightfall on a lonely road—a wheel coming off, the driver, their only knight, riding to the nearest village for help, but stopping to drink, and wolves howling in the distance. However, my friend was firm, so I agreed (altering the historical order of things) to act Naomi to her Ruth, and to follow where she led; but I insisted that in compensation for the dangers and horrors of the long crossing to St. Malo, we should at least visit the Channel Islands in passing.

The first incident of our travels occurred at a London station, where Ruth, whose honesty I had never had reason to doubt, persisted in claiming a portmanteau which was not hers, and in the heat of the argument unconsciously appropriating an umbrella which its owner laid across it. Apparently nothing but the sudden appearance of her own possessions would have made her relinquish her claim. I was prepared to run the risk of being imprisoned for sketching abroad, but did not expect to have such a narrow escape on our native soil.

We went on board the Guernsey boat at Southampton at 10 p.m., and owing to a fog did not get through Southampton Water before 5 a.m. Dr. Watts must have been there in better weather when he wrote those familiar lines—

"Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood Stand dressed in living green."

We were inclined to exclaim with the philosopher, "Life would be endurable but for its pleasures," as hour after hour passed in this snail's progress, while the dismal fog-horn sounded incessantly.

We reached Guernsey at last, eight hours late, and soon forgot our trials. "Every cloud has a silver lining," and when there is a fog at sea it is never rough.

The week spent at Guernsey seemed all too short, there is such freshness and originality about the place that one never tires of the quaint old town with its red roofs, tall spires, steep, irregular streets, and luxuriant semi-tropical vegetation. Among a population speaking French patois, it was strange to see groups of soldiers belonging to our Highland regiments.

Moulin Huet is one of the most charming bays, approached by a lovely water-lane, over-arched with trees and green with ferns. Round one side of the bay curve the jagged Hen and Chicken rocks; the fine white sand is delightful for bathers, who make dressing-rooms of the caves and rocky nooks.

Victor Hugo's house is one of the sights of Guernsey. His daughter-in-law (now married a second time) and his two grandchildren live in it, and allow visitors to see it every day. The walls are hung with tapestry, and the ceilings and banisters are covered with textures, giving a feeling of suffocation. The general effect is very harmonious, especially one bedroom which was prepared for the reception of Garibaldi. The study at the top of the house is not unlike a photographic studio, the roof and sides being partly glass. The view is fine and extensive, and mirrors are placed so as to reflect it, in case the occupant's back should be turned to the scene itself. It seems the last room in the world for concentration of thought. M. Hugo always wrote standing; immediately outside is a wooden gallery on which he often took exercise. His bedroom had a kind of letter-box in the door, in which he placed thoughts committed to paper during the night. His bed was a thick mattress placed on the floor across the end of the small room, the wall close round it being padded; it was more like a settee without legs than a bed. M. Hugo is said to have gone often at night to a lonely house on the coast in order to write "The Toilers of the Sea."

There is plenty of scope for sketching at Guernsey, in the changing scenes in the harbour, the picturesque disused forts, and the play of light and shade on the sea and islands.

In point of colour Sark is better still; the water in the harbour is of that lovely green seen off some parts of the Cornish coast, the seaweed on the rocks is of the richest yellow; boats are drawn up on the shore, or idly riding at anchor; while picturesque fishermen, speaking a strange tongue, hurry along the quay on the approach of the steamer.

We felt that a visit to the Channel Islands was an opportunity, not to be lost, of studying Free Trade and Home Rule on the spot. We came to the conclusion that some things may be too cheap, such as stimulants and tobacco, for drunkenness is very common, and small boys smoke cigars. Home Rule seems to answer very well, for only one man appears to have been hanged in historic times, and we were constantly assured no serious crimes are committed. When an offender is convicted he is generally fined, as it is expensive to the community for him to go to prison, as he requires to be fed, and his guardians to be fed and paid.

They have, we were told, no receipt stamps, no dog-tax, no income-tax, no divorce in the Channel Islands; they make their own laws, and their system of land tenure is almost perfect. Hothouse grapes are 8d. per pound, good tea 1s. 6d. per pound. A man may live on the fat of the land at the best hotel for 8s. per day.

In Sark, things are still more Arcadian; there are no policemen there, but from among the inhabitants two constables are selected to serve two years. We had a long talk with an elderly man of whom we bought photographs. He told us how Sark was sold for fifty pounds in Elizabeth's reign, to its first owner, who, in order to protect his property, invited forty men to come and settle there, on condition of each providing himself with a gun and ammunition. The island has changed hands many times since—much of the land has become freehold, but there is still a titular owner called the Seigneur. One of the owners, finding himself in difficulties for ready money on his father's death, resolved to sell the place, ungratefully refusing the offer of two maiden aunts to pay the necessary sum—the condition being that he should reside with them. He was evidently considered a very sad character for abandoning his inheritance in favour of life at such a gay capital as St. Heliers.

There are some curious laws in Sark. For trespassing on property, whether harm is done or not, a fine may be imposed of about 3s. 4d. for each offence. Some tourists found themselves in an awkward dilemma, who trampled on a man's wheat, and when remonstrated with used their canes. After this valiant escapade they proceeded in triumph to the smaller island, which is attached to the larger one by a narrow precipitous isthmus. On their return they were met at this critical point by the two constables, who refused to let them embark until the man was compensated for the five-fold trespass and the assault. On their refusal to pay, preparations were made for opening the prison. Meanwhile it was discovered that the seneschal had gone over to Herm, whence he might return, weather permitting, in the course of a week. As until his arrival our heroes could not be tried (there being apparently no Habeas Corpus Act in Arcadia), they decided, rather late in the day, that "discretion is the better part of valour," and having paid their money, departed, wiser if sadder men.

Let no one suppose that a dweller in Sark is a man of few ideas, whose mental horizon does not extend beyond the limits of his rock-bound coast. For my part, I have never found that people living a natural primitive life, "far from the madding crowd," are specially narrow in their views, though they may be behind the age as to the latest Paris fashion and the latest novel.

Perhaps they have more leisure to cultivate "the inward eye, which is the bliss of solitude," than those of us who live in provincial towns and "genteel suburbs," and who unwittingly become slaves of the conventional and commonplace.

Our friend, who was descended from two of the first inhabitants of Sark, was thoughtful and intelligent, and a man of means in his way. Every year he and his wife travel. It was interesting to hear their impressions of the Fisheries, Healtheries, Colinderies, of St. Malo, Paris, and Switzerland. He was a little bit of a wag too. One day out walking he met a man who said—"Tell me, do these islands belong to England?" "No," was the reply.

"To France?" "Certainly not." "To whom, then?" "To no one; England belongs to us. We were part of the Duchy of Normandy when William Conquered England."

After visiting the lovely Seigneurie Gardens, we were fain to bid good-bye to Sark. It was rather rough on the return journey, and the straits between the jagged rocks which bristle all round these islands seemed very narrow.

We crossed to Jersey on a Tuesday (no boat goes that way on a Monday), and having heard so much in disparagement of that island as compared with Guernsey, we were agreeably surprised. The air is, doubtless, less bracing, and the scenery less varied. The railway line runs partly round the island, just at the edge of the sea. Apropos of our thirst for knowledge on the subject of Home Rule, we asked if the "Clameur de Haro" still survived. According to this custom, a man who had been wronged fell down in a public place, and cried, "Haro, haro, à l'aide mon prince, on me fait tort," upon which redress was speedily forthcoming. We were told that the last recorded instance was on the opening of the Jersey railway, when an enraged landowner threw himself on the metals, with the usual formula. Deaf to his cries, the train came steadily on. Strange things flash through the minds of drowning men, and he may have remembered that George Stephenson, when asked what would happen if a cow got on the line, replied, "It would be bad for the cow." Anyhow, the train went on, and we did not hear that this gentleman's remains were picked up in fragments afterwards. Our stay in Jersey was so short there was no opportunity of verifying this incident.

We went by train to Goray, and sketched Mount Orgeuil, an ancient Norman fortress. Fort Elizabeth, with its winding causeway, visible at low tide, is a most interesting object from St. Heliers.

The steamer in which we crossed to St. Malo had few English people on board. We watched with great interest a party of priests, who, from the faultlessness of their attire, appeared to be returning from a holiday expedition. We wondered at the unceasing talk and vivacity of a French party opposite. If only we could hear their conversation, how witty and full of bon mots it must be to cause such unceasing laughter, to require such gesticulation and shrugs! But would they never be tired, never want to rest and be quiet? It would certainly give most English people a headache to talk and laugh so vigorously for a whole three hours' journey. It spite of these foretastes of foreign life, we were sufficiently delighted and surprised when we steamed into St. Malo harbour. That ancient town is in no sense Anglicised by the constant arrival of steamers and the incursion of British tourists. We quite understood Horace Walpole's remark, after months of travel in Italy, "That Calais surprised him more than anything he had yet seen, and he still considered it the most wonderful city in the world."

We almost forgave the sour-faced woman from the custom-house, who pounced upon our travelling bags, for the sake of the white cap she wore. The blue-bloused men might hector over us as only French officials can, but we still gazed admiringly at them, and wished English porters were as picturesque.

Groups of soldiers dotted here and there reminded us irresistibly of the little tin soldiers of our childhood; but this probably implied no insult, but that truest form of flattery—imitation. Doubtless our climate and our smoke make the snowy headgear and bright colours of "Sunny France" unsuitable apparel for us, but certainly the first charm of a continental town is the difference of dress.

St. Malo is really an island, but is now connected with the land by a long causeway, called the Sillon. There is a splendid natural harbour, caused by its projection on the one hand, and that of St. Servan on the other, and several islands lie near, one being the lonely burial-place chosen by Châteaubriand.

The streets are narrow, and the houses have grown very tall in their efforts to look over the huge fortified walls which run all round the town. There could scarcely be a better specimen of a town of the Middle Ages.

We watched the bathers next morning, and were greatly amused with one party, consisting of an elderly monsieur, madame his wife, two big boys, a little girl, and a large dog; they all gambolled about in the water with infantine glee. Their costumes were elaborate, the lady wearing bracelets and earrings and having her hair fully dressed.

At twelve o'clock we sailed up the Rance to Dinan, gradually losing sight of the strong walls of St. Malo (which rise sheer from the water's edge), of the rocky islands in the delicate pale green bay, and of the blue line of the open sea, with the flash of white sails in the sunlight.

We were on the scene of one of Mr. Browning's most dramatic poems.

It was in 1692 that twenty-two French ships of war, headed by the "Formidable," were chased by the English into St. Malo Roads. It was declared impossible, at ebb of tide, to pilot the squadron into the fortified harbour of Solidor, until a "simple Breton sailor, a poor coasting pilot," Hervé Riel, undertook the task and did it. For thus saving the honour of France he was told to name his own reward—

"Demand whate'er you will,
France remains your debtor still."
Then a beam of fun outbroke
On the bearded mouth that spoke,
As the honest heart laughed through Those frank eyes of Breton blue:
'Since I needs must say my say,
Since on board the duty's done,
And from Malo Roads to Croisie Point, what is it but a run?
Since 'tis ask and have I may—
Since the others go ashore—
Come! A good whole holiday!
Leave to go and see my wife, whom I call the Belle Aurore!
That he asked, and that he got—nothing more."

The boats go up with the tide, but in order to leave time for the return journey they start before the river is full. Our steamer had to thread its way through such a narrow channel, among sand-banks, that we expected every moment to go aground. However, just as things seemed at the worst we came to a lock, and above that the river was full, and we went merrily along.

The banks grew steeper and more wooded every moment, till Dinan suddenly appeared in view, the spire of St. Sauveur church crowning the precipitous hillside, a noble viaduct spanning the valley, and a fine old Norman bridge crossing the river.

A few houses nestle in the valley and climb up the steep and narrow Rue de Jersual, the joy of artists, but the principal part of the town is high up, out of sight.

Never did we hear such a babel of voices as greeted our arrival, scores of people vociferating and shouting, and trying to take possession of us and our luggage. Happily we had decided on our quarters, which proved very comfortable (Miss Waller's pension, 4, Place du Guesclin).

At Dinan we first came across two historical personages who are so identified with the history of Brittany that they reappear at almost every turn.

First in point of time, though not of rank, is Bertrand du Guesclin, a man deformed in person, but nevertheless one of the most consummate generals and ablest men of the fourteenth century.

After being once or twice made prisoner by the English, he became Constable of France, and succeeded in driving the English from Normandy, Guienne, and Poitou. At Dinan his statue is erected on the spot where he defeated an English knight in single combat; it also commemorates his successful defence of the town against the Duke of Lancaster. His enemies recognised in him "a foeman worthy of their steel," for when he died of fever while besieging the Castle of Randon, the governor insisted on fulfilling his promise to capitulate (failing succour) on a fixed day. Declaring he would be as true to the warrior in death as in life, he marched, followed by the garrison, to the French camp, and placed the keys of the Castle upon his bier. Du Guesclin taught his soldiers never to treat priests, women, and children as enemies. Charles V. placed a magnificent monument to his memory in St. Denis, where his body was laid among those of kings. A lamp is said to have been kept burning there for centuries.

The second historical figure is that of Anne of Brittany, who might have been so much happier without her title of Duchess and her great possessions. The Dukedom of Brittany had its golden age under her father, Francis II., but when he died and a girl of thirteen succeeded, she became the innocent object of the greed of surrounding nations.

Certain sovereigns, regardless of previous ties, were anxious to marry her, while others, unable to appropriate her themselves, were determined Brittany should not be absorbed. The first person to cast envious eyes was the Duke of Orleans, who was married to Louis XI.'s deformed daughter, of whom he was heartily tired.

In the midst of the dispute Anne was married, by proxy, to Maximilian, the Holy Roman Emperor, whose daughter had come to France as the affianced bride of the young King Charles VIII. The virtual ruler of France was the Lady of Beaujeu, Louis XI.'s eldest daughter. Seeing the importance of absorbing Brittany, she determined that her young brother, Charles VIII., should disregard his previous contract with Margaret, and marry the Duchess Anne. So he was sent with an army to lay siege to the town of Rennes, where she held her court.

Maximilian, too poor or too indolent to avenge the double insult, did nothing, and although our Henry VII. taxed his subjects in order to defend Anne, whose father had sheltered him in exile, he did nothing effectual, except hoard the money.

The Bretons having stipulated for the preservation of their own laws and privileges, were eager for the match, and at length the marriage took place in 1491. Surely,

"Never was woman in such humour woo'd, Never in such humour won."

In the course of seven years Charles died, and was succeeded by the aforementioned Duke of Orleans, as Louis XII., who lost no time in divorcing his unfortunate wife Joan, and in laying his crown at the feet of the young widowed queen, who had retired to Brittany. In the year 1499 she once more became Queen of France, being married to Louis XII. in the Château at Nantes. She died fifteen years later, leaving two daughters, one of whom married her cousin, the Duc d'Angoulême, afterwards Francis I.

Violins

AND MITTENWALD.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER I.

"And give to rapture all thy trembling strings."

As my interest in violins and acquaintance with their make and makers commenced with my visit to Mittenwald, I should like, by way of preface, to give a little sketch of the old town and how I reached it.

To the tourist who keeps to the beaten tracks the very name of Mittenwald is unknown; and Bradshaw, who is supposed to have eyes for everything and every place of interest, only mentions it once, and then merely to state that the diligence goes twice in the twenty-four hours between Murnau and Mittenwald—a piece of information which falls flat, as few among us know either of these places; yet Mittenwald was not always so unknown.

It has a past of which few towns can boast; one which dates back to the time of the Romans, who, with their legions, made this their halting-place when on their way to their seats on the Danube—a past which saw and entertained armies of Germans and their kings as they went to Rome to be crowned—a past which in the Middle Ages witnessed caravans of Italian and German merchants with their pack horses and conveyances travelling between Italy and Germany.

In these bygone days it not infrequently happened that large waggons laden with most precious goods, and drawn by four or eight horses, arrived in such numbers from Venice, Trieste, Bozen, Nürnberg, Augsburg and other places, that the streets of Mittenwald could scarcely contain them.

In addition to these might have been seen all the year round in the streets, men having in charge twenty or more horses, whose business it was to transport merchandise and to supply extra horses for conveyances over the mountains.

These men formed themselves into a corporation called the Rott, and together with the Raft Corporation became a powerful influence in the town, where they had the monopoly of transport both by road and river (Isar). The chief street is still called the Rottstrasse.

This town reached the highest point of its prosperity when in the year 1487 it secured the right of holding the annual fairs hitherto held in Bozen. It grew rapidly and fitted up houses and factories for receiving and depositing goods. It built hotels, large coach houses, yards and stables for the accommodation of strangers.

The warehouses were stocked with treasures and spices from the Levant, with jewels and trinkets from Venice, and with tapestry, fancy goods, and raw products from the German market. But even more varied than the goods in the warehouses was the life lived within the town during the time of the fairs. Noble merchants from the north and from the south arrived here on richly caparisoned horses, accompanied by their footmen and servants. Smaller traders came in from north and south on foot, carrying their wares on their backs, rich drivers and rough porters, officials of the Rott and Raft Corporation, riding and walking messengers, pious pilgrims all astray in the confusion while seeking their way to the church, the musicians pouring forth their joyous strains in the front of the hotels. What a picture it made, and what a contrast to the present!

For a hundred and ninety two years these fairs brought prosperity to Mittenwald and the neighbouring towns of Partenkirchen and Ammergau, and when they ceased to be held here all this prosperity, life, vigour, and joyousness gave place to an almost gloomy quietude.

But although its glory departed with its fairs more than two hundred years ago, it could not be deprived of its beautiful situation, its quaint streets and houses, its magnificent mountains, its gay and dancing river, its beautiful flora, its interesting people, its traditions and superstitions—all these remain yet to delight those who are able to visit the place.

There is no gloom or dullness there now, for it is the centre of an industry which brings it into communication with the whole world, and that is the making of violins and other stringed instruments.

The changes which steam and rail have wrought in Europe generally have not touched this place, and the influence, anything but good, which has been exercised by the tourist class in Switzerland and elsewhere has not yet found its way here; indeed, so little is known of Mittenwald and how to get to it, that I will tell how we got there and at what expense.

We left Munich at half-past ten in the morning, taking our tickets to Murnau, a distance of fifty-one miles, for which we paid four shillings and a penny each, second class, and nine shillings for luggage, not a pound of which is free in Bavaria, and arrived at our destination at two o'clock.

The train moved so slowly that we were almost inclined to believe what we had heard, viz., that beggars often walked by the side of it collecting alms.

We passed through the little village of Gauting, with its two churches close together and exactly alike, about which the story is told that the pastor and his flock having disagreed, he lost his position, and with his own means built a second church precisely like the first, where he continued to preach for the rest of his life. A second story runs that last year a gentleman came to Gauting for rest and quiet after having been under treatment for a disease of the eye which caused him to see double, and of which he considered himself quite cured. The first thing he saw on leaving the station was these two churches, and in despair he returned the way he came, believing that his malady must be incurable, as he still saw double.

Then we passed Mühl, a short distance from which King Pepin used to hold his court. It was to Mühl that his affianced bride was to be sent, but the miller's wife in this village was ambitious, and conceived the idea of becoming mother-in-law to the King. So giving instructions to her husband and his man to waylay the coming bride and kill her, she substituted her own daughter, who bore a strong likeness to the princess. The men were more merciful than the woman, and instead of killing the poor lady they let her loose in the woods, bringing home a roebuck's tongue as a proof of her death.

The miller's daughter was married to King Pepin and all went well for a year. At the end of that time the king, while hunting, was benighted at the mill, and one of the courtiers discovered the real princess hiding among the flour sacks. She showed proof of her identity, and the miller's wife was forced to confess her guilt.

Her husband had already died of remorse, but she and the false queen were put into tubs full of nails and rolled down into the river, and the king married the persecuted princess, who became the mother of Charlemagne.

We had several good views of the Star-berger sea also, as we moved slowly along.

At length we reached Murnau, where at the Hotel Post we obtained a sledge. We were to have had a grand one, all red velvet and blue tassels, which had belonged to the late King Ludwig, but our boxes were too big, and we occupied therefore a humbler one with two horses and a good coachman, and started off to the merry music of sleigh-bells.

What a delightful sensation it was as we flew along in the clear air through fir forests and picturesque villages, with the white, pure snow glistening in the sunlight!

We went to Partenkirchen without pause. Here we changed sledge and coachman, and well wrapped up we again went out into the cold, fresh air and made our way to Mittenwald. It was like travelling in fairyland, so beautiful was the effect of the bright moonlight on the snow.

For these two sledges we paid thirty-seven shillings, and the journey between the two places took six hours. This can be done at a fourth of the expense if the post omnibus be made use of; but then it is of course nothing like so pleasant as one's own carriage or sledge.

We were glad to find our rooms ready for us, a splendid wood fire and a bright lamp burning, as we entered the Hotel Post a little tired and cold. The recollection of this hotel and the kindness and unbounded hospitality of host and hostess will be always one of the pleasantest in this very pleasant journey.

It had been so long our earnest desire to see this old town, and so many had been the pictures we had drawn of it in our imagination, that there was great danger of the reality falling short of our expectations.

Fortunately for us it stood the test. Its situation is exquisite. Standing high up in the southern Alps of Bavaria, almost midway between Munich and Innsbruck, it is overlooked and guarded by the magnificent rocky walls of the Karwendel and Wetterstein mountains, 3,000 feet above the level of the sea—mountains which hold their icy sceptre at least three parts of every year.

The Isar, as it flows rapidly on from its mountain home by the foot of the Karwendel, adds not a little to the beauty and brightness of the scene. The quaint and frescoed houses, the fountains and running streams in the centre of the streets, the beautiful old church, the kind and hospitable people—all make such a charming whole that no wonder the few who know it go again and again to renew their pleasure in the old-fashioned picturesque town of Mittenwald.

There are lovely wooded walks, too, in every direction; the edelweiss grows in abundance on the mountains, and many lovely flowers are to be found here which are not met with elsewhere. It is a wonderful, but by no means disagreeable mixture of an old south German commercial town and an agricultural village.

The entrance to the houses is by large arched gates, similar to those one sees in Nürnberg; and on the walls of the houses are marvellous frescoes, with colours rich and good as when 300 years ago they were painted. Take it altogether, one can scarcely go to a place more full of stirring recollections, more beautiful in its situation, or less spoiled by modern progress.

The inhabitants are scarcely less interesting than the place. They are original, independent, lovers of freedom, and endowed with a taste for the fine arts. You have only to show yourself an artist or a musician, to be honoured and taken to their hearts at once; they are kind and trusting to strangers; they are full of romance and poetic feeling, and it is rare, indeed, to find a thief and a liar among them.

One feels sorry that they should have given up their former picturesque costumes; they are a handsome race of people, and the ordinary modern dress is not suitable. They, in common with their neighbours in Ober-Ammergau, possess an innate talent for theatrical representations; and although public acting is gradually dying out among them, they still indulge in it in their homes on winter evenings. They are a very religious people; their church is beautiful and well endowed. We were present at the Sunday afternoon service, at which the old and venerable pastor catechised the young men and women of his flock.

It seemed to us as though every house must have been left empty during the service; old and young came pouring out of the big portals in such numbers, all wending their way to the church, in which there was soon not even standing room.

After a short, earnest service the young men and women quietly stood up to be catechised in Bible history, and to receive a short address on their daily duties. There was no false shame—it was evidently a time-honoured practice, and I could not help thinking a good one also. The pastor was like a father among his children, knowing them all by name. It is easy to see that religion is a very important factor in their lives, their very amusements are bound up with it: take for example the Passion Play. It is easy to understand that in a place such as this, with its old world history, its mountains, its woods, its joyous streams, there would be an abundance of legends, superstitions, and old customs, and this being so we should not represent either people or place correctly if we omitted to mention some of these.

There is a strong belief among the people that great treasures are hidden away in the Karwendel, and jealously guarded by mountain spirits and gnomes; and it is further believed that a number of people, on account of the misuse of their riches in this world, or because of their miserliness, are banished with their treasures to the inner part of this wonderful mountain, and are allowed only now and then to revisit the upper world to look for men who will redeem them from their unhappy condition.

The legend which you hear from everyone is about a beautiful lady (called the Erzfräulein), who has been for hundreds of years bewitched and kept prisoner by the king of the gnomes. She is said to live in a crystal palace, deep down in the heart of the mountain, which is fitted up with indescribable treasures, and before which the waves of a fiery lake move hither and thither. The entrance to the palace is guarded by terrible dragons. Whoever will release the lady from her condition is to be rewarded by all the treasures with which she is surrounded.

It is said that she shows herself now and then to children, sometimes even to grown-up people, who may chance to be gathering wood or plucking berries in the neighbourhood of the mountain. She wears a mediæval dress, such as was customary for noble ladies, and on a girdle, sparkling with gold and jewels, hangs a reticule. She is wonderfully beautiful, but her pale face and attitude show great sorrow. If she sees a child, or anyone of a pure heart, she beckons to them with sorrowful gesture that they should follow and enter her palace. Many have made the attempt to follow, but the dragons which watch the entrance vomit flame and fire upon them. Those who desire to enter—so say the people—must mark their forehead with the sign of the cross, must keep silence, and in spite of terrors and dangers which meet them on the way, they must silently proceed, nor must they let any sign of fear escape them. If they succeed in this the monsters and their flames will have no power over them, and they will step unharmed into the palace.

Here they will find a magic sword, with which to conquer the dragons, and the lady will be set free from the ban.

Up to this time no one has succeeded in the enterprise; the lady still waits to be freed, and still is to be observed near the mountain, where also a fiery wheel may be seen rolling rapidly round, and where also ghastly owls of an unnatural size congregate, and in the summer nights make such an awful screech that they can be heard for miles.

Other legends there are concerning the Isar, which seems always to have had more or less of gold in its sand. This seems to have been well known to the Venetians, who in centuries gone by used to come each year for it, building their huts beside a brook which flows into the Isar at Mittenwald. Here they industriously washed the sand and found for their pains many nuggets of gold.

The legend runs that a shepherd boy, sitting beside a fountain in the street of Mittenwald, watched the sparkling water till all at once he observed glittering little balls come tumbling out of the fountain in great numbers. He put his hand in, and filled his cap up to the brim with them. On showing them to the people they declared the balls to be of pure gold. They searched the place where the boy had found them, but could discover nothing but sand—the envious mountain nixes had shut up the gold fountain.

One more legend, and I have done. There was once a grasping man in the community, who tried to increase his land by removing the boundary stones back on to his neighbour's property. As a punishment for this he has been compelled to keep nightly watch as a ghost, and patrol his fields. He is said to carry his head under his arm, and will never attain to rest and sanctity. We did not see this apparition, but were assured there were old people living who had.

We remained in this romantic and beautiful old town till we had learned the history of the violin, from the time it was a child in the forest until, a thing of perfect beauty and symmetry, it waited quietly for the master-hand to draw forth its sweet enchanting sounds.

We have told how we reached Mittenwald, and of our delightful sojourn there. We left it one clear frosty morning, at nine o'clock, amid the kind wishes and regrets of host and hostess. The sledge and a pair of horses were at the door to convey us to Innsbruck, a journey of thirty-two miles.

What a journey it was! One more beautiful we never made. Imagine us speeding away, unaccompanied by any sound save that of the sleigh bells, through fairy forests and between majestic mountains, with the Karwendel ever raising its snow-white sparkling head into the intensely blue sky as the king of all!

As to us, we looked like a couple of elderly fairies, when at two o'clock we drew up at the Tiroler Hof Innsbruck, all frosted over, our garments an ashy-grey, and our breath frozen on to our veils into a stiff sheet of ice; but a good meal and warm fire soon made all right. The journey, everything included, between Mittenwald and Innsbruck cost us two pounds.

In our next chapter we hope to tell you about the violins of Mittenwald.

EATING RUE PIE.

A SHORT STORY FOR WORKING GIRLS.

By RUTH LAMB.

CHAPTER II.

MILLY felt the wisdom of her mother's words, and in addition to these the lesson of her own home life had not been lost upon her. She had seen for herself that each day brought its struggle. There was not one without, though on some days it was harder than on others. Memory showed the girl all sorts of home trials, and compelled her to own that her mother's married life, begun so much too soon, had been one of incessant toil.

Ignorance, and want of domestic experience at the outset, had made it much harder still; for the mill hand of sixteen years old knew nothing of household work. She had begun with all to learn, and she had no one to teach her, not even her own mother, for Burton's work lay far from the neighbourhood where, during a short visit, he met his girl-wife.

The result had been a poor, slipshod, hand-to-mouth state of things, amid which the troop of children were growing up somehow, but with little more of training than their mother had to begin with.

Milly was the eldest living. A hard-working lass, with her mother's loving heart and a great deep sense of her own ignorance, together with a longing hope that her married life should not be a repetition of what she saw and grieved over at home.

She was sorely tried between her own convictions, seconded by her mother's advice on the one hand, and Dick's anxiety to be married on the other. She was afraid to make him angry by a direct "No," when he talked of a wedding in three months' time. She loved him truly, but with a more reasonable, self-sacrificing affection than Dick's for herself.

He, poor fellow! thought that he was considering Milly above everything else in wishing to devote his earnings to make her comfortable, and planning to take her right away from the place she called "home," but which was so different from the tidy, well-ordered cottage where his life had been spent.

Two months passed all too quickly, and Dick kept urging Milly to make up her mind.

"There are two plans to choose between," he said. "I believe, if we do marry, mother would let us live with her. She has no daughter, and she would treat you as if you were hers, for my sake, though she likes you for your own too. She could teach you everything, for she is a rare fine housekeeper, seeing she was in service and in good places for fourteen years."

"She didn't get married whilst she was a girl in her teens," said Milly archly, and looking up with a smile into Dick's face.

"Maybe she hadn't a chance," he replied, feeling that he had given an argument against such an early marriage, when he was pleading for it in his own case.

"That is not likely, Richard. You have only to look at her face and notice her ways to be sure that your mother was a treasure that plenty would have been glad to get for themselves."

"The other plan is for me to take my bit of money out of the bank, and furnish two little rooms to start in. Two rooms for two folks would be plenty," said Richard, not choosing to answer Milly more directly.

"Dick," said the girl, "you know how I care for you, and how sorry I am to vex you in any way. But I do feel how much better it would be for us to wait two or three years yet, before we get married. You would be able to save a bit more, in case of slack work or anything that might stop your wages, and I should be learning things that would make me a better wife. I would ask your mother to teach me what mine cannot, for she never had such training; and when she says that I am fit to get married, I will not keep you waiting any longer. You are made so comfortable now, that I feel quite afraid when I think how little I can do outside the mill. Dick, dear, take your mother's advice, and do believe that I only want what is best for you. If I thought about myself only, I could be very glad to get right away from my home. There is little comfort in it. You know that."

Dick could not answer the gentle pleading words with angry ones, or shake off the hand that rested so trustfully on his arm. He heard how Milly's voice trembled, and he caught the sound of a sob as she finished.

He never doubted her affection for himself, and, well! he felt there was only one girl in the world for him. But none the less he had set his mind on marrying as soon as he could earn a pound a week, and could ill endure contradiction.

He restrained himself so far that he did not answer sharply, but he did what was to tender-hearted Milly almost as bad. He looked displeased and said nothing, but walked on in sullen silence.

Milly broke it by saying in a trembling voice—

"Richard, when we were little things, we always came from school together, for I had to pass your house on the way home. Do you remember what you used to talk about?"

Richard would not speak, but the girl continued, "It was always about your mother, how good she was, and how clever. When we got to the door, I used to think the place looked just lovely. Things were always in their right corners, and yet they made you feel comfortable when you peeped in. I don't think many grand people, who have servants to do for them, have brighter firesides in winter time, or more sunshine in their big rooms than came through the clear, clean window to light up your mother's little ones. There were always plants for the sun to peep in at, flowers in summer, and something green in winter, making the prettiest shade, instead of a white curtain to the window. And the dinner table! It looked fit for gentlefolks, with its smooth white cloth, bright knives and forks, and little glass things on it fairly shining with the clearness that came of cleanliness. I have heard your mother say that cleanliness and order are not only pleasanter, but cheaper than dirt and disorder. That it is through your things being neglected and out of their proper places, that they are worn out and broken in half the time. And she says too, and has proved it, that it is as easy to have pretty things about you as ugly ones, for they cost no more except a little extra care in choosing, instead of taking whatever comes to hand that will do for the time. You have heard your mother say all this, Richard, haven't you?"

"Of course I have; but what has it to do with our getting married in a month?" said Richard.

"A great deal. Oh, Richard, when I used to see the table you would get your dinner off, and then think of the one at our house, I used to cry. I knew there would be dirty crockery from breakfast, and either no cloth at all, or one with stains and crumbs on it, for sometimes it went for days without being shaken. It seemed as if it just stayed there until it was quite too dirty for even us children. And the house was very seldom quiet, what with the little ones being cross or getting into mischief, or father would be vexed because dinner was not ready in time, and scolding mother. We children had things anyhow. We were glad to get out again as soon as possible, and we just ate a bit as we stood, or took some food in our hands and ran off to school, neither fed nor tidied as we ought to have been. As soon as I was old enough, I went to the mill to earn a little towards my living. I have done what I could at home, but I know so little. I can see how different your mother's ways are, but I cannot do things as she does. I am very willing to learn."

Here Richard interrupted Milly by saying in an impatient tone, "Where's the good of telling all this over again? Don't I know it already as well as you?"

"I thought so about the old days when we were little ones together, and how I felt then. I wanted to bring them back, just to put you in mind how differently we had been brought up. Not as an excuse for my being so ignorant, but to show you that I ought to learn better things and ways before we get married, then I can begin right and make you comfortable."

"And how could you make a better start than with my mother, if she will let us live with her for a while?"

"I scarcely think she would like it, Dick, though I am quite sure she would let me come backwards and forwards beforehand, and teach me all I want to know."

"Now, Milly, you may as well tell what is in your mind. It is not mother, but you who do not want us all to live together. I know how it is. You are like the rest of girls, and think that a mother-in-law will be always spying after you and fault-finding. Mine is not that sort, and I thought you knew her better."

Milly was really distressed at these words, for they were unjust. The tears streamed down her cheeks, for she was a tender, loving-hearted young creature, simple-minded and true. She could honestly say that the thoughts of which Richard accused her had never entered her mind. She did say so, when she could steady her voice sufficiently, and she added, "There is nobody in the whole world that I respect and look up to as I do to your mother. It is because she is so nice and good that I want to be like her for your sake."

Richard believed Milly. He could not help it, and he was half ashamed of his ill-temper and injustice, though as little inclined to give in as ever with regard to a speedy marriage.

"If you mean what you say then, Milly, you will be only too glad to come to mother if she is willing to have you. The sooner you are away from the old home and ways, the more time you will have to get used to better ones. I shall have a talk with mother to-night, and she must settle whether we make a start along with her, or in a little place of our own."

"Richard, you must not spend the few pounds it has taken you years to save. If you do there will be nothing for a rainy day. We can well afford to wait, and now I am getting good wages for a girl, I can save something too. It would be best to put down on paper what we shall want. Your mother will help us, and then we can take time and look about, buying the things one at a time, as we get the money together for it. I've often thought that poor folks who have to save and contrive for getting their furniture together, seem to value every bit and to care for it as people never can who have fine houses, full of beautiful things all ready to go to."

"I would be well satisfied if anybody would give me a nice house all ready to go into and take you to, Milly," replied Dick. "I would not say, 'No, thank you,' to an offer like that."

The very idea of such a chance made Richard laugh, and Milly laughed for company, but when they parted, the girl, though silenced, was no more convinced than before that it would be wise for a couple so young as Dick and herself to enter upon the solemn responsibilities of married life. She hoped much from the talk with Mrs. Beckett, who would, she felt sure, take sides with herself rather than with Richard, dear as he was to her motherly heart.

USEFUL HINTS.

SHORTBREAD.

Put one pound and a quarter of butter in a pan, and then add one pound of loaf sugar dust; mix them well together, and then add four eggs; mix well in as before, then add two pounds of flour, then roll the dough out, and cut them to the size you want them; put a piece of peel on the top.

MADEIRA CAKES.

Put one pound of eggs in a pan, and add one pound of loaf sugar dust; beat all together with a whisk till it gets a little thick, then add one pound of flour; mix it in lightly with your hand; add one or two drops of essence of lemon; put white paper round, and bottom of the tins or hoops, then lay one or two pieces of peel and a few currants at the bottom.

TEA MILK SCONES.

Take two pounds of flour, add five ounces of butter; rub it in as small as possible, then add half ounce of carbonate of soda and quarter of an ounce of tartaric acid; rub them well in the flour, then quarter of a pound of loaf sugar dust, and quarter of a pound of currants; rub them in as before, add about half a pint of milk; then mix it, roll the dough out and fold it over two or three times, and then cut them to the size you want them.

JUBILEE POUND CAKE.

Take two pounds and a quarter of flour, then add half a pound of butter; rub it in the flour very fine, add also one ounce of carbonate of soda and half an ounce of tartaric acid; rub them in the flour as fine as possible, then add one pound of sugar and two pounds of currants, and rub them in the flour as before, and two ounces of mixed peel; then add a pint and a half of milk and eight eggs, two or three drops of essence of lemon; mix them.

LARDED TEA CAKES.

Take one pound of flour, six ounces of lard; rub it well in the flour, then add two ounces of loaf sugar dust; mix it in as before, then half a pint of milk; make it into a dough, then roll it out and fold it three or four times, and cut them to the size you would like them.

PIANOFORTE DUET PLAYING.

N this article I propose to give a slight account of the beautiful school of art which exists in this form, and which, for some unaccountable reason, has been so strangely neglected. The position of the players may, perhaps, have something to do with this, being to some eyes rather constrained; but two performers accustomed to play duets constantly, would, in the course of a short space of time, naturally assume a more convenient and graceful attitude than a couple of players associated together for one or two performances at a concert, who, perhaps, have never played with each other before, and who, possibly, may not do so again.

I do not think I am likely to be contradicted when I assert that (in England at any rate) there is a lamentable ignorance among professors and amateurs of the many masterpieces which have been composed in this form.

I propose calling attention to these works under different headings, as follows:—

1. Sonatas. 2. Pieces in Classic Form.
3. Variations, Transcriptions, Fantasias; and
4. Arrangements.

These last named do not properly belong to the piano at all, but since it is in this form that pianoforte duets are most played, I will say a few words about them later on.

To give a complete or exhaustive list of duets existing would be outside the province of this article. I shall therefore confine myself to naming the composers who have bequeathed works of art to the world in this form, and endeavouring to establish the fact that it is as useful and as essential to pianoforte players to play and practise duets as it is to play the piano at all.

The master to whom we owe the most in this respect is, undoubtedly, Schubert. The number, variety, and beauty of his pianoforte duets have been approached by no other writer.

His beautiful marches are perhaps the best known of his works in this form, but a reference to the complete catalogue of his works, published by the great Leipsic firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, shows that he has actually written no less than fifty-one pianoforte duets, amongst which are: 3 sonatas (one well known, in C major, op. 140), 3 overtures, 2 rondos, 2 grand divertissements, 4 great fantasias, 4 sets of variations, a fugue, ländler, polonaises, etc.—a remarkable legacy to duettists. Surely if a great master wrote so much in this form, it behoves us to study gratefully what he has left us.

The greatest master has only a small sonata, three marches, and one or two sets of variations, all in his earliest Mozart style.

Mendelssohn's duets are two in number, but valuable additions to the duettist's library. They consist of an allegro in A major, op. 92, and a set of variations in B flat major, op. 83, which last were played at the Popular Concerts soon after they were started.

Apropos of the Popular Concerts, I find records of three duet performances, and three only.

Mendelssohn's variations have a somewhat noteworthy history. They were composed originally for one performer, but subsequently re-composed and played by the composer with Sterndale Bennett at the latter's concert in 1844.

Hummel, it is said, achieved his reputation as a composer by his grand sonata duet in A flat, which bears an inscription (on Messrs. Cocks's edition) saying it was played by the author and Mrs. Anderson, by the author and Mr. Henry Field, and the author and Mr. C. O. Hodges. It is a truly remarkable work in his best style. He has also left a sonata, quasi-rantasia, in E flat, and some variations.

Carl Maria von Weber's duets are remarkable for their extreme shortness combined with their extreme beauty. They consist of 6 pieces op. 3, 6 pieces op. 10, and 8 pieces op. 60. Selections from op. 60 have been performed at the Popular Concerts. They are easy, with the exception of those op. 60, which require advanced players for their interpretation.

Mozart has left a great legacy in the shape of duets. They consist of 4 sonatas (of which the third is the finest), 2 fine capriccios, 1 set of variations, and a fugue. This fugue is considered one of the finest he ever wrote. It is a marvel of constructive skill and melody.

Of the ancients who have left beautiful duets can be mentioned also Clementi, Kalkbrenner, Czerny, J. B. Cramer, Herz, Dussek, Field, Hässler, Kalliwooda, Kuhlau, Onslow (about whose sonata duets I shall have a few words to say), E. Wolf, and Wolff, etc.

It is a singular fact that Chopin and Stephen Heller, though professedly piano writers, have not written a single duet, at least to my knowledge.

I am obliged for want of space to leave out names that are entitled to be mentioned in this article, but I trust to take up the subject and go into it again, in giving the various forms of duets complete essays to themselves.

I find I have omitted Schumann, but will give an account of his duets (which are highly interesting) at a future date.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "Fair Katherine," "The Shepherd's Fairy," "Seven Sons," "Spoilt Guy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER II.

EN minutes' fast walking brought Noah to a strange-looking building, not unlike the toy Noah's arks children play with, and its shape had given it its name. Noah's ark. The foundation of this house was an old boat, on the top of which the cottage itself, consisting of three rooms, was built. It stood by the water's edge at the head of the broad where the river widened; there was an empty space cleared among the reeds and sedges by the side of the ark, and here a large eel-net was spread out to dry on stakes, some eel trunks with holes pierced in the lids stood near ready to receive the catch of to-night, and by the door sat a comely woman, about forty, knitting.

"What has come to Eve, Noah? The child is crying fit to break her heart," said Mrs. Oldman, as Noah approached.

"She has been disobedient, and I have had to punish her," said Noah, laconically.

"My patience, Noah, you don't mean to tell me you have been and beaten the child?" exclaimed Mrs. Oldman, rising and looking terrified at the idea which had just struck her.

"No, I have not. Where is she?" said Noah, quietly.

"What do you want with her?" said Mrs. Oldman, aloud; inwardly she added, "I don't like the looks of you; you'd beat me for two pins in your present mood."

"I want to forgive her," said Noah.

"Oh! well, if that is all you want, you'll find her indoors somewhere, in her own room very likely," said his wife, with a sigh of relief.

Noah entered the ark. The first room served as kitchen, sitting-room, and dining-room, but Eve was not there; he opened a door which led from the kitchen to his own bedroom, and Eve was not there, so he stepped across it and opened another door which led into a tiny room in the bows of the ark, and there was Eve sitting by the little window, still weeping bitterly.

"Eve, come to me, my little one," said Noah, opening his arms as he crossed the threshold, and Eve rose and threw herself into them, weeping and wailing. "Hush, child, hush," said Noah, half-frightened at her vehemence, as he took her on his knee, and sitting down on her little bed, kissed her flushed face and rocked her gently in his arms, as if she were an infant, to still her sobs.

"Oh, father, father! I am too wicked; I shall never be happy again."

"Not when father has forgiven you, as he does?" said Noah, taking the tear-stained face, lovely even so, in his hands and smiling down upon it.

His smile had almost a magical effect on Eve; she twined her arms round his neck, kissed him, and then pillowing her soft cheek against his stalwart shoulder, sighed a sigh of ineffable content, and Noah added not another word of admonition to the lesson he had already given her—a lesson he knew neither she nor any of those who had witnessed it would ever forget.

Later in the evening, when Eve was asleep, an occasional sob still witnessing to the past storm, and Noah had finished the basin of tea and bread and bacon which was his usual supper, Adam Day arrived to help Noah set the eel-net for the night as soon as the tide turned, for eels only run with the ebb. As they worked they talked but little and only about eels and grigs, and the various methods of bobbing and spearing, netting, and using long night-lines.

"If this Net Fishery Bill passes, you'll have to get a new net, with a larger mesh, Father Noah," said Adam, who had looked upon Noah as his father ever since he could remember, for his own father died when he was a baby.

"And pass it will, and right it should, too. We catch a deal too many young pike, not to say anything about the tench and bream, rud and perch, and smelts, too, in the spring, with this small mesh," said Noah.

"You are about the only eel-man on the broads that acknowledges the justice of it; nevertheless, they all say it is taking the bread out of poor men's mouths to put pike into rich men's baskets."

"Yes, but it isn't true, and they know it; poor men eat pike and bream as well as rich men, and unless something is done, and quickly too, our pike-fishery will suffer considerably. Personally, I shall be a sufferer, for my net was new last year, and is worth £50 if it is worth a penny; but I don't expect to be able to use it much longer, so I am making a new one."

"And what do you think about the long eel-lines?"

"Oh! there is no harm in them, but they'll be prohibited before long, too, and it will be hard on us eel-men, but we shall just have to grin and bear it; there are greater wrongs than that to be borne in the world."

"Father Noah, wouldn't it be a grand thing to be able to right one of the wrongs in the world before one died?" said Adam, as they strolled into the ark.

"It would, indeed, my boy, if it pleased God to use you or me for such a purpose, but it is a grand thing to do His will faithfully, if it be only to set an eel-net all one's life. It is not the work itself, but the way in which we do it, which makes our actions grand and noble, or mean and base."

"But do you think because my father was an eel-man like you, I must never hope to be anything but an eel-man all my life?"

"Certainly not; God has given you great talents, and no doubt He will give you the means of cultivating them. His will may be that you should rise from the position in which you were born by your own energy, and if so, your duty is to do your best to cultivate the talents He has given you, and that I know you need no prompting to do. Now for our reading; I will light the lamp."

While Noah lit the lamp, Adam went to a book-shelf on which stood a row of books; there were only a few, but they were well-chosen and well read. There was a Bible the worse for wear, a Shakespeare, Milton, "Pilgrim's Progress," "The Imitation of Christ," an English version of Dante's "Divina Commedia," "White's Selborne," Pope's Homer, one or two volumes of history, Carlyle's "French Revolution" among them; "Robinson Crusoe," and Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying." This made up almost the whole of Noah's library, among which Adam found no difficulty in choosing a book, but taking down the Shakespeare, opened it, and began to read aloud the play of "Julius Cæsar." Noah, had he been consulted, would have preferred Milton, but he did not say so. The boy read well, but he could not do himself justice, for he was obliged to read in a low tone for fear of disturbing the fish, and also for fear of not hearing the warning whistle of an approaching wherry; once or twice he was so carried away by the excitement the play roused in him, that he unwittingly raised his voice, and Noah, who sat smoking and listening at the door of the ark, was obliged to whisper a warning hush!

Once or twice the reading was interrupted by a wherry, and Noah and Adam had to go out into the midsummer night and lower the eel-net to let the wherry pass safely; sometimes the hooting of an owl, and at intervals the passionate song of the nightingale, broke the stillness outside, stillness so great that even the splash of a fish or a water-rat was audible; once the bell-like bark of an otter made Noah turn a longing eye to his gun, which hung above Adam, who was too much enthralled with the story of Brutus and Cassius to heed aught else, and Noah, keen sportsman as he was, subdued the desire to give chase to the otter, rather than annoy the lad by interrupting his reading.

About midnight the play was finished, and Adam, feeling that ordinary conversation would at once break the spell the immortal bard had cast around him, sat silent, till Noah, who was lost in thought, said—

"Et tu Brute?"

Adam supposed he was thinking of the play, but as a matter of fact Noah was thinking of One far greater than Cæsar, of One who, alas! has cause to breathe that reproachful 'et tu' to each and all His dearest friends, of One who during those long night-watches was very near the eel-man, with whom He walked and talked as with a friend.

"Father Noah, it was Master Clifford's fault that Eve went with us to-day; he persuaded her," said Adam, dubiously.

"I thought as much; I don't care for Eve to be so much with him, though they are but children; moreover, they are apt to play when they get together and might upset the boat; now with you and Miss Grace I know Eve is safe enough."

"It was all right, as Miss Grace was there; Clifford is always good before her—her very presence seems to keep him in order. I never have the least trouble with any of the school-children so long as she is in the schoolroom; child as she is, I believe the very worst boy in the school would be afraid as well as ashamed to do anything wrong in her presence. She seems to me like a beautiful white lily which sheds its fragrance on all the weeds around it."

"She is a dear, good child; I wish my little Eve was more like her; but, Adam, it is time you went home to bed; I can't lift the net before four this morning, the tide begins to flow soon after that. Tell your mother you'll make a first-rate eel-man if you never do anything else."

"That is all she expects or wants me to do, but it won't satisfy me, even if I were such a good eel-man as you, Father Noah, though to be half as good a man, perhaps, would," said Adam, dodging to avoid the playful box on the ears his last remark called forth, as he left the Ark.

When he was gone, Noah sat thinking about him; wondering if the boy, now a pupil teacher, and already far ahead of the village schoolmaster in every branch of knowledge, would rise above the ranks; wondering what the future of the four children he had seen that day in the boat would be; wondering if Adam would grow to love his little Eve, and so become his son, and perhaps hoping that it would be so; wondering where Mr. Leicester would find a husband good enough for his gentle Grace; wondering who would keep Arthur Clifford, whom he knew to be the spoilt child of worldly parents, from the evil of the world; wondering, in short, what the fortunes of those four boys and girls would be; and, wise as he was, arriving at nothing in the least like what they really were.

What those fortunes were this story will tell.

THE SERVICE OF BEAUTY.

INTRODUCTION.

BEAUTY is the pilot of the young soul because it invites to true fitness."

In these days of much speaking and writing, we hear a very great deal about beauty in all its various forms. This is sometimes called the utilitarian age; it cannot, I think, be justly described by that name alone. Beauty, the elder and fairer, is ever striving to keep up and go hand in hand with that bustling and energetic sister of hers, Utility.

In our love of nature we are surely behind no other age, as our English school of landscape painting bears witness, and that school of prose and poetry in which the loveliness of nature is so lovingly noted and truthfully told. Then, appreciation of the beautiful in literature was never more widely made possible than at present, when education has admitted the best books to the intelligence, and low prices brought them within the means of all. As regards art, although it is not a period of great productiveness, there never was a more widespread interest in its higher branches, a more earnest endeavour after its appreciation and culture. In the practical application of art to our daily surroundings, to our houses, furniture, dress, and all the thousand-and-one details of civilised life, we have seen an immense reaction from the stereotyped forms and colours, often inartistic enough, which contented our grandfathers and grandmothers. We may measure the strength of this reaction by observing how a whole vocabulary has sprung up in connection with it; the æsthetic enthusiasts have coined new words and phrases which have entered into our common talk. There was indeed some fear of this æstheticism degenerating into a "craze," but the wholesome discipline of the satirist has checked this tendency and kept it within due limits.

We are sometimes unconscious of the important tendencies of our time, this movement towards the beautiful in all things is so decided that it cannot remain unrecognised. It enters into all our lives, more or less; let us try to understand it that we may give it a right direction. Why should so much be said and thought of beauty? What is the use of all this effort to make the mere surroundings, the material framework of our lives, more lovely and pleasant to look upon? We have answered the question by the words in which it is conveyed. Lovely is love-like, likely to be loved; and pleasant is that which pleases. When a thing is lovely, it is that which we must love, and this love proves by its very existence one of the sacred needs of our higher nature, a need of beauty to satisfy it. A thing is pleasant to look upon, and the capacity we feel for this pleasure, by its very claim, proves its right to pleasant objects with which it shall be satisfied.

The appreciation of beauty is capable of great and intense gratification; no faculty so full of delight, no capacity for pleasure so high and varied, could have been given to us without some good end to be served. If we admit this, it becomes our duty to make the most of this, as of all our other faculties, and so to gain a greater breadth and richness of life. Making the most of our powers and capabilities is the secret of all true progress. Let us look upon every power or faculty as a sacred gift, granted us to be turned to the very best account, and we shall see that each one, insignificant though some may seem compared to the deeper needs and higher aspirations of our nature, should hold its due place in our growth, mental and spiritual. Looked at in this light, our love of beauty and our taste become matters of real importance—they are powers given us to be used and cultivated in the best way; in so far as we neglect and waste them, or turn them to a bad use, we do wrong. Ruskin, who speaks to us with a prophet's voice of these things, says, "Beauty has been appointed by the Deity to be one of the elements by which the soul is continually sustained;" and further, that no true idea of beauty is possible without purity of mind, that the sensation of beauty is neither sensual nor intellectual alone, but dependent on a pure, right, and open state of the heart, both for its truth and its intensity. And again, that our moral nature in its purity and perfection receives pleasure only from the highest possible material sources, and the faculty by which we receive such pleasure is perfect taste.

The careful guarding of the sense of beauty and cultivation of right taste is necessary, then, to the development of our nature generally, as human beings with spirits which require sustaining just as much as bodies do.

Men and women, in the universal kingdom of beauty, have different parts to fill. The part of creating and producing falls chiefly to men; they have been, and it is probable they always will be, the great painters, sculptors, poets, and musicians. But if men are the creators, women are chiefly the administrators. It is theirs—not to sit alone in the studio and at the desk, devoting their whole self to the production of pure types of beauty—but to bring the results of that patient work into everyday life, to make known the best in art, to brighten the common things of the world with all the beauty they can place in sight, and so to elevate the whole life of those about them. Men dig in the deep treasure mines of nature's beauty for her hidden jewels; it is for women to set them where they may be seen, to use them nobly for their right purpose, and draw from them their full value. The word "lady" means "loaf-giver;" but the true lady should be, besides the dispenser of material bread, the dispenser of that which nourishes the higher life, the promoter and distributor of beauty, that divinely-appointed sustenance of the soul.

Men are occupied more with the rougher and sterner side of life, women placed more among its sheltered and softer aspects, favourable to the culture of beauty. A woman managing her household is a queen at the head of a little kingdom; it is her gracious privilege to brighten and beautify all that is included in it—the house, the furniture, the garden, the dress and appearance of herself and her subjects. And beyond this lies another duty very closely allied to it—the duty of so brightening and beautifying all that belongs to her poorer neighbours, who too often are ignorant of the very idea of beauty.

In this large department of the service of beauty, we find the special privileges and responsibilities of girls. Their highest interest is bound up with all that concerns the elevation and expansion of womanhood, for the "girl is mother of the woman."

And there is for them, as girls, a share to be taken in the sweet and blessed work of beauty which cannot be taken by any other. It is the young girls themselves who should form a most beautiful part of home life. There is no such loveliness in nature as the loveliness of a young girl, and though it is seldom seen in its perfection, it is suggested constantly. Not all can lay claim to the precious gift of personal beauty, yet very few there are who do not possess some perfection of form or feature, some loveliness of youth. I hold that it is just as right as it is natural in girls to desire to be attractive in the eyes of others, to long to be graceful if not beautiful, to look nice if not pretty. There is an immense expenditure of time, strength and means always going on to attain this object; the only pity is that it should so seldom succeed, or, if successful, be not more honestly acknowledged. If girls would learn to take personal beauty at its true value, and openly set before them the aim of being as beautiful as they can, with a pure motive, there would be less vanity, less ill-health, and less outcry needed against the follies of Fashion.

In other ways there is much for girls to do in the service of beauty, and I hope to point out some reflections and suggestions which may help them. In the middle-classes of our society there is a want of more "sweetness and light." A certain delicacy of perception and refinement of taste are lacking too often as a balance to our downright bluntness and the practical common-sense on which we pride ourselves. We need a stronger sense of beauty as an added grace with which to crown the serious purpose of our lives.

As the education of women becomes more sound and complete, it is sometimes feared that they tend to become too hard-headed, too scientific, and too matter-of-fact. That will never be a real danger as long as they recognise in their sense of beauty a sacred trust, cultivate it to the utmost of their power, and refresh with its purity the dry and dusty paths of life.

To avoid the strong-minded type of woman, for whom graces are frivolities, on the one hand, and the over-sentimentalism of those "æsthetes" whose idol is blue china or a daffodil, on the other, is to strike the golden mean of that ideal womanhood which should be the aim of every right-minded girl.

BEAUTY IN NATURE.

"And Nature, the old Nurse, took
The child upon her knee,
Saying, 'Here is a story-book
Thy Father has written for thee.

"Come, wander with me," she said;
'Into regions yet untrod,
And read what is still unread
In the manuscripts of God.'

"And he wandered away and away
With Nature, the dear old Nurse
Who sang to him, night and day,
The rhymes of the universe.

"And whenever the way seemed long,
Or his heart began to fail,
She would sing a more wonderful song,
Or tell a more wonderful tale."

LONGFELLOW.

Nature, our nursing-mother, serves us perpetually, and her ministrations are two-fold—they serve our senses and they serve our soul, if only we will not act like petulant children, and wilfully turn away from her cherishing and soothing power, or, blindly vain, reject her humbly proffered benefits, recognising only her grander guise and sterner authority.

We live in an atmosphere heated, for the most part, to fever-point, we men and women of the nineteenth century, and this from causes not within our individual control. An electric condition is generated by the friction of mind on mind, never so intense as it is now; things and thoughts move rapidly; and life tends to become more complicated and more exhausting. The young people particularly suffer from these influences. Cool steadfastness and possession of one's soul in patience are growths not forwarded by such an atmosphere, and these sober qualities are as much needed in youth, to counterbalance its natural impetuosity and impatience, as they are in any time of our life. In youth it is that "our hearts are hot and restless," if not yet "our lives are full of care," and then to revive, to calm and cool us, to lift the burden off, there is kind mother Nature holding out beautiful arms, ready to lay us upon her gentle bosom. Let us see that we do not scornfully pass her by in our young haste, or later we may find that we have missed a blessing no longer to be gained.

Nature ministers to our senses; our first concern with the fact that the sun shines, the starlit night hushes the earth, the crops ripen, the beasts and birds live after their kind, is that we are warmed and lighted, refreshed with sleep, clothed and fed. This much we claim from Nature as our right, for without this we cannot live, but this is only the beginning of what she does for us. "Man does not live by bread alone." Nature has nourishment for our higher life also, and unless we are fed with this, we must die in all but the poor life of the senses, narrow, indeed, in comparison with the wealth beyond. One man looks upon a cornfield and is roused to nothing but a speculation on the price of wheat; another sees in a field only the fact that it is his own; a third shall pass that way and be moved by the beauty of waving corn, and dewy pasture, and fair hill-side, to a purifying and ennobling enthusiasm. One man owns this patch of land, and another that, but he who loves its beauty is the true possessor of the landscape.

The fitness to their purpose of Nature's works is the measure of their beauty.

Every perfection of form, every brilliant colour, every grace of movement, every charm of sound, stands for health, for power of action, for fitness. Look upon a good specimen of a beech tree in early summer, mark its exquisite proportion of trunk and branches, its solid fixing in the soil, its graceful rearing to the sky, its dainty bark, the pure colour and rare texture of its leaves, each a wonder in its own way, of silky gloss and vivid green, unlike every other. What is it but a tree that is obeying perfectly all the laws of its being, every part fitted exactly to fulfil its function, that the development of the whole may be forwarded and perfected? So far perfect; but its fitness results in something more: it is not only a sound and healthy tree, it is beautiful. It appeals to our imagination, and brings us in touch with the universal beauty of creation, so that, gazing up into this her miracle of fresh foliage, dancing and quivering in light and shade, we feel the poetry of all tree-life, and the harmony of all true growth.

So Nature serves our senses first, but beyond that our soul. Many a lesson have we to learn from the first process, but perhaps we gain most, when without reflecting much, we simply feel—when the contrast between our small, feverish, fussy lives and the grand, simple, quiet forces of the natural world is suddenly borne in upon us. In the "ohne Hast and ohne Rast" of Nature lies one open secret of her beauty. Here is no "working against time," no hasty imperfections, no harsh transitions. If we pass at once with chafed mind and cramped body from stress of work or wearying companionship into the freshness and peace of the outer air, how it strikes us then—the contrast! First, our bodies are renewed, and then, if we will, our spirits, by that all-embracing harmony of forces. It would seem that a law of compensation gives us, in our artificial lives, a power of recuperation from Nature, an intense sympathy with her moods, a realisation of her beauty, which was denied to men before they grew civilised up to our point, while yet they were at home with Nature, and drew upon her directly for their common daily uses. It is, in any case, a compensation within the power of all of us—of me who write and you who read; some opportunities of Nature-love fall to our lot. Do not make the mistake of thinking that she is only to be sought in her grand moods or exceptional aspects. If we will have her blessing for our own, we must be ready to accept it at any time, in any place; it is always there for the reverent eye and heart. They who hurry from Switzerland to Italy, from America to Egypt in search of the picturesque, who can only be moved to admiration by the sublime or unusual, miss the highest pleasures after all, as well as the most attainable. Not for them is the rich "harvest of a quiet eye."

There is as much beauty in the floating, gliding mist as in the thunderstorm, in "the grey majesty of a day of clouds," or the golden glory of an October afternoon, as in the full pageant of midsummer; as much charm in the flight of swallows in the air as in the mighty swell of breakers on the shore. The sight of the first primrose can waken "thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears," and affect us as much as the gorgeousness of an Alpine sunset. In our pride and ignorance we want some new sensation, something to startle and stimulate, and we pass over the common good that is always with us. Ruskin says of the sky, "It is fitted in all its functions for the comfort and exalting of the heart—for soothing it, and purifying it from its dross and dirt. Sometimes gentle, sometimes capricious, sometimes awful, never the same for two moments together; almost human in its passions, almost spiritual in its tenderness, almost divine in its infinity, its appeal to what is immortal in us is as distinct as its ministry of chastisement or of blessing to what is mortal is essential. And yet we never attend to it, we never make it a subject of thought, but as it has to do with our animal sensations; we look upon all by which it speaks to us only as a succession of meaningless and monotonous accidents, too common and too vain to be worthy of a moment of watchfulness or a glance of admiration. If in our moments of utter idleness and insipidity we turn to the sky as a last resource, which of its phenomena do we speak of? One says it has been wet, another it has been windy, and another it has been warm. Who among the whole chattering crowd can tell one of the forms and precipices of the chain of tall white mountains that girded the horizon at noon yesterday? Who saw the narrow sunbeam that came out of the south, and smote upon their summits until they melted and mouldered away in a mist of blue rain? Who saw the dance of the dead clouds when the sunlight left them last night, and the west wind blew them before it like withered leaves? All has passed unregretted as unseen; or if the apathy be ever shaken off, even for an instant, it is only by what is gross or what is extraordinary."

Too true and too sad a condemnation! We are foolish enough to make the angels weep, in overlooking that handwriting on the wall of heaven, while we grumble because the weather hurts "our animal sensations," or upsets our little plans. No one of us need complain that the beauty of Nature is beyond his reach; our lives, thank God, are rounded more or less by her loveliness, and not shut off from possibilities of communion close and intimate. I speak as one whose privilege it is to live by the sea, to recognise its daily influence almost as a spiritual friend, breathing, through its changeful moods, never twice alike, of eternity. As old as Creation, as fresh as the foam-flake of its spray, it is an ever open page of revelation, a heart-lifting and inspiring presence in one's daily life. But all have some similar privilege. Whenever and however we may meet her, "Nature never wears a mean appearance." To the dwellers in town there is a pleasure keen and precious in visiting the simplest scenes. Even the chastened glory of an autumn sunset seen through the dull mist of a town park has its peculiar charm. "The dullest country" in the "worst weather" may be found full of interesting variety of rich effect or delicate grace by those who have eyes to see. The bare Yorkshire moors were a nourishing feast to Emily Brontë's heart and brain. In the midst of plenty we often complain and starve. As Emerson says, "the eye is the true artist," after all.

A priceless benefit to every human being is this intercourse with Nature, an absolute necessity to some. We women, by the circumstances of our lives, so often bounded by four walls, need the freedom and reviving power of natural beauty to keep us in mental health. Our work runs mostly on narrow lines; our worries are of the small and indefinite kind which it is as impossible to keep within set limits as to drill a swarm of midges. There is no surer rest and refreshment (after our religion) than to bathe our souls in the beauty of Nature. May not indeed our religion itself lead us to "look through Nature up to Nature's God"? By our highly-strung nervous organisation, we women are peculiarly susceptible to moods and variations which are best soothed and corrected by contact with the eternal beauty always about us, resulting from obedience to law. In times of trial it is an unfailing help; we learn trust and patience from the harmony of beauty; if all these things work together for good, shall our life alone be an ugly discord? Here is Charles Kingsley's advice to the woman he loved, when they were suffering through a separation which seemed likely to last. "Study Nature—not scientifically—that would take eternity, to do it so as to reap much moral good from it . . . Do not study matter for its own sake, but as a countenance of God. Try to extract every line of beauty, every association, every moral reflection, every inexpressible feeling from it. Study the forms and colours of flowers and leaves, and the growth and habits of plants; not to classify them, but to admire them and adore God. Study the sky, study water, study the trees. Study the sounds and scents of Nature. Study all these as beautiful in themselves in order to re-combine the elements of beauty; next, as allegories and examples from whence moral reflections may be drawn; next, as types of certain tones of feeling, etc.; but remain (yourself) in God-dependence, superior to them. Learn what feelings they express, but do not let them mould the tone of your mind; else, by allowing a melancholy day to make you melancholy, you worship the creature more than the Creator."

It has been feared, among other objections raised to the sway of science in our day, that its cold light will destroy the glamour of beauty in the natural world, that its hard facts will stifle the tender poetry, its keen precision cut at the root of all our old imaginings, and leave us in place of Nature's expressive countenance, a hideous skull of mere matter grinning at our discomfiture, or a cruel "Nature, red in tooth and claw."

This is a calumny of science; that worst of lies, a half-truth. Only look a little further than the surface, and you will see that every mystery cleared up by science does but reveal as it vanishes a mystery beyond; that every old conception of beauty is transformed by its light into fairer form. When we were little ones, we thought by reaching we could touch the stars, and there is "little joy" in first finding ourselves "farther off from heaven" than we thought; but when that illusion is over, after all, is there not a deeper joy in finding that heaven is far enough away to give scope to our highest aspirations, and the sky vast and infinite beyond our fullest-grown imagination? Nature will bear the scrutiny of our telescopes and microscopes and all our instruments, and still reveal fathomless possibilities and delicate perfections beyond the wildest dreams of the poet. The mystery which is one chief element of her loveliness has but changed its aspect. The fairy-tales of science are the best of all—they leave nothing common or unclean, but touch all things with a new significance, with "a light that never was on sea or shore." The more we know of Nature, the more we have to admire and to love.

But though we are safe here, on the score of science, there is a real and much-to-be-dreaded danger in the operations of utilitarianism. A certain type of hard practical man will sacrifice any beauty to his purposes. In the view of some of us, it is positive desecration to foul a river made by God for health and beauty, not by reason of necessity, but of money-getting; or to turn drainage into the sea by way of economy. The "Black Country" is a defilement of Nature, which, no doubt, was necessary to the "development of our resources," from the shopkeeping point of view; but that it has ultimately added to our true wealth may safely be denied, and that it is a blot upon our national life cannot be doubted. One way in which cultivated women, they who owe so much to her, may show their reverence for Nature, is by resolutely setting their faces against any kind of avoidable defilement of our fair country. We may not, many of us, have any direct voice in such matters, but this, at least, we all have: an influence in the formation of public opinion. We, even our young girls, may help men, who do decide these things, to see that it is doing a wilful wrong to cause or to allow any unnecessary encroachment, for low or selfish ends, on what was given for the good of all.

Nature serves our senses, as the good mother cares first for her child's physical well-being; but that is a temporary end. The ultimate end of Nature is to draw our souls up to recognise the moral element which lives in all high beauty.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER II. "HERE IS OUR BESSIE!"

N interruption occurred at this moment. The friendly guard made his appearance again, accompanied by the same white-haired old clergyman whom Bessie had noticed. He came to offer his services to the young ladies. He cheered Miss Sefton's drooping spirits, by reiterating the guard's assurance, that they need only fear the inconvenience of another hour's delay.

The sight of the kind, benevolent countenance was reassuring and comforting, and after their new friend had left them, the girls resumed their talk with fresh alacrity.

Miss Sefton was the chief speaker. She began recounting the glories of a grand military ball at Knightsbridge, at which she had been present, and some private theatricals and tableaux that had followed. She had a vivid, picturesque way of describing things, and Bessie listened with a sort of dreamy fascination that lulled her into forgetfulness of her parents' anxiety.

In spite of her alleged want of imagination, she was conscious of a sort of weird interest in her surroundings. The wintry afternoon had closed into evening, but the whiteness of the snow threw a dim brightness underneath the faint starlight, while the gleam of the carriage lights enabled them to see the dark figures that passed and re-passed underneath their window.

It was intensely cold, and in spite of her furs Miss Sefton shivered and grew perceptibly paler. She was evidently one of those spoiled children of fortune who had never learned lessons of endurance, who are easily subdued and depressed by a passing feeling of discomfort; even Bessie's sturdy cheerfulness was a little infected by the unnatural stillness outside. The line ran between high banks, but in the mysterious twilight they looked like rocky defiles closing them in.

After a time Bessie's attention wandered, and her interest flagged. Military balls ceased to interest her as the temperature grew lower and lower. Miss Sefton, too, became silent, and Bessie's mind filled with gloomy images. She thought of ships bedded in ice in Arctic regions; of shipwrecked sailors on frozen seas; of lonely travellers laying down their weary heads on pillows of snow, never to rise again; of homeless wanderers, outcasts from society, many with famished babes at their breasts, cowering under dark arches, or warming themselves at smouldering fires.

"Thank God that, as father says, we cannot realise what people have to suffer," thought Bessie. "What would be the use of being young and happy and free from pain if we were to feel other people's miseries? Some of us, who are sympathetic by nature, would never smile again. I don't think when God made us, and sent us into the world to live our own lives, that He meant us to feel like that. One can't mix up other people's lives with one's own; it would make an awful muddle."

"Miss Lambert, are you asleep, or dreaming with your eyes open? Don't you see we are moving? There was such a bustle just now, and then they got the steam up, and now the engine is beginning to work. Oh, how slowly we are going! I could walk faster. Oh, we are stopping again—no, it was only my fancy. Is not the shriek of the whistle musical for once?"

"I was not asleep, I was only thinking; but my thoughts had travelled far. Are we really moving? There, the snow-plough has cleared the line; we shall go on faster presently."

"I hope so; it is nearly eight. I ought to have reached London an hour ago. Poor Neville, how disappointed he will be! Oh, we are through the drift now, and they are putting on more steam!"

"Yes, we shall be at Cliffe in another ten minutes;" and Bessie roused in earnest. Those ten minutes seemed interminable before the lights of the station flashed before their eyes.

"Here she is, here is our Bessie!" exclaimed a voice, and a fine-looking young fellow in an ulster ran lightly down the platform as Bessie waved her handkerchief. He was followed more leisurely by a handsome, grey-haired man with a quiet, refined-looking face.

"Tom, oh Tom!" exclaimed Bessie, almost jumping into his arms, as he opened the carriage door. "Were mother and Hatty very frightened? Why, there is father," as Dr. Lambert hurried up.

"My dear child, how thankful I am to see you! Why, she looks quite fresh, Tom!"

"As fit as possible," echoed Tom.

"Yes, I am only cold. Father, the guard put me in with a young lady. She was going to London, but it is too late for her to travel alone, and she is afraid of going to an hotel; may I bring her home? Her name is Edna Sefton; she lives at The Grange, Oatlands."

Dr. Lambert seemed somewhat taken aback by his daughter's speech.

"Edna Sefton! Why, that is Eleanor Sefton's daughter! What a strange coincidence!" And then he muttered to himself, "Eleanor Sartoris' daughter under our roof! I wonder what Dora will say!" And then he turned to the fair, striking-looking girl, whom Tom was assisting with all the alacrity that a young man generally shows to a pretty girl: "Miss Sefton, you will be heartily welcome for your mother's sake; she and I were great friends in the 'Auld lang syne.' Will you come with me? I have a fly waiting for Bessie; my son will look after the luggage;" and Edna obeyed him with the docility of a child.

But she glanced at him curiously once or twice as she walked beside him. "What a gentlemanly, handsome man he was!" she thought. Yes, he looked like a doctor; he had the easy kindly manner which generally belong to the profession. She had never thought much about her own father, but to-night, as they drove through the lighted streets, her thoughts, oddly enough, recurred to him. Dr. Lambert was sitting opposite the two girls, but his eyes were fixed oftenest on his daughter.

"Your mother was very anxious and nervous," he said, "and so was Hatty, when Tom brought us word that the train was snowed up in Sheen Valley. I had to scold Hatty, and tell her she was a goose; but mother was nearly as bad; she can't do without her crutch, eh, Bessie?" with a gleam of tenderness in his eyes, as they rested on his girl.

Edna felt a little lump in her throat, though she hardly knew why; perhaps she was tired and overstrained; she had never missed her father before, but she fought against the feeling of depression.

"I am so sorry your son has to walk," she said, politely; but Dr. Lambert only smiled.

"A walk will not hurt him, and our roads are very steep."

As he spoke the driver got down, and Bessie begged leave to follow his example.

"We live on the top of the hill," she said apologetically, "and I cannot bear being dragged up by a tired horse, as father knows by this time," and she joined her brother, who came up at that moment.

Tom had kept the fly well in sight.

"That's an awfully jolly-looking girl, Betty," he observed, with the free-and-easy criticism of his age. "I don't know when I have seen a prettier girl; uncommon style too—fair hair and dark eyes; she is a regular beauty."

"That is what boys always think about," returned Bessie with good-humoured contempt. "Girls are different; I should be just as much interested in Miss Sefton if she were plain. I suppose you mean to be charmed with her conversation, and to find all her remarks witty because she has les beaux yeux."

"I scorn to take notice of such spiteful remarks," returned Tom, with a shrug; "girls are venomous to each other. I believe they hate to hear each other praised, even by a brother."

"Hold your tongue, Tom!" was the rejoinder. "It takes my breath away to argue with you up this hill. I am not too ill-natured to give up my own bed to Miss Sefton. Let us hurry on, there's a good boy, or they will arrive before us."

As this request coincided with Tom's private wishes, he condescended to walk faster; and the brother and sister were soon at the top of the hill, and had turned into a pretty private road, bordered with trees, with detached houses standing far back, with long, sloping strips of gardens. The moon had now risen, and Bessie could distinctly see a little group of girls, with shawls over their heads, standing on the top of a flight of stone steps leading down to a large shady garden belonging to an old-fashioned house. The front entrance was round the corner, but the drawing-room window was open, and the girls had gained the road by the garden way, and stood shivering and expectant; while the moon illumined the grass terraces that ran steeply from the house, and shone on the meadow that skirted the garden.

"Run in, girls; you will catch cold," called out Bessie, but her prudent suggestion was of no avail, for a tall, lanky girl rushed into the road with the rapturous exclamation, "Why, it is our Bessie after all, though she looked so tall in the moonlight, and I did not know Tom's new ulster!" And here Bessie was fallen upon and kissed, and handed from one to another of the group, and then borne rapidly down the steps and across the terrace to the open window.

"Here she is, mother; here is our Bessie, not a bit the worse! And Hatty ought to be ashamed of herself for making us all so miserable," exclaimed Katie.

"My Hatty shan't be scolded. Mother, dear, if you only knew how sweet home looks after the Sheen Valley! Don't smother me any more, girls, I want to tell you something that will surprise you;" and Bessie, still holding her mother's hand, but looking at Hatty, gave a rapid and somewhat indistinct account of her meeting with Edna Sefton.

"And she will have my room, mother," continued Bessie, a little incoherently, for she was tired and breathless, and the girl's exclamations were so bewildering.

Mrs. Lambert, a pale, careworn woman with a sweet, pathetic sort of face, was listening with much perplexity, which was not lessened by the sight of her husband ushering into the room a handsome-looking girl, dressed in the most expensive fashion.

"Dora, my dear, this is Bessie's fellow-sufferer in the snow-drift; we must make much of her, for she is the daughter of my old friend Eleanor Sartoris—Mrs. Sefton now. Bessie has offered her her own room to-night, as it is too late for her to travel to London."

A quick look passed between the husband and wife, and a faint colour came to Mrs. Lambert's face, but she was too well-bred to express her astonishment.

"You are very welcome, my dear," she said, quietly. "We will make you as comfortable as we can. These are all my girls," and she mentioned their names.

"What a lot of girls!" thought Edna. She was not a bit shy by nature, and somehow the situation amused her. What a comfortable, home-like room, and what a lovely fire! and—well of course, they were not rich, anyone could see that, but they were nice kind people.

"This is better than the snow-drift," she said, with a beaming smile, as Dr. Lambert placed her in his own easy chair, and Tom brought her a footstool, and handed her a screen, and her old acquaintance Bessie helped her to remove her wraps. The whole family gathered round her, intent on hospitality to the bewitching stranger—only the "Crutch," as Tom called her, tripped away, to order Jane to light a fire in her room, and to give out the clean linen for the unexpected guest, and to put a few finishing touches to the supper-table.

The others did not miss her at first. Christine, a tall, graceful girl who had inherited her father's good looks, was questioning Edna about the journey, and the rest were listening to the answers.

Hatty, a pale, sickly-looking girl, whose really fine features were marred by unhealthy sullenness and an anxious, fretful expression, was hanging on every word; while the tall school-girl Ella, and the smaller bright-eyed Katie, were standing behind their mother, trying to hide their awkwardness and bashfulness till Tom came to the rescue by finding them seats, with a whispered hint to Katie that it was not good manners to stare so at a stranger. Edna saw everything with quiet, amused eyes; she satisfied Christine's curiosity, and found replies to all Mrs. Lambert's gentle persistent questioning. Tom, too, claimed her attention by all sorts of dexterous wiles. She must look at him, and thank him, when he found that screen for her; she could not disregard him when he was so solicitous about the draught from the window, so anxious to bring her another cushion.

"I did not know you were such a lady's man, Tom," observed Dr. Lambert presently, in a tone that made Tom retreat with rather a foolish expression.

With all his love for his children, Dr. Lambert was sometimes capable of a smooth sarcasm. Tom felt as though he had been officious; had, in fact, made a fool of himself, and drew off into the background. His father was often hard on him, Tom said to himself in an aggrieved way, and yet he was only doing his duty as a son of the house, in waiting on this fascinating young lady.

"Poor boy, he is very young!" thought Edna, who noticed this by-play with some amusement, "but he will grow older some day, and he is very good-looking;" and then she listened with a pretty show of interest to a story Dr. Lambert was telling her of when he was snowed up in Scotland as a boy.

When Bessie returned she found them all in good spirits, and her fellow-traveller laughing and talking as though she had known them for years; even Tom's brief sulkiness had vanished, and, unmindful of his father's caustic tongue, he had again ventured to join the charmed circle.

It was quite late before the girls retired to rest, and as Edna followed Bessie up the broad low staircase, while Tom lighted them from below, she called out gaily, "Good-night, Mr. Lambert; it was worth while being snowed up in the Sheen Valley to make such nice friends, and to enjoy such a pleasant evening."

Edna really meant what she said, for the moment; she was capable of these brief enthusiasms. Pleasantness of speech, that specious coinage of conventionality, was as the breath of life to her. Her girlish vanity was gratified by the impression she had made on the Lambert family, and even Tom's crude boyish admiration was worth something.

"To be all things to all men" is sometimes taken by vain worldly people in a very different sense from that the Apostle intended. Girls of Edna Sefton's calibre—impressionable, vivacious, egotistical, and capable of a thousand varying moods—will often take their cue from other people, and become grave with the grave, and gay with the gay, until they weary of their rôle, and of a sudden become their true selves. And yet there is nothing absolutely wrong in these swift, natural transitions; many sympathetic natures act in the same way, by very reason and force of their sympathy. For the time being they go out of themselves, and, as it were, put themselves in other people's places. Excessive sympathy is capable of minor martyrdom; their reflected suffering borders upon real pain.

When Bessie ushered Edna into her little room, she looked round proudly at the result of her own painstaking thoughtfulness. A bright fire burnt in the small grate, and her mother's easy chair stood beside it—heavy as it was, Bessie had carried it in with her own hands. The best eiderdown quilt in its gay covering was on the bed, and the new toilet-cover that Christine had worked in blue-and-white cross-stitch was on the table. Bessie had even borrowed the vase of Neapolitan violets that some patient had sent her father, and the sweet perfume permeated the little room.

Bessie would willingly have heard some encomium on the snug quarters provided for the weary guest, but Edna only looked round her indifferently, and then stifled a yawn.

"Is there anything you want? Can I help you? Oh, I hope you will sleep comfortably!" observed Bessie, a little mortified by Edna's silence.

"Oh, yes; I am so tired that I am sure I shall sleep well," returned Edna; and then she added quickly, "but I am so sorry to turn you out of your room."

"Oh, that does not matter at all, thank you," replied Bessie, stirring the fire into a cheerful blaze, and then bidding her guest good-night; but Edna, who had taken possession of the easy chair, exclaimed—

"Oh, don't go yet—it is only eleven, and I am never in bed until twelve; sit down a moment, and warm yourself."

"Mother never likes us to be late," hesitated Bessie; but she lingered nevertheless. This was not an ordinary evening and there were exceptions to every rule, so she knelt down on the rug a moment, and watched Edna taking down the long plaits of fair hair that had crowned her shapely head. "What lovely hair!" thought Bessie; "what a beautiful young creature she was altogether!" Edna was unconscious of the admiration she was exciting. She was looking round her, and trying to realise what her feelings would be if she had to inhabit such a room. "Why, our servants have better rooms," she thought.

To a girl of Edna's luxurious habits, Bessie's room looked very poor and mean. The little strips of faded carpet, the small curtainless bedstead, the plain maple washstand and drawers, the few simple prints and varnished bookcase, were shabby enough in Edna's eyes. She could not understand how any girl could be content with such a room, and yet Bessie's happiest hours were spent there. What was a little shabbiness, or the wear and tear of homely furniture, to one who saw angels' footprints even in the common ways of life, and who dreamt sweet innocent dreams of the splendours of a heavenly home? To these sort of natures even threadbare garments can be worn proudly, for to these free spirits even poverty loses its sting. It is not "how we live," but "how we think about life" that stamps our characters, and makes us the men and women that we are.

VARIETIES.

CHOOSING ACQUAINTANCES.

"My husband and I," said a shrewd woman, "are very careful in considering the acquaintances we now make, for our children's sake. Our friends' children will, in the natural course of events, be their friends, and perhaps even more closely allied, and we cannot be too particular as to the intimacies we may form."

These were wise words; for the hasty, ill-considered, unfortunate intimacies of youth are often found to be a clog all through life.

A SINGULAR WOMAN.

She does not boast, makes no display;

But modestly she fills her station;

Though she's an object, people say,

Of wonder and of admiration.

As school miss, maiden fair, and wife,

So everyone declares that's met her,

She never added in her life

A postscript when she wrote a letter!

WHAT IS GENIUS?

One of our girls asked a philosopher what the word genius meant.

"If you had it in you," said the philosopher, "you would not ask the question; but as you have it not, you will never know what it means."

A DEFINITION OF SCANDAL.—Scandal is what one half the world takes a pleasure in inventing, and the other half in believing.

A COMMON ERROR.—We neglect the advantages we have, and think what we should do if we were something else than what we are.

RICHER BY A FARTHING.

A miserly Scottish nobleman picked up a small copper coin, and was seen by a beggar to put it in his pocket.

"Oh, give it to me, my lord," exclaimed the beggar.

"Na, na," said his lordship, "find a farthing for yourself, puir body."

LEADING POINTS OF CHRISTIANITY.

The following short account of our duty to God and our neighbour was written three hundred and thirty years ago. It shows in a form easily remembered the leading points of the Christian faith.

To pray to God continually:

To learn to know Him rightfully:

To honour God in Trinity:

The Trinity in unity:

The Father in His majesty:

The Son in His humanity:

The Holy Ghost's benignity:

Three persons one, in Deity:

To serve Him always, guilelessly:

To ask Him all things, needfully:

To praise Him in all company:

To love Him always, heartily:

To dread Him always, Christianly:

To ask Him mercy, penitently:
To trust Him always, faithfully:
To obey Him always, willingly:
To abide Him always, patiently:
To thank Him always, thankfully:
To live here always, virtuously:
To use thy neighbour honestly:
To look for death still, presently:
To help the poor in misery:
To hope for heaven's felicity:
To have faith, hope, and charity:
To count this life but vanity:—
BE POINTS OF CHRISTIANITY.

WELCOME AND FAREWELL.—Our welcome of a stranger depends upon the name she bears, and upon the dress she wears: our farewell upon the spirit she has displayed in the interview.

HOW TO DESTROY ENEMIES.

The Emperor Sigismund was reproached for rewarding instead of destroying his enemies, as by that means he gave them an opportunity to injure him.

"What!" said the noble-minded monarch, "do I not destroy my enemies when I make them my friends?"

TAUGHT BY EXPERIENCE.—"No, sir," said a weary-looking man in a train to an individual by his side, "I wouldn't marry the best woman alive! I've been a draper too long for that."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

LES MAINS.—Your circulation should be promoted by attention to your general health. Eat warmth-giving food, take regular moderate exercise, and wear woollen combination garments next the skin. You should attend to your composition in writing. You say your "hands are most unsightly; even in June and July they do not entirely disappear." We would rather have "unsightly hands" than that they should "entirely disappear."

DADDLES.—The so-called "Star of Bethlehem," which elicited so much speculation and contradictory opinions last summer, was only Venns, which was the Evening Star of the time.

PANSY.—We think "tight-lacing" would prevent development of every sort; and in young girls this treatment is worse than insanity, as they should be absolutely free to move about and use every limb. The Swedish exercises, of which we recently spoke, taught at the college at Hampstead, would suit you very well.

CARRIE.—You do us very undeserved injustice in supposing that "perhaps we only find time to answer ladies and not poor girls." Evidently you do not "find time" to read our Answers, as you would have seen that they are continually addressed to girls in your own position. Your handwriting promises well, but it is not yet formed. You are too young and inexperienced to think of becoming a governess for some years to come.

ORIGINAL SUBSCRIBER.—Thomas Cooper published his own autobiography in 1872, not '82. He was a shoemaker of considerable talent and literary taste, and changed his trade for the profession of a schoolmaster. He was born in the year 1805, and is not mentioned as deceased in Vincent's "Dictionary of Biography." If a woman die intestate, and her father survive her, he is her heir.

SARAH A. WATSON.—Procure "The Girl's Own Indoor Book," just published, which deals with "Swiss darning and grafting." We have not space in our "Answers to Correspondents" to give such recipes.

MITIE.—St. Swithin was the Bishop of Winchester, and tutor to King Alfred. His wish was to be buried in the open air; but the monks, on the contrary, desired that it should be in the chancel of the cathedral. The tradition is that the saint sent a heavy rain on the 15th of July, the day appointed for the ceremony, which occasioned its postponement from day to day during forty days. Tired out with waiting, they buried him in the churchyard.

GEORGE.—You had better unite with some influential friends to induce him to enter an Inebriate Asylum, and all join in prayer for him, trusting in the Divine promise, "if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that ye shall ask, it shall be done for you of My Father which is in heaven."

SELVA.—Your verses, if not quite perfect as a poem, are much "approved" by us. We were touched by them. They are the simple expression of heartfelt, religious aspirations. You do not, however, mention your age, nor is the poem certified. Not that we feel any doubts as to its authorship, but all poems sent for our criticism are expected to be certified. We wish you God's blessing, and clearer light and peace on your heavenward way.

INTERROGATOR.—It is sometimes inexpedient to make a more than ordinary exhibition of prayer before others, as it tempts the irreligious to ridicule sacred matters, and reduce your influence with them. You should "not let your good be evil spoken of." To give up holy communion because you are weak in fearing religious persecution and trial would be wrong; and "two wrongs cannot make a right." Pray as usual night and morning in your own room, and you can take opportunities for private prayer at odd times as they may offer.

PEN, REN, OR REW (Reading).—The following are addresses of some of the Y.W.C.A. and G.F.A. Boarding Homes for young women (in business or otherwise). Welbeck House, 101, Mortimer Street, W.; St. Gabriel's Home, 34, Mortimer Street (Girls' Friendly); and the Brabazon Home for Female Employées, 8 and 9, South Crescent, Tottenham Court Road, W.C. (Girls' Friendly). These are all near Oxford and Regent Streets, W.

MISS E. COCKESHAM.—Yes, there is a charming "Home of Rest for Women in Business" at Babbacombe. Admission by payment of twelve shillings a week; or five shillings only with a subscriber's guinea ticket. Three weeks is the usual length of stay, but a longer period may be granted. Address the Misses Skinner, Bayfield, Babbacombe, South Devon. We believe that some portion of the fare by train is remitted; but you will have to inquire about this on application for admission.

YOUNG STUDENT.—There is an Art Students' Home at 4 and 5, Brunswick Square, London, W.C. Those attending other classes and training colleges are equally eligible for admission. The terms, inclusive, are a guinea a week for students not requiring separate rooms. A reduction is sometimes made. This home is under the presidency of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts; and the lady resident, Mrs. Malone, is at home to receive applicants from twelve to four o'clock, and at other times by special appointment.

A PUZZLED CORRESPONDENT.—Perhaps some of the trials from which you pray to be delivered are for your soul's good. "Let patience have her perfect work," pray for guidance and strength, and "Cast all your care," in this sense, upon Him who careth for you. Long prayers are not to be recommended, but frequent ones; pray while you "sit in the house and walk by the way," and during many of your daily avocations; but especially in moments of trial and the occurrence of evil thoughts and desires.

ANXIOUS MOTHER.—There is a ward for infants in the West-end Hospital for Paralysis, at 73, Welbeck Street, W.

SENGA.—We must refer you to our articles on "Carving, Gilding, and Picture Frame Making," G.O.P., vol. ii., page 139.

YE MERRIE MONTH OF MAIE should procure a small manual, the last issued, on the rules of lawn tennis, and the terms employed in it.

A GIRLS' CRICKET CLUB.

By ITS SECRETARY.

WE had a cricket match here, last Tuesday, girls with bats versus men with broomsticks.

It was the greatest fun imaginable. I know a good many people regard cricket as a most unlady-like and improper game for girls to play at; but it has always seemed to me that if the girls behave quietly, and only have friends for spectators, there can be no serious objection. I would like further to explain that we knew all the gentlemen very well indeed.

Now Edith (who is my cousin, and captain of our team) flatters herself that we have done a very praiseworthy act in introducing this game among the girls of this little town of Shepstock. For they really seemed to have no idea of healthy rational amusement. There is no tennis ground in the place, and the water never freezes enough to skate on, so they had no exercise of that kind, and the more sensible ones among them seemed to think that girls were meant to do housework, parish work, or needlework the whole day through. There was Mary Blackmore, the rector's niece; it was perfectly painful to see her toiling through the village day after day at her unselfish work. We should never have got her to join our club if her aunt had not sent her off, and declared it was good for Mary to learn how to play, and to think of something else in addition to "the parish."

Then there were the four Miss Lanceys, daughters of a large yeoman farmer in the place. They were nice, honest sort of girls, each with a character of her own. Miss Susan, the eldest, was gentle, calm, and cautious. Miss Lizzie was downright determinate, and liked her own way. Miss Fanny was lively, good-tempered, and had the most fun about her. Miss Nelly, the youngest, was sentimental, nervous, and always melancholy-looking. Their only notion of outdoor diversion had been occasionally to walk down to the sea, two and two, each dressed in a brilliant colour, like a set of harlequin tea-cups.

Their father, Mr. John Lancey, had good-naturedly said we might choose one of his fields to play in. So one fine day Edith and I had set forth on an exploring expedition, in the course of which we got over four quickset hedges and leaped various ditches, for Edith had a fondness for short cuts, which prevented her from allowing us to take any rational way from one field to another. Consequently by the time we had found a desirable though somewhat narrow field there was not so much left of our dresses as at starting, and Edith's hat had to be washed in the stream, after having fallen into a bog. In this condition did she insist on marching home down the village.

We borrowed some old bats, stumps, and a ball from my brothers, and collected the rest of our eleven. By this time Shepstock had had its curiosity much exercised. Half the people had never seen a game of cricket, for there is no men's club here, and being twelve miles from railway or town we are not very enlightened. It was "someat to do with a ball, and the first as could get hold of 'un throwed it after another one, and 'e had to run to git out o' the way; that there bat is to defend hisself with. Leastways, that's 'ow I've seen it played," was the opinion of an old farmer, who had been asked to explain the game to Shepstock minds.

Report said that the young ladies were going to assume knickerbockers to play in, and the Miss Lanceys anxiously asked me if this would be required of them, as they didn't think they "should quite like to do so." We accomplished a little in the way of rational dress, however, for it was found that tight, high-heeled boots, hats of foolscap-like height, waists two inches smaller than their right size, with similar personal embellishments, had to be given up by those who hoped to distinguish themselves. A little more colour came into the cheeks of some of them, and they took much interest in the game; but the first teaching was a long piece of work. Edith had got several copies of the cricket rules, and diagrams representing the position and names of the fielders. These she had distributed among the eleven, with injunctions to commit them to memory.

"But there were forty-seven rules," said Miss Nelly Lancey, plaintively, when her ignorance of them was reproachfully pointed out, "and we couldn't understand a bit what they all meant." She indicated the long list, with its continual mention of such mystifying things as "popping creases," "bowling creases," "overs," "innings," etc.

I undertook Miss Flaxman, our lawyer's sister, as a bowling pupil, while Edith initiated two others into the deep mysteries of batting.

"You see you must try to knock down that wicket," I said.

"But Fanny Lancey has got in the way with that bat. Get out of the way, Fanny, or I shall hit you!" which seemed so very improbable that Fanny need not so hastily have dropped the bat and fled away.

The balls went rather wide at first, and it was some time before a fielder could be induced to go in search of them. This mattered the less because neither batter could summon up courage to make a run, and self-preservation was usually their first instinct.

Edith's primary instructions were—"If you see a ball hit up off the bat, be sure and try to catch it." But after she had so scrupulously followed her own directions that the next ball (luckily not a hard one) came in her face, and she escaped a black eye by the narrowest chance, these directions modified into—

"Don't attempt on any account to take a catch; somebody's sure to get killed if they do. If you see the ball coming, get out of the way as quickly as possible till it falls."

Nelly Lancey was the next bowler, and she developed so much energy that it ended in both bats firmly refusing to remain at the wicket while she bowled. The first ball was so good an aim at Fanny's head, that it was really well she had sufficient presence of mind to sit down promptly on the ground, and the next one took the wicket-keeper smartly on the fingers. Then I bowled myself for a little bit, and watched Edith, who had her hands full between the fields who didn't field, and the bats who didn't hit.

"Now, do try and get the next ball!" she implored of Fanny. "You haven't touched one yet."

Fanny took a violent slash at it, succeeded, gave a shriek to Mary Blackmore, who was the other bat, and each began to rush wildly across, flinging down their bats. There was a collision, and they fell over each other, recovering in time to hear Edith shouting frantically from the side of the field—

"Mary, Mary, bring the bat! The ball has gone into the brook!"

So it had, and our gallant captain in her excitement was near following it head foremost; but fortunately Jenny Flaxman secured her by the jacket tails, and after much fishing the ball was recovered.

This was a little incident which was frequently repeated, as we got to hit further, for the field was narrow and the brook ran all down one side.

Our play rapidly improved after the first three practices, and we sometimes allowed the rector and his wife, or one or two friends, to come and behold. Young Mrs. Brace, the curate's wife, was so much smitten with the charms of the game, that she slyly stole down to the field, and after watching to see that there were no Sunday-school children about, she took a bat and made a long score.

There were still a few peculiarities about our cricket; but these were mere trifles, such, for example, as the tendency of certain young ladies when making runs to utter a succession of little shrieks all across the pitch until they had arrived safely; the novel method of fielding invented by Fanny Lancey, which was to stick your heel firmly in the ground, toe in the air, right in front of the ball and let it bounce off your foot. There was a prejudice in favour of carrying the ball from one hand to another instead of throwing it, because, as Lizzie Lancey justly observed—

"SHE PREFERRED STRIKING ORNAMENTAL ATTITUDES, BAT IN AIR."

"THE COLONEL STOOD FIELDING."

"No one ever caught the ball if you did throw it, so it saved time to carry it."

"But it's not the correct way of playing," I objected.

"It answers the purpose better," said Lizzie, who continued to carry about the ball, in spite of all remonstrance.

Two or three of them preferred batting with their eyes shut; but as this really made very little difference in their play, Edith let them alone.

Then we received and accepted the gentlemen's challenge. My three brothers, young Blackmore, Mr. Brace, the curate, the Irish doctor and his brother, Colonel Mackway, and three others, were arrayed against us, and we permitted a few friends to come as spectators.

We took blue for our colour, and most of us turned out in white flannels and sailor hats, with bunches of forget-me-nots as badges.

Old John Lancey had come to see his daughters play, and Edith presently adorned him with a blue ribbon and a spray of forget-me-not, and explained to him that now he wore our colours he must stick up for our side on every occasion, and loudly applaud any feats of skill.

Mr. Brace was captain on the other side, and decided that we should go in to bat first.

So the gentlemen went out to field, and Susan Lancey and Miss Flaxman bore up their bats to the wicket, there assuming a correct and player-like position.

The rest of us sat in the shade under a large chestnut tree and instructed Mrs. Brace in the way of keeping score; also directing the applause at fit moments, and providing Mr. John Lancey with cutting epithets to shout at the other side.

"Now you must call out 'Butterfingers,'" said Edith, as Alfred let an easy catch fall through his hands.

"Now then, butterfingers!" halloed the obedient pupil.

"Oh, well hit, Miss Lancey. Run it out, run it out!" Mr. Lancey, please to applaud. Mr. Blackmore, I wish you would make more noise."

The rector, thus exhorted, proceeded to shout a little, and clap his hands.

"Will that do, Miss Edith?"

"Thank you. Now again, please. Oh, do call 'Well muffed' at Dr. Power. Isn't he clumsy? Why, we shall beat you all to nothing, Colonel Mackway!"

The Colonel, who stood fielding not far away, with his hat drawn over his eyes, turned round and flatteringly observed that, with such superior science, and the advantage of possessing Miss Colwyn for captain, nothing else could be expected. He was a most charming old man; none of the young ones could approach him in looks, and his old-fashioned courtesy was perfect. It was delightful to see the artless way in which the Colonel would contrive to drop a good catch, or let a ball slip by; and presently the mortified air he assumed when, in wielding his broomstick, it was found that somehow or other he had hit down his wicket.

"NOVEL METHOD OF FIELDING INVENTED BY FANNY LANCEY."

Lancey's wicket. She had, however, made eight runs herself, and had steadily blocked many difficult balls, which was pretty well considering the state of nervousness she had been reduced to. Mary Blackmore went in next, but, as she preferred striking ornamental attitudes, bat in air, to defending her wicket, she did not stay there for long.

I took her place, and made a hit for three runs, after which Dr. Power stumped me for being out of ground; a bad turn I promised to remember against him.

When Lizzie Lancey's time came, she was so determined to hit something if not the ball, that in a few minutes the turf round the wicket was full of large holes; she inflicted a severe bruise upon Alfred, who was wicket-keeping, and finally, alas! hit off her own balls.

Then our side went out rapidly, one after another; even Edith only making six runs.

Mr. Brace, who was noted as the best bowler in the county, was mean enough to take the ball himself, so the last six wickets fell with fatal quickness, and the score stood at forty.

After lunch we had to turn out and field for the gentlemen. They did not touch one ball in three, but if a hit was made, the broomsticks seemed more effective than bats. Mr. Brace hit a ball into the next field at the very beginning. He had to go and get it out himself, but we were obliged to allow him six for the exploit.

To my great delight I was able to take Dr. Power's wicket with the first ball, which disgusted him a good deal; and the leisurely, contemptuous way in which Alfred sauntered across the pitch caused him presently to be run out, with a duck's egg representing his score.

We had altered our pitch, so that the ball no longer went into the brook, but there were certain nettle beds that were not much more desirable. The ball kept going into them, in which case it generally fell to my lot to fetch it out. Edith was bowler, after the first, and the other girls were base enough to fight shy of those nettles, and would, I verily believe, have sacrificed the honour and glory of our side sooner than put up with a few paltry nettle stings. Some of the men magnanimously volunteered to field the nettle beds for us, but of course this offer was firmly refused. We could not accept assistance from the enemy in that way; blistered fingers must be endured.

Slowly enough, yet steadily, we got through the team of our opponents, until the last man came in, Archie Blackmore. Their score was only thirty, so we had good hope of winning, but unluckily young Blackmore and Mr. Flaxman proved a very strong combination.

Mr. Flaxman blocked every ball, and the other, who was far too skilful with his broomstick, made the hits, and broke two broomsticks over them. They got to thirty-eight, and then did not seem able to make any more runs; still we could not take their wicket, or get them out any way.

The excitement was intense. They ran a rather risky bye and got to thirty-nine. We thought all hope was over, and Edith's bowling became slightly wild. Mr. Flaxman stepped out to a ball, and gave a hard whack at it, but point stopped it so cleverly that there was no chance for a run. Then Archie sent a splendid little catch, but nobody was able to take it.

"Here!" cries Mr. John Lancey, springing into the field, "give me the ball. I'll not stand by and have the lasses beaten! I'll bowl him out; I'm your side. 'Tisn't fair play, Mr. Blackmore."

He snatched up the ball, and the next minute Archie's bails skipped into the air.

"There," said Mr. John, delivering the ball into Edith's hands with a satisfied air, "you've won the match."

"Now is that fair?" said Archie, appealingly.

"Time is up," said Mr. Blackmore, who was umpire.

"I congratulate you, ladies, on having won," says Colonel Mackway, making us a low bow.

We accepted the congratulations, and allowed it to be considered that we had won; though we had strong doubts as to what the result would have been had that ball been in other hands than Mr. Lancey's.

The stumps were drawn, and we afterwards received many compliments as to our play and technical knowledge of the game.

Colonel Mackway called to ask after us next day, and declared he had been mortally afraid the whole time of damaging one of us, and was never so thankful in his life as when the match came to an end without a young lady also having done so. Mrs. Mackway, who weighs some fourteen stone, is so much charmed with the game that she thinks of joining the club. I fancy she would make a substantial long-stop.

"To my dying day," says Alfred, "I shall probably retain the impression which Miss Lizzie Lancey has made on my foot."

I don't think the club will last much longer, for Dr. Power and Alfred have decided to make a tennis ground somewhere, in which case we shall probably change our game.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER III.

HATTY.

HE brief silence was broken by Edna.

"What a nice boy your brother is!" she observed in rather a patronising tone.

Bessie looked up in some surprise.

"Tom does not consider himself a boy, I assure you; he is twenty, and ever since he has gone to Oxford he thinks himself of great consequence. I daresay we spoil him amongst us, as he is our only brother now. If Frank had lived," and here Bessie sighed, "he would have been five and twenty by this time; but he died four years ago. It was such a blow to poor father and mother, he was so good and clever, and he was studying for a doctor, but he caught a severe chill, and congestion of the lungs came on, and in a few days he was dead. I don't think mother has ever been quite the same since his death—Frank was so much to her."

"How very sad," returned Edna, sympathetically, for Bessie's eyes had grown soft and misty as she touched this chord of sadness; "it must be terrible to lose anyone whom one loves." And then she added with a smile, "I did not mean to hurt your feelings by calling your brother a boy, but he seemed very young to me; you see I am engaged, and Mr. Sinclair (that is my fiancé) is nearly thirty, and he is so grave and quiet that anyone like your brother seems like a boy beside him."

"You are engaged?" ejaculated Bessie, in an awe-struck tone.

"Yes; it seems a pity, does it not?—at least mamma says so; she thinks I am too young and giddy to know my own mind; and yet she is very fond of Neville—Mr. Sinclair, I mean. She will have it that we are not a bit suited to each other, and I daresay she is right, for certainly we do not think alike on a single point."

Bessie's eyes opened rather widely at this candid statement. She was a simple little soul, and had not yet learnt the creed of emancipation. She held the old-fashioned views that her mother had held before her. Her mother seldom talked on these subjects, and Bessie had inherited this reticence. She listened with a sort of wondering disgust when her girl acquaintances chattered flipantly about their lovers and boasted openly of their power over them.

"If this sort of thing ever comes to me," thought Bessie on these occasions, "I shall think it too wonderful and precious to make it the subject of idle conversation. How can anyone take upon themselves the responsibility of another human being's happiness—for that is what it really means—and turn it into a jest; it is far too sacred and beautiful a thing for such treatment. I think mother is right when she says, 'girls of the present day have so little reticence.'"

She hardly knew what to make of Edna's speech; it was not exactly flip-pant, but it seemed so strange to hear so young a creature speak in that cool matter-of-fact way.

"I don't see how people are to get on together, if they do not think alike," she observed, in a perplexed voice; but Edna only laughed.

"I am afraid we don't get on. Mother says she never saw such a couple; that we are always quarrelling and making up like two children; but I put it to you, Miss Lambert, how are things to be better? I am used to my own way, and Mr. Sinclair is used to his; I like fun and plenty of change, and dread nothing so much as being bored—ennuyée, in fact, and he is all for quiet. Then he is terribly clever, and has every sort of knowledge at his fingers' end. He is a barrister and rising in his profession, and I seldom open a book unless it be a novel."

"I wonder why he chose you," observed Bessie, naïvely, and Edna seemed much amused by her frankness.

"Oh, how deliciously downright you are, Miss Lambert. Well, do you know I have not the faintest notion why Neville asked me to marry him, any more than I know why I listened to him. I tell him sometimes that it was the most ridiculous mistake in the world, and that either he or I or both of us must have been bewitched. I am really very sorry for him sometimes, I do make him so unhappy, and sometimes I am sorry for myself. But there, the whole thing is beyond my comprehension; if I could alter myself or alter Neville, things would be more comfortable and less unpleasantly exciting." And here Edna laughed again and then stifled another yawn, and this time Bessie declared she would not stop a moment longer, Christine would be asleep.

"Well, perhaps I should only talk nonsense if you remained, and I can see you are easily shocked, so I will allow you to wish me good-night." But, to Bessie's surprise, Edna kissed her affectionately.

"You have been a good Samaritan to me," she said, quietly, "and I am really very grateful." And Bessie withdrew, touched by the unexpected caress.

"What a strange mixture she is," she thought, as she softly closed the door. "I think she must have been badly brought up; perhaps her mother has spoiled her. I fancy she is affectionate by nature, but she is worldly, and cares too much for pleasure; anyhow one cannot help being interested in her." But here she broke off abruptly as she passed a half-opened door, and a voice from within summoned her.

"Oh, Hatty, you naughty child, are you awake? Do you know it is nearly twelve o'clock?"

"What does that matter?" returned Hatty, fretfully, as Bessie groped her way carefully towards the bed. "I could not sleep until you had said good-night to me. I suppose you had forgotten me; you never thought I was lying here waiting for you, while you were talking to Miss Sefton."

"Now, Hatty, I hope you are not going to be tiresome," and Bessie's voice was a little weary; and then she relented, and said, gently, "You know I never forget you, Hatty, dear."

"No, of course not," returned the other, eagerly. "I did not mean to be cross. Put your head down beside me on the pillow, Bessie, darling, for I know you are just as tired as possible. You don't mind stopping with me for a few minutes, do you? for I have not spoken to you for three weeks."

"No, I am not so tired as all that, and I am quite comfortable," as a thin, soft cheek laid itself against hers in the darkness. "What has gone wrong, Hatty, dear? for I know by your tone you have been making yourself miserable about something. You have wanted me back to scold you into cheerfulness."

"I have wanted you dreadfully," sighed Hatty. "Mother and Christine have been very kind, but they don't help me as you do, and Tom teases me dreadfully. What do you think he said yesterday to mother? I was in the room and heard him myself; he actually said, 'I wonder my father allows you all to spoil Hatty as you do. You all give into her, however cross and unreasonable she is, and so her temper gets worse every day.'"

"Well, you are very often cross, you know," returned Bessie, truthfully.

"Yes, but I try not to be," replied Hatty, with a little sob. "Tom would have been cross too if his head and back had ached as mine were aching, but he always feels well and strong; I think it is cruel of him to say such things to mother, when he knows how much I have to suffer."

"Tom did not mean to be unkind, Hatty; you are always finding fault with the poor boy. It is difficult for a young man, who does not know what an ache means nor what it is to wake up tired, to realise what real suffering all your little ailments cause you. Tom is really very kind and good-natured, only your sharp little speeches irritate him."

"I am always irritating someone," moaned Hatty. "I can't think how any of you can love me. I often cry myself to sleep, to think how horrid and disagreeable I have been in the day. I make good resolutions then, but the next morning I am as bad as ever, and then I think it is no use trying any more. Last night Tom made me so unhappy that I could not say my prayers."

"Poor little Hatty."

"Yes, I know you are sorry for me; you are such a dear, that I cannot be as cross with you as I am with Tom; but, Bessie, I wish you would comfort me a little; if you would only tell me that I am not so much to blame."

"We have talked that over a great many times before. You know what I think, Hatty; you are not to blame for your weakness, that is a trial laid upon you; but you are to blame if that weakness is so impatiently borne that it leads you to sin."

"I am sure father thinks that I cannot help my irritability; he never will let Tom scold me if he is in the room."

"That is because father is so kind, and he knows you have such a hard time of it, you poor child, and that makes us all so sorry for you; but, Hatty, you must not let all this love spoil you; we are patient with you because we know your weakness, but we cannot help you if you do not help yourself. Don't you recollect what dear Mr. Robertson said in his sermon: that 'harassed nerves must be striven against, as we strive against anything that hinders our daily growth in grace?' He said people were more tolerant of this form of weakness than of any other, and yet it caused much misery in homes; and he went on to tell us that every irritable word left unspoken, every peevish complaint hushed, was as real a victory as though we had done some great thing. 'If we must suffer,' he said, 'at least let us suffer quietly, and not spend our breath in fruitless complaint; people will avoid a fretful person as though they were plague-tainted, and why? because they trouble the very atmosphere round them, and no one can enjoy peace in their neighbourhood.'"

"I am sure Mr. Robertson must have meant me, Bessie."

"No, darling, no; I won't have you exaggerate or judge yourself too harshly. You are not always cross, or we should not be so fond of you. You make us sad sometimes, when you sit apart, brooding over some imaginary grievance; that is why father calls you little Miss Much-Afraid."

"Yes, you all laugh at me, but indeed the darkness is very real; sometimes I wonder why I have been sent into the world, if I am not to be happy myself, nor to make other people happy. You are like a sunbeam yourself, Bessie, and so you hardly understand what I mean."

"Oh, yes I do; but I never see any good in putting questions that we cannot answer; only I am quite sure you have your duty to do, quite as much as I have mine, only you have not found it out."

"Perhaps I am the thorn in the flesh to discipline you all into patience," returned Hatty, quaintly, for she was not without humour.

"Very well then, my thorn, fulfil your mission," returned Bessie, kissing her. "But I cannot keep awake and speak words of wisdom any longer." And she scrambled over the bed, and with another cheerful "good-night," vanished; but Hatty's troubled thoughts were lulled by sisterly sympathy, and she soon slept peacefully.

Late as it was before Bessie laid her weary head on the pillow beside her sleeping sister, it was long before her eyes closed and she sank into utter forgetfulness. Her mind seemed crowded with vague images and disconnected thoughts; recollections of the hours spent in Sheen Valley, the weird effect of the dusky figures passing and repassing in the dim, uncertain light, the faint streaks of light across the snow, the dull winter sky, the eager welcome of the lonely girl, the long friendly talk ripening into budding intimacy, all passed vividly before her, followed by Hatty's artless confession.

"Poor little thing," thought Bessie, compassionately, for there was a specially soft place in her heart for Hatty. She had always been her particular charge. All Hatty's failures, her miserable derelictions of duty, her morbid self-accusations and nervous fancies, bred of a sickly body and over anxious temperament, were breathed into Bessie's sympathising ear. Hatty's feebleness borrowed strength and courage from Bessie's vigorous counsels. She felt braced by mere contact with such a strong healthy organisation. She was always less fretful and impatient when Bessie was near; her cheery influence cleared away many a cloud that threatened to obscure Hatty's horizon.

"Bear ye one another's burdens," was a command literally obeyed by Bessie in her unselfish devotion to Hatty, her self-sacrificing efforts to cheer and rouse her; but she never could be made to understand that there was any merit in her conduct.

"I know Hatty is often cross, and ready to take offence," she would say; "but I think we ought to make allowances for her. I don't think we realise how much she has to bear—that she never feels well."

"Oh, that is all very well," Christine would answer, for she had a quick temper too, and would fire up after one of Hatty's sarcastic little speeches; "but it is time Hatty learnt self-control. I daresay you are often tired after your Sunday class, but no one hears a cross word from you."

"Oh, I keep it all in," Bessie returned, laughing. "But I daresay I feel cross all the same. I don't think any of us can guess what it must be to wake depressed and languid every morning; a louder voice than usual does not make our heads ache. Yet I have seen Hatty wince with pain when Tom indulged in one of his laughs."

"Yes, I know," replied Christine, only half convinced by this. "Of course it is very trying, but Hatty must be used to it by this time, for she has never been strong from a baby; and yet she is always bemoaning herself, as though it were something fresh."

"It is not easy to get used to this sort of trouble," answered Bessie, rather sadly. "And I must say I always feel very sorry for Hatty," and so the conversation closed.

But in her heart Bessie said, "It is all very well to preach patience, and I for one am always preaching it to Hatty, but it is not so easy to practise it. Mother and Christine are always praising me for being so good-tempered; but if one feels strong and well, and has a healthy appetite and good digestion, it is very easy to keep from being cross; but in other ways I am not half so good as Hatty; she is the purest, humblest little soul breathing."

In spite of late hours, Bessie was downstairs the next morning at her usual time; she always presided at the breakfast table. Since her eldest son's death, Mrs. Lambert had lost much of her strength and energy, and though her husband refused to acknowledge her as an invalid, or to treat her as one, yet most of her duties had devolved upon Bessie, whose youthful energy supplemented her mother's failing powers.

Bessie had briefly hinted at the family sorrow; she was not one at any time to dwell upon her feelings, nor to indulge in morbid retrospection, but it was true that the loss of that dearly-loved son and brother had clouded the bright home atmosphere. Mrs. Lambert had borne her trouble meekly, and had striven to comfort her husband, who had broken down under the sudden blow. She spoke little, even to her daughters, of the grief that was slowly consuming her; but as time went on, and Dr. Lambert recovered his cheerfulness, he noticed that his wife drooped and ailed more than usual; she had grown into slow, quiet ways that seemed to point to failing strength.

"Bessie, your mother is not as young as she used to be," he said, abruptly, one morning. "She does not complain, but then she is not one of the complaining sort; she was always a quiet creature; but you girls must put your shoulders to the wheel, and spare her as much as possible." And from that day Bessie had become her mother's crutch.

It was a wonderful relief to the harassed mother when she found a confidante to whom she could pour out all her anxieties.

Dr. Lambert was not a rich man; his practice was large, but many of his patients were poor, and he had heavy expenses. The hilly roads and long distances obliged him to keep two horses. He had sent both his sons to Oxford, thinking a good education would be their best inheritance, and this had obliged him to curtail domestic expenses. He was a careful man, too, who looked forward to the future, and thought it his duty to lay aside a yearly sum to make provision for his wife and children.

"I have only one son now, and Hatty will be always a care, poor child," he said more than once.

So, though there was always a liberal table kept in the doctor's house, it being Dr. Lambert's theory that growing girls needed plenty of nourishing food, the young people were taught economy in every other matter. The girls dressed simply and made their own gowns. Carpets and furniture grew the worse for wear, and were not always replaced at once. Tom grumbled sometimes when one of his Oxford friends came to dinner. He and Christine used to bewail the shabby covers in the drawing-room.

"It is such a pretty room if it were only furnished off a bit," Tom said once; "why don't you girls coax the governor to let you do it up?" Tom never used the word governor unless he was in a grumbling mood, for he knew how his father hated it.

"I don't think father can afford anything this year, Tom," Bessie returned in her fearless way. "Why do you ask your grand friends if you think they will look down on us? We don't pretend to be rich people; they will find the chairs very comfortable if they will condescend to sit on them, and the tables as strong as other people's tables; and though the carpet is a little faded, there are no holes to trip your friends up."

"Oh, shut up, Betty," returned Tom, restored to good humour by her honest sarcasm. "Ferguson will come if I ask him; I think he is a bit taken with old Chrissy." And so ended the argument.

THE PRINCESS LOUISE HOME.

OUR many friends and kind readers have shown so much interest in the Princess Louise Home that we cannot refrain from acquainting them with its present unsatisfactory condition. By "unsatisfactory" we mean nothing derogatory to its inmates, but simply that it will be no longer their Home after Christmas, unless, in God's good providence, a debt of £600 can be paid before that usually happy season. It is, in fact, to be closed. A portion of this sum has been collected or promised, but the whole is far from being realised. We have all done our best for many years to aid in supporting this now tottering house, and, from our first bazaar to this present time, our efforts have been blessed in many ways. At the annual meeting last summer it was delightful to be greeted by several of the girls who had been admitted to the Home through the contributions of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, and to learn that others were doing well in respectable situations. Over a dozen have been thus maintained and saved, humanly speaking, from lives of extreme poverty and temptation. It was truly satisfactory to see one of these, our particular protégées, come forward to receive the first prize for good conduct, awarded to her by the general vote of her companions. They all acknowledged her to be "the best girl in the school," and she modestly showed us a guinea's worth of handsome books, presented by a well-known firm. But our pleasure was counterbalanced by pain, for, in spite of all our efforts, the number of our young friends had greatly diminished. Instead of the desired hundred there were only between fifty and sixty. Still, they made a goodly show in their neat print gowns and white straw hats, which, we were not slow to perceive, were the same they had worn the year before, as well as on all other festive occasions. But, in addition, they had a band of black crape round their sleeves, in memory of the lately-deceased Emperor of Germany, son-in-law of their beloved Queen, and brother-in-law of their dear Princess Louise. We will only hope that it may not have been a premonitory sign of mourning for the breaking up of their old Home at Woodside. For the last fifty years the "Auld House" has been filled with young girls, rescued from many perils and rejoicing in a healthful and happy life. It will indeed be sad if its doors are closed to all future claimants, and its present inmates turned adrift to seek new habitations. It is true that the demands on the charitable are great, and continually increasing; still, this "National Society for the Protection of Young Girls" will not, we hope, be allowed to die for lack of a few hundred pounds to keep it alive.

A SHORT STORY FOR WORKING GIRLS.

By RUTH LAMB.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. BECKETT was not unprepared for this talk with Richard, but she listened patiently whilst he repeated all the arguments he had already used in speaking to Milly. To his credit be it spoken, he also told all that his pretty sweetheart had urged in reply.

"And now, mother, what do you think about this matter? Will you have Milly and me with you, or shall we have a little place to ourselves?"

"I will answer your questions as they come, Dick. First, I think you are a lucky lad in having gained the affection of such a good, sensible girl as Milly Burton. Most young things like her, and with so much to make them ready to run away from the home they have, to what they hope will be a better, would not stop to think. They would leap first and look when it was too late. She has good sense and judgment, beyond what could have been expected from a girl brought up as she has been. I am very fond of Milly, and if I am spared I mean to be a second mother to her."

"Then you mean to have us here with you?" cried Dick, joyfully.

"I have not reached your second question yet, and before I do let me ask you one. Are you coming to me because you want my advice, and mean to be guided by it? or do you mean to follow your inclination at any cost? Your second question sounded like an intention to please yourself in one of two ways, and only leaves me to say which I think the better, when I suppose you will fall in with it. Dick, I cannot advise either way yet, though with all my heart I consider Milly worth having and worth waiting for. Listen, my boy. When I was a young girl like Milly, I was tempted as you are tempting her, to act rashly and contrary to common sense. Thank God I was kept from yielding, by the kind advice of my good mistress, for I had no mother living, though at first I had thought it such a fine thing to get married, and have a house of my own, and nobody to order me about. My mistress was kinder to me than I deserved. She put everything down on paper, and showed me the very best that could be done with the money that could be reckoned on. It was the having it all before me in black and white that taught me where I stood. As a servant in a fine, well-managed house, I had plenty of good food without need for a thought as to providing or paying for it. Fire-light, furniture, lodging, never cost me a minute's anxiety. All were there, paid for by others, and coming to me as free as the air I breathed, so far as paying was concerned. I could dress neatly, for I had fair wages regularly paid, and my mistress always tried to get us servants to save, if it were ever so little. I was used to seeing all kinds of things brought into the house in large quantities, coals by many a load at once into the great cellars, and the store-room shelves were like a shop to look at. Well, my mistress not only showed me how much money could be spared out of twenty shillings a week for each necessary article, but she had the groceries, and meat, and coals weighed out, so that I might see for myself what I should have to work upon, and how careful I must be, with rent, clothes, and many other matters still to provide out of the wages. Even this was looking at the best side, for it was supposing that the home was furnished with every necessary, and that both of us kept well and needed no doctor; that work never failed, and there were no children to provide for. My mistress saw that I looked grave, and then she laid a kind hand on my shoulder and said, 'Sarah, you must not think I go against marriage. I am a very happy wife and mother myself, and I do believe that where people love God, love each other, and make a prudent beginning, it is the most blessed state of all. But would a marriage with George Needham mean all this?' I hung my head at the question. The young man was about your present age, and I was much such a girl as Milly, only not so pretty. He had a very handsome face, and a gay, merry way with him, that made him a favourite with most of the girls. I think it was partly this that pleased me, and it touched my vanity to think that he should want me rather than some that were a great deal better-looking than I was. But as to his being a good God-fearing man, I knew he was nothing of the kind. Talk of his going to church on a Sunday, and he would have laughed and said, 'I prefer a church with a chimney,' or, 'I can say my prayers out of doors in the green fields better than in a stuffy old place like that.' I doubted whether he believed in saying prayers at all, and even before my mistress said anything, this thought had made me uncomfortable, and inclined to doubt him. Then about furnishing a home. I knew every penny of my savings would have to go for that if I married George, and a poor, bare little place it would be at the best, with more wants in it than anything else. My mistress saw that her words had set me thinking, so she did not add to them. She only said, 'I wish to be your true friend, Sarah, and if I could see that the prospect before you was a good one, no one would rejoice over it more than I should. What I ask is that you will think of what I have said, and pray for still better guidance from the best of all friends, your Father in heaven.' I did think, and I asked to be led in the right way; and looking back after many years, I know that I was graciously answered. When George came again I thanked him, but said I had made up my mind not to marry until I was a few years older. He asked me if I expected him to wait for me, for if I did I should be mistaken. It was now or never with him, and there were plenty of girls that would be ready to take him if he only held up his finger to beckon them. It made me blush to hear him say this, for it must be a bad thing when men hold girls so cheaply, and I told George I was sorry to hear him speak in such a manner of other girls, for it showed he could not respect them as a right-minded man ought to do. For myself, I neither expected nor wished him to wait on my account, and I told him that neither now nor at any time could I consent to be his wife. He was very angry at this, and said taunting words, such as 'There are as good fish left in the sea as any that have been taken out,' and that I had no call to set myself up as if I were better or prettier than other people. That I had drawn him on just to throw him over, and then boast that I would not have him, with a great deal more of the same kind. I felt sorry, for conscience told me that I had been pleased at his following me and singling me out from the rest, and I have no doubt that if no kind friend like my mistress had led me first to think and then to pray, I should have married George, and rued doing so all my life after. So I just begged that he would forgive me if I had done anything to mislead him, before I knew my own mind, and I promised that I would never tell anyone that he had asked me to be his wife. This soothed him a little, for I think it vexed him more to be refused than to lose me. I kept my word, and when on the very next Sunday I met George with Fanny Atkins hanging on his arm, I felt no anger, though he whispered something to her and they both laughed; whilst Fanny gave her head a little scornful toss at me as I passed. It was soon said that George had left my plain face for her pretty one, and that I had tried to gain him for a husband, but had missed my mark. I never contradicted these tales. They only helped to make me thankful that my eyes had been opened in time. My good mistress cheered and encouraged me. 'In after years you will look back and feel that you have had an escape from a temptation, and that the yielding to it would have cost you lifelong suffering,' she said. I believed this, and I had cause to be sure of it later on. Only a week after I met George Needham with Fanny Atkins their banns were published, and they were married as soon as possible. Poor Fanny! I felt sorry for her many a time after, for she had nothing, and her start in married life was worse even than mine would have been. I will not tell you all, but you can picture a good deal for yourself, seeing there are only too many similar cases round about us to-day. Neither husband nor wife had the fear of God before their eyes. He was reckless, selfish, and often unsteady. She was ignorant of household matters, and had little to manage with—far too little to meet real needs, and that was not turned to the best account. When her fourth child was born I had such a pitiful letter from her, in which she prayed me, for the sake of old times when we were girls together, to go to her. See, here is the very letter. I have kept it, though she that wrote it has been dead for many a year."

Richard Beckett held out his hand for the poor faded scrawl which his mother offered him to read, as she paused in her story. He had hard work to make it out, but he did at last. Part of it was as follows:—

"I am left all by myself, for George has gone away. They say he has 'listed.' He often said he would do. I have another baby, a fortnight old, but I am so weak I cannot get up from my bed. I sometimes think I never shall again. I should have starved and died, but for neighbours who have been good to me, and brought me little things from day to day. Do come and see me! We were girls together, only you had most sense, and would not—"

Here there was a break, and then the words, "do come just once;" and the name "Fanny Needham."

Richard folded the soiled paper and returned it to his mother, saying, "I suppose you went to the poor thing?"

"I did, Richard, and found a hollow-checked, miserable skeleton of a woman, lying on a mere heap of straw and rags on the floor, and pressing a wailing baby to her breast. She had been married just five years, and was not four and twenty, but she might have been my present age, her face was so worn and old-looking with sorrow, want, and suffering. There were traces on the floor as if another heap of straw had been removed; and so it had. It was the children's bed, and had been carried to another miserable dwelling close by, to which people almost as poor, but wondrously pitiful, had taken the little ones, that they might not disturb the mother by their wants and cries. Fanny was not really strong enough to talk to me, but she would tell me her sad story, 'because,' she pleaded, 'I may never have another chance, and I want you to know all about it now.'

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

CHAPTER III.
THE PROHIBITED NET.

ONE May day, seven years later, Noah sat outside his ark mending his eel-net, while at the door Mrs. Oldman was standing knitting, and looking from time to time at her daughter Eve, who, seated on a little milking stool, was reading from "Paradise Lost"

It was a hot day, such as one rarely gets in the now well-abused month of May, and the air was warm and fragrant with the blossoms of the "faint sweet cuckoo-flowers," which grew in the grass, and looked fainter than ever in contrast with the rich burning yellow of the marsh marigolds gleaming along the river banks; the poplars and willows, the only trees near the ark, were bursting into leaf, the soft fluffy catkins of the palm-willow had long been out, and the cuckoo was already grown weary some with his incessant monotonous cry from early morning to sunset; most of the summer birds had arrived, and the swallows were flying about in pairs, the starlings building, as usual, in Noah's reed-thatched ark, and some butterflies—tortoiseshells and peacocks—had ventured forth from their winter quarters, and, with some newly-fledged cabbage-whites, were disporting themselves in the air, all nature rejoicing at the return of summer, while the thrushes and black-birds sung an accompaniment to Eve's reading. Noah was evidently listening intently to his favourite poet, but Mrs. Oldman had not much soul for poetry, and was apparently much more interested in her daughter, on whom her eyes rested with motherly pride.

And well they might, for you might walk many a weary mile before you came across a prettier sight than Eve Oldman as she sits on her three-legged stool, her beautiful head bent slightly over her book, the sun kindling the rich masses of her wavy, bright brown hair into auburn as they escaped from the white cotton sun-bonnet which protected her face and its creamy complexion from getting sunburnt. Her colouring was rich rather than delicate; her cheeks were a deep pink, her lips blood red, her eyes that grey which sometimes looks blue, sometimes brown, sometimes violet—the loveliest and most dangerous of all eyes—and Eve's, to make them more bewitching, were veiled with long, dark lashes, and laughed, and cried, and flashed, and smiled, and drooped, and glanced, and looked tender, or confiding, or happy, or sad, just as their owner wished; dimples marked her rounded cheeks, and the red-brown hair clustered in soft little natural curls, many times removed from a fringe, over her pretty white forehead, by no means remarkable for its intellect, though Eve was no fool, and, thanks to her foster-sister Grace Leicester and her father's friend Adam Day, was far better educated than most girls of her class. Her hands were small and well-formed, and, if accustomed to hard work, bore no traces of it, but as a matter of fact they never did any harder work than peeling potatoes or making Norfolk dumplings and bread, for Mrs. Oldman would never let her do anything harder, but though, as she frankly owned, no scholar herself, liked her daughter to read and write and do all that Miss Grace did; and many were the disputes Noah and his wife had had on this point; but though on every other subject his will was law, yet where Eve was concerned Noah always inclined to the side of leniency; and if on the one hand he argued that Miss Grace did many things and learnt many things that were not befitting Eve's position, on the other he was the first to grant Miss Grace never did anything wrong, or learnt anything that could do Eve harm; so if Grace played the piano Eve played the organ, and had acted as organist for the last two years; and if Grace knew French and Italian Eve had learnt Latin with Adam, and still read with him almost every evening.

"Father," said Eve, suddenly, "is Adam coming to set the net with you to-night?"

"No, I can't set it to-night, I shan't have finished mending it," said Noah.

"Haven't you another net, father? There is one in the shed which looks better than that."

"Ah, so it is, but it is too small a mesh; I had it new the year before the Act was passed for the preservation of pike and small fish."

"Couldn't you use it just for one night?"

"Certainly not; it is an inch smaller than the Act allows; and if it were found out, who would believe I had only used it for once?" said Noah.

"Use it, my dear child," said Mrs. Oldman; "you might as well ask your father to steal Mr. Leicester's fowls, which, for all the care they take of them, he might easily do, or to go poaching, or to get drunk, as to use that net; why, he's the only man on the broads that hasn't made a fuss to get the Act altered except Adam Day, and he was too young at the time besides not being an eel man. Lor' a mercy me, the talk there would be if Noah was to do such a thing even for one night! Why, if it was found out they'd say he was the veriest humbug living."

"And say right too, if I were to break the law which I have always upheld, but Eve is too young to remember all the ill feeling that Act caused, or she would not have suggested it. Go on reading, my child."

"In a minute, father. I want to know what you and Adam are going to do this evening first."

"I suspect it is Adam's movements you are interested in far more than mine," said Noah, with an amused smile, as he glanced at his pretty daughter.

"Oh no it isn't," said Eve, with a blush, and just the faintest little toss of her pretty head, which only her mother noticed and interpreted accordingly.

"Well, we are going to see after the decoy we are making, which, as you know, is to make our fortune and enable Adam to go to college if he fails to get this open scholarship he is trying for."

"Ah! decoy, indeed! There wasn't much cause for you to make a decoy; you have got one ready made in Eve, and one that'll make a finer fortune than you or Adam, one of these days, or I am much mistaken; but there, talking of ducks and decoys reminds me of my little ducks. I must go and feed them; they are the queerest creatures I ever saw; they are all gone to beak; they'll be as good-for-nothing as these politicians who spend their time making speeches instead of working, unless I can fatten them up."

"Ah! there are other folks talk nonsense besides politicians, wife; the tongue is a small member but a very unruly one; it is best employed in uttering the thoughts of great men if we have no great thought of our own to utter, so go on, Eve."

And while Mrs. Oldman retired to see after the ducks which had gone to beak instead of to fat, their proper mission, Eve read on a little longer, until the distant report of a gun caused both father and daughter to look up.

"I wonder who that is shooting in the close season; perhaps it is the rector frightening the birds from his garden with a blank cartridge; it seemed to come from that direction," said Noah.

Perhaps it was, but it seemed to have the effect of disturbing Eve as well as the birds, for she rose suddenly and said—"Father, I am tired of reading; I think I'll go for a walk before tea."

And Noah, being a simple-minded, unsuspecting man, didn't connect the gun with his daughter's sudden desire to be off, and had he been told it was a signal for her to resort to a certain spot, would have been as much surprised as if he had been shot. Suspecting nothing, he asked Eve for the book, and laying down his net watched her run into the house and return with a large straw hat instead of the sun-bonnet, and then, with a nod and a smile, disappear behind the ark, a beautiful, happy, healthy, and, truth to tell, somewhat naughty girl, the joy and pride of his life.

"Soft she withdrew, and, like a wood-nymph light,

Oread or Dryad or of Delia's train,
Betook her to the groves; but Delia's self

In gait surpassed and goddess-like deport.

* * * * *

"Oh, much deceived, much failing hapless Eve,
Of thy presumed return, event perverse,
Thou never from that hour in Paradise
Found'st either sweet repast or sound repose."

So read Noah, going on where Eve had left off; but for once in his life his favourite poet was an uncongenial companion, and he threw the book aside and pondered over the living Eve who had just gone from his presence. How fair she was; neither small nor large, but just the right medium; in outward form, at least, the very perfection of a woman with the happy innocence of a child and the natural grace of one of Nature's ladies, though only the daughter of a fisherman. What a wife she would make for Adam Day, now the village schoolmaster, reading up for an open scholarship in his leisure hours; for to go to college was the dream of his life. And where in all the world could Eve find one who would make her a better or a truer husband than Adam? For, taking Noah as his model, Adam had grown up a religious as well as a good and clever man. And Noah, wishing as he did that Adam should become his son-in-law, thought he saw many little things in their intercourse with each other which seemed to say his wish was also theirs. And as he thought the wish grew into a prayer, and the prayer continued long after he had, unconsciously, or at any rate mechanically resumed his netting. Like all Noah's prayers, it took the form of a colloquy rather than of a petition, for he rarely asked directly for anything, but told out his wishes and thoughts to his God as a child might tell all his plans and wishes to his father, and then he listened for God's voice in reply; and then Noah added, simply, "but Thy will be done."

So he had prayed for years. In his youth he had asked that his wishes might be granted, always adding the saving clause, "it is Thy will," but as he grew older, he asked less, and trusted more, until it was true of him that when he had asked for forgiveness for his daily shortcomings his only petition was, "Thy will be done." And yet he spent hours in prayer, as he sat watching for wherries while his eel-nets were out; he had not a thought nor a wish that he did not share with his Lord, but long experience had taught him that God knew best what to give and what to withhold; that if we are generous in our trust in His desire to help us, He will not be outdone in generosity, but will give far more than we desire or deserve. And if, as sometimes happened, his wishes were apparently disregarded or set aside, or crossed, Noah knew that it was not really so, but that it was God's will—the will of Him who sees the whole while we see but a small part.

God's knowledge and our ignorance was a favourite topic of Noah's; it was the key, he was wont to say, to the whole mystery of evil. God, he said, saw the good which underlay the evil, or He would never permit it to exist; and he agreed with those theologians who think it doubtful whether we are not better off now we are fallen than we should have been had we never lost the innocence of Paradise, so transcendent are the joys of salvation.

Noah's meditations were interrupted by the arrival of Adam Day, now a tall, strong man of twenty-two or three; he was somewhat sallow in complexion, with dark curly hair and dark grey eyes, the only remarkable feature in his face, except his fine forehead, and neither

Noah, nor even his mother, much as they admired Adam, could have pretended he was good-looking. Tall and straight and well built he was, with a clever intelligent face and fine eyes, and when that was said, there remained nothing to add to the description of his outward man. He was dressed in an old but well-cut suit of clothes, having discarded the blue jersey and high boots of the broadmen since he became schoolmaster, though this evening he had donned some high boots, knowing that the work he and Adam were engaged in required them. They were making a decoy in one of the inlets of Windham Broad, about two miles from the ark. Noah had made the osier fences and screens, and Adam had provided the wire-netting and iron hoops, and now they were going to fix up the screens and fences and fasten the netting over the hoops. They had been engaged during the winter in making the screens and fences, and now the decoy itself had to be made.

"Where is Eve going? I met her," said Adam, abruptly, as Noah put away his netting and prepared to accompany him.

"Only for a walk; she was tired of reading."

"She is too pretty to walk about alone," said Adam, sharply.

"What! here in the country where everyone knows her? What harm should happen to her here, lad?"

"They are not all saints who live in the country," said Adam, who seemed put out; but he said nothing further, and Noah concluded his pupils had been more than usually troublesome and ruffled his temper, as sometimes happened.

The decoy was laid in an inlet well sheltered by trees, on the other side of the broad, to reach which they must first take a boat and then walk about a mile. Accordingly they made their way to the place where we first made Adam's acquaintance, to launch a boat. Here they found Grace Leicester, now a graceful girl, the same age as Eve, but taller and slighter, and whereas Eve was the picture of health and her colouring vivid, Grace was delicate, and seemed to be painted in water-colours: she had coils of pale smooth golden hair, large sad blue eyes, delicate features, and a very clear and pale complexion, though she had a habit of blushing frequently, and then the bright red blood mantled her cheeks for a few seconds, but soon faded away and left her the pale, delicate, lily-like creature it found her. And while Eve looked as if no such thing as care or sorrow had ever ventured to touch so gay and beautiful a creature, the chastened look on Grace's young face seemed to hint that she was not altogether a stranger to either; but the sorrow appeared to be an accepted one, for there was a certain air of resignation about her, which even a careless observer could hardly fail to notice. The bright colour which overspread her face as she greeted Noah and Adam made her for the moment beautiful, though when it subsided she was almost too pale to deserve the attribute.

"I am looking for Mr. Clifford; have you met him?"

"No, Miss Grace," said Noah, but he did not notice that Adam made no reply.

"I am afraid he has gone out fishing then; he is fishing-crazy this year, and it is just our dinner-time. I hope he won't be very late, for father's sake."

"If we come across him we'll tell him you are looking out for him; we are now going across to the decoy that is to make Adam's fortune, Miss Grace."

"I hope it may, Adam," said Grace, shyly, and once again the bright red blush swept over her pale cheeks.

"Thank you, Miss Leicester," said Adam, and a close observer would have seen that under Adam's sallow skin a dark flush was visible.

Noah got into his boat and took the sculls, and Adam shoved her off and followed, while a bell from the rectory caused Grace to hasten home.

"Miss Grace looks worn and anxious; I hope she has not set her heart on that handsome young Clifford, for he is not good enough for her," said Noah.

"I don't know anyone who is," said Adam shortly, and Noah, thinking his plumes had been exceedingly ruffled to make him so short-tempered, set himself to try and smooth them by talking about the open scholarship Adam had determined to go in for, and when once they were ashore again their work rendered all conversation impossible, so that Adam's unusual silence and depression escaped Noah's further notice.

ON THE ART OF "PUTTING THINGS" WELL.

is a great mistake to suppose that the art of conversation is at all the same thing as the art of putting things well. To be a good conversationalist involves various natural gifts, but to put things well implies not so much native aptitude, as an acquired habit of regarding the different aspects of one fact from the varying standpoints of different minds, and of perceiving what particular aspect should be brought forward prominently, so as to produce pleasurable or preclude painful impressions.

The following is a case in point:—

Captain B., coming unexpectedly up to town, claims the hospitality of his friends the Robinsons on an evening when they are giving a small dinner-party of eight. The shortness of the notice renders it utterly impossible for Mrs. Robinson to secure the presence of an additional lady, and circumstances, too, prevent her altering her arrangement of the couples. Captain B. then, as the odd man out, has to go in to dinner alone, and it is necessary for her to make some gracefully apologetic speech. That there is a disproportion of the two sexes is very apparent, and it is this fact which is to furnish her with her excuse.

Now, if she is a thoroughly tactless woman she will say, "So sorry, Captain B., to send you in alone, but you see we are a gentleman too many;" while, on the other hand, if she is one of those women who know how to put things well, she will murmur, "So sorry, Captain B., but unluckily we are a lady too few."

"A man too many," or "a woman too few!" The sense conveyed by these two phrases is precisely the same, but the sensations roused in the mind of the hearer are widely different. For, in the first case, Captain B. is made to realise very forcibly how much his unexpected arrival has thrown out his hostess's arrangements; whereas in the second case he is given to understand that so far from regretting his inclusion in the number of her guests, Mrs. Robinson is only sorry that she cannot still further increase that number. Now, this is a much more agreeable idea to have presented to him than the other.

But it may be urged that sometimes to decide at once what is the most pleasing set of ideas to call up demands a quickness of apprehension not given to all of us.

So much may be freely conceded, and yet, as it is certain that there are innumerable facts which come into conversation almost as frequently as does mention of the weather, it is obvious that with these people can be prepared beforehand to deal.

Take only the one fact—old age. Age, as we know, has its lugubrious aspects, and the old are painfully aware of all these, and seek often, by an infinite number of little devices, to keep themselves from dwelling upon them. Witness that friend of George Sand's, who would never allow that he was fifty, but preferred to tell people that he was twice twenty-five.

As one gets older, one's physical powers cease to be what they have been; the attractiveness of mere youthful charms vanishes for ever, and one becomes conscious that to a section of the community—all the very young and foolish, in fact—one figures as an old fogey.

On the other hand, there are many triumphant, many consolatory aspects of maturer years. There is the power, the wisdom, the sympathy born of wide understanding, and the indescribable charm which springs out of such sympathy—a charm more potent with men and women sometimes than even the exuberant graces of youth.

To suggest any of these aspects rather than the more depressing ones becomes, then, the duty of all young persons who find themselves in the society of those much older than themselves. And on no occasion was this duty more exquisitely performed than it was once by a youthful Frenchman, who, on being asked by the elder of two ladies which of the two he would save, were they both drowning, answered promptly—

"Why, mademoiselle, of course, for I have noticed that madame knows how to do so many things that I should feel certain she knew how to swim."

Here the truth was vigorously adhered to, but by a well-deserved tribute to the elder lady's multifarious accomplishments the truth was shorn of its unpleasantness. The notable fact that with many women personal looks do not correspond with years makes it often particularly easy to put things well when the question of their age comes up. For next to being conscious that one is not really old, comes the satisfying conviction that any way one does not show one's age.

"I'm an old woman now," says a lady, plaintively, and is at once pleasantly soothed by hearing her listener murmur—

"I'll not contradict you, but your looks do," or, with slightly different wording: "If your looks do not tell us that, why should you?"

When, unfortunately, looks correspond only too fatally well with dates, it is necessary for those who are not mendaciously inclined to have some other answer ready.

The statement, "I'm an old woman now," can then be fitly followed by the exclamation: "Ah, madam, say that when you cease to be interesting!"

Here, it will be noted, the assertion about years is left undisputed, but the thoughts of the lady are judiciously carried off to a side issue, and she is made to understand, by implication, that so long as a woman pleases, her age is a matter of comparative indifference.

Constantly, in putting things well, most people have recourse to this plan of evasion or side issues.

For, as it cannot be too often reiterated, the art of putting a thing well is not synonymous with the practice of glibly telling a lie. There is no art in lying; it is the mere clumsy device of the fool. All the art comes in managing to say a pleasing kind of true thing instead of the first true thing that occurs to one.

Thus when a bachelor of over fifty said to the girl of seventeen, "I'm sure you would rather be talking with those youngsters yonder than wasting your time on an old fellow like me!" the girl was perfectly truthful when she said, "Oh, no, I like old men," since young girls often do prefer the polished man of fifty to the raw lad of twenty; but she had scarcely put the matter felicitously.

Again, when a lady of straitened means, possessing a small domestic staff of one, said to a rich friend, whom she had induced to stay to luncheon with her, "You know, I cannot give you a lunch such as you would get at home, I live in a very different style," it was execrable taste on the part of the friend to answer cheerfully, "Oh, anything does for me! I have been living in seaside apartments lately, and you know what sort of food you get under those circumstances!" An answer framed in the spirit of Balthazar's reply to Antipholus, viz., "I hold your dainties cheap, and your welcomes dear," would have been the appropriate thing to say; all the more so, as it would have come as equally well whether the lady had been promising an elaborate or apologetic for a frugal repast.

* * * * *

It must not be supposed that within the limits of a magazine article easy ways can be suggested out of all conversational dilemmas. The general principles which will enable people themselves to find out the best way of putting things can alone be indicated. Much will always depend upon a judicious choice of adjectives, and in this respect our readers will do well to model themselves upon a character in one of Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's novels, of whom we are told—

"If I weighed 200lb., for instance, she would refer to my avoirdupois as 'matronly embonpoint,' and if I were a skeleton she would say I had 'a slight, reed-like figure,' which is rather clever, you know, as well as being Christian charity."

THE BEST-GOVERNED STATE.

How the best state to know?—It is found out Like the best woman—that least talked about.

—Schiller.

IN DISGUISE.—When Madame de Staël published her celebrated novel of "Delphine," she was supposed to have painted herself in the person of the heroine, and M. Talleyrand in that of an elderly lady who is one of the principal characters. "They tell me," said Talleyrand, the first time he met her, "that we are both of us in your novel in the disguise of women."

CHARACTER IN CHINS.—A pointed chin is said to be a sign of craftiness, wisdom, and discretion. A soft, fat, double chin indicates sensuousness, and an indolent temperament. A flat chin is the mark of a cold, hard nature; a small chin shows weakness, want of will, power, and cowardice. In a retreating chin we see silliness, and, if the brow be shallow, imbecility. A square and massive chin indicates strong and determined will.

THE SECRET OF PERFECTION.—To obtain perfection it is not necessary to do singular things, but to do common things singularly well.—Francis de Sales.

THE LONG REMEMBERED DEAD.

The most loved are they
Of whom fame speaks not with her clarion voice
In regal halls!—the shades o'erhang their way,
The vale, with its deep fountains, is their choice,

And gentle hearts rejoice
Around their steps!—till silently they die
As a stream shrinks from summer's burning eye,

And the world knows not then,
Not then, nor ever, what pure thoughts have fled!

Yet these are they that on the souls of men
Come back, when night her folding veil hath spread—
The long-remembered dead.

ADVICE TO AUTHORS.

When writing an article for the press,
Whether in prose or verse, just try
To utter your thoughts in the fewest words,

And let them be crisp and dry;
And when it is finished, and you suppose
It is done exactly brown,
Just look it over again, and then—
Boil it down.

THE STINGY WIFE.

A celebrated American judge had a very stingy wife. On one occasion she received his friends in the drawing-room with a single candle.

"Be pleased, my dear," said his lordship, "to let us have a second candle to see where the other one stands."

SEEDS OF CHARACTER.—Every day and hour we are sowing the seeds of character which one day will astonish even ourselves by blossoming forth in actions of which we had not supposed ourselves to be capable.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT PUNCTUALITY.—If you desire to enjoy life, avoid unpunctual people. They impede business and poison pleasure. Make it your own rule not only to be punctual but a little beforehand. Such a habit secures a composure which is essential to happiness. For want of it many people live in a constant fever, and put all about them in a fever too. To prevent the tediousness of waiting for others, carry with you some means of occupation—books which can be read by snatches and which afford ample materials for thinking.

TONGUES IN MOTION.—The tongue is a machine which generally loses in power what it gains in speed.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

LOIS LE BLANC.—We cannot agree with you that a salary of £30 or £40 per annum is a low one for a young girl to begin with. Whether it would compensate you for being "a drudge for three years," you must be the best judge, as we have had no experience of that position. You should apply direct to the Civil Service Commissioners, stating your present qualifications, and obtain a prospectus for the current year.

A CONSTANT READER would do well to join an ambulance class. Some are held at the Polytechnic Institution in Regent Street, W. She had better write for a prospectus.

CURIOSITY.—Your query is a very natural one. The use of the pronoun "we," instead of I, was introduced in England for the use of the Sovereign by King John; and the French and German Sovereigns adopted the usage from him in 1200. Among authors and editors it is employed in lieu of "I," because a personal pronoun being necessarily of perpetual use, they prefer the employment of one that is free from any appearance of egotism; and the individual personality of the writer is less prominently brought forward. The origin of the name "Beefeaters" is Buffetiers, and was applied to the yeomen of the guard, because they watched the buffet and waited at the sideboard. The name has been fully three hundred years in use.

E. WILKINSON.—We have pleasure in naming your Society for the Suppression of Exaggerated Terms, because our young people of both sexes are doing their utmost to spoil their fine expressive language by the use of wrong as well as uncalled-for expressions. The English language is peculiarly rich in terms expressing shades of thought; and care should be taken to select them with the strictest propriety. Nothing could be more essentially vulgar than the application of the word "awful" (for example) to express exactly the opposite idea to that which it is designed to convey. Our "aesthete" friends have fallen into a very similar misemployment of English words. Address, Miss Wilkinson, sec., The Beeches, South Yardley, near Birmingham.

MISS E. HARTLAND (secretary of the Early Rising Society, Church Street, Newent, Gloucestershire).—We are happy to comply with your request to make known your society.

A. DUKE.—We recommend you to write to Miss S. Hull, Woodvale, Parkhurst Road, Bexley, Kent. She will supply you with every information respecting "Lip-reading," as employed for the use of the deaf mutes. Perhaps she may have a vacancy herself. There are many public institutions in town and a training college at Ealing. Miss Hull's is a private school.

ORIGINAL SUBSCRIBER.—Yes, there seems to be an opening for shorthand writers, and for type-writers also. There is an institution connected with such work in Cambridge Street, Edgware Road, W. At the same time you should beware of hastily throwing up your present "comfortable situation" for an uncertainty, and loss of income while learning the new business.

AUBREY and BOOKWORM.—There are plenty of girls' clubs of the kind you desire to join, and to which we have continually referred in our Answers. Get a directory of them, written by one of our own staff, from Messrs. Griffith and Farran (St. Paul's Churchyard), and select for yourselves, as their several terms vary one from the other. It is better not to attempt singing at all unless your ear be perfect. You might learn the piano, but no stringed or wind instrument, without a very reliable ear and good musical taste. Why become a nuisance to others who have both?

A. L. M.—You would do well to obtain a short pamphlet by a Miss Sara Copeland (noticed in the Queen newspaper), giving an account of the Governesses' Home, kept in Paris by Miss Pryde, hon. sec., under the management of a French lady-directress; address, 23, Avenue des Bois de Boulogne, Paris: terms inexpensive.

ART.

MILANESE.—The leather for "gold leaf stamping" must be first prepared by dusting it over with very finely powdered dried white of egg, yellow resin, or mastic gum. Upon this lay a leaf of gold. The iron tools or stamps are now arranged on a rack before a clear fire, so as to be well heated without becoming red-hot. If the tools be letters, they are alphabetically arranged. Some practice will enable one to judge of the heat. The tool is pressed downwards on the gold leaf, and by this the resin is melted and the gold adheres to the leather. The superfluous gold is then rubbed off with a cloth. For the gold dust process, ordinary "gilder's size" might answer.

ARTISTE.—Pencil drawings are entirely finished in pencil. They may be touched up with white water-colour paint, if liked. Crayons or chalks are also kept to themselves, and not "mixed with pencil." Two different methods of fixing pencil drawings and crayons are used, the former being fixed with skim milk and water, the latter with a spray diffuser, in the method so often described in these columns.

A SHAMROCK.—The three golden balls of the pawn-brokers denote that money is lent by them. They were adopted from the "three gilded pills" of the Medici, which were a punning allusion to their name and profession, Medici meaning "doctors." The Medici were the wealthiest of the Lombardian money lenders of the Middle Ages, and their agents in England used their arms to paint on their doors as a sign they lent money. The Medici arms are well known to those who visit Florence, where they were the reigning family for so long. But on the shields there five balls, we think, appear, not six. This is the shield in the picture by Paul Veronese. It was not an uncommon thing to introduce the family arms into a picture; and in very early days, you must remember, ladies of rank wore them embroidered on their gowns.

AUTUMN GLADNESS.

MINNA BRIGHT.—We suppose by painting on glass you mean the ordinary painting of magic lantern slides. This is performed with transparent colours, viz., Prussian blue, Indian yellow, burnt sienna, crimson lake, and burnt umber. These colours undergo a change under the action of light, for which you must allow. The first process is to draw your subject on paper with strong lines, and shade it with Indian ink; then place your glass over the drawing, and secure firmly and proceed to paint; use megilp as a varnish to thicken your colours. Your sky must be a dark blue, the foliage of a blue green, and purple should be sparingly used. There is also a widely-advertised patented process for colouring glass, called, we believe, "Glacier." There is a great difference between colouring glass and painting upon it. Coloured glass is made by mixing metallic oxides with glass in a state of fusion; in this way a uniform colour is given to the whole mass, which pervades the substance of the glass, the colouring becoming incorporated with it. The oxide of cobalt is used for a rich blue colour, and so great is its colouring power that a pinch, so to say, will give a tint of blue to a ton of glass.

MISCELLANEOUS.

E. J. F.—Never sign yourself "Yours, etc.," it is vulgar and disrespectful. We thank you for your contribution to the Girls' Convalescent Home. Yes, the "Girl's Own Cookery Book" is sold at our publishing office. Write to Mr. Tarn. The price is one shilling.

GRUMPY.—There are surgical instrument makers in London who might supply a finger as well as a whole hand. We do not give addresses, but you could obtain such from any chemist near you. We utterly deny your strange assertion that "everyone looks down on an old maid." The question of respect, as of affectionate regard, depends wholly on the individual herself—her character, manners, usefulness, and kindness. Women who have rashly undertaken the onerous responsibilities of married life, for which they were educationally, mentally, and physically unsuited, or who make a grave mistake as to a suitable companion in life, or the amount of income essential, are far more likely to be "looked down upon." So beware!

NORAH.—If of age you should consult a lawyer, if some reliable friend, doctor, or clergyman would recommend one to you. He should see your grandfather's will, and take the necessary steps for its being carried out. Once in possession of what was designed for your support, you could select a friend or a family with whom to board, as you are too young to live alone.

F. E. M. must consult a dentist, and probably a doctor, keep her feet dry and warm, and clothe herself carefully, according to the weather, not the season only.

G. D. P.—We should think the Confederate note you possess is worth nothing, save as a curiosity, provided that you keep it a good number of years.

FIGGIT.—The writings of Ruskin are the basis of the society, of course; but why not write and obtain the rules, and positive information from the secretary?

L. M. A.—We are glad you liked our series of articles on "Heraldry, and the Days of Chivalry." The name "Oriflamme," as applied to the original royal standard of France, was derived from the Latin auri flamma, or "flame of gold." The standard in question belonged to the Abbey of St. Denis, and was borne by its guardians the Counts of Vexin. It reverted to Philip I., who added the county to the dominions of the French Crown; and thenceforth it became the standard of the French monarchy, until lost at the battle of Agincourt. It was charged with a saltire, wavy, or; and rays issued from the centre, crosswise.

MARY WHITE.—We are often asked for a recommendation to some French country place, where a pleasant quiet holiday could be spent, at comparatively small cost. We have just heard of a place in the Drôme Valley—Die, a small town in Dauphiny. The lady who writes about it in "Work and Leisure" names a very nice house there, having a good fruit and flower garden, which a friend of hers is prepared to buy, if only a sufficient number of visitors could be found to go over and occupy it. All desirous of a home which might be made a pleasant meeting-place in the summer, for friends parted by their several duties the rest of the year, had better communicate with the writer.

EVIE.—There are more kinds of the Cactus tribe than one, and all do not blossom annually. Perhaps your specimen is not being treated rightly. We advise you to show it to a florist, and he will tell you what it is and what is the matter with it. You inquire about your efficiency in spelling. The latter cannot be said to be "all right" when you write this as one word, and say "alright."

MAURITIUS.—We thank you heartily for your excellent "Deep Sea Fisheries" Ulman cap and mittens, and also for your kind letter. You write a very pretty hand; we wish all our correspondents wrote half as well.

GWYNDOLEN.—Both your quotations are taken from Tennyson's "In Memoriam," to which you should refer. Your writing is very neat, and we wish you much success at college.

J. M. H.—There is some kind of mixture, we believe, sold at the waterproofers' establishments, which might be of use in restoring your mackintosh.

FIRST FRUITS.—You possess considerable facility in versification, and much readiness; but the hymns are somewhat lacking in original thought. We see no reason, however, that you should deny yourself the pleasure of writing hymns, for the thoughts are edifying and pious; and it must do you good to entertain such guests.

WILD FLOWER.—Your verses, though not quite correct in rhyme and metre, show considerable power and originality. We advise you to endeavour to improve yourself in English.

CHAPTER IV.

A COSY MORNING.

BREAKFAST was half over before Miss Sefton made her appearance; but her graceful apology for her tardiness was received by Dr. Lambert in the most indulgent manner. In spite of his love of punctuality, and his stringent rules for his household in this respect, he could not have found it in his heart to rebuke the pretty, smiling creature who told him so naively that early rising disagreed with her and put her out for the day.

"I tell mamma that I require a good deal of sleep and fortunately she believes me," finished Edna, complacently.

Well, it was not like the doctor to hold his peace at this glaring opposition to his favourite theory, and yet, to Tom's astonishment, he forbore to quote that threadbare and detestable adage, "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise"—proverbial and uncomfortable philosophy that Tom hated with all his foolish young heart. Tom, in his budding manhood, often thought fit to set this domestic tyranny at defiance, and would argue at some length that his father was wrong in laying down rules for the younger generation.

"If my father likes to get up early, no one can find fault with him for doing it,"

"'IT IS SO LOVELY TO HAVE YOU BACK, BETTY DEAR,' SHE WHISPERED."

All rights reserved.]

Tom would say; "but he need not impose his venerable and benighted opinions upon us. Great men are not always wise; even intellectual veterans like Dr. Johnson, and others I can mention, if you only give me time, have their little hallucinations, fads, fancies, and flumeries. For example, everyone speaks of Dr. Johnson with respect; no one hints that he had a bee in his bonnet, and yet a man who could make a big hole for a cat and a little one for a kitten—was it Johnson or Newton who did that?—must have had a screw loose somewhere. And so it is with my father; early rising is his hobby—his pet theory—the keystone that binds the structure of health together. Well, it is a respectable theory, but my father need not expect an enlightened and progressive generation to subscribe to it; the early hours of the morning are not good for men and mice; only for birds and bricklayers, and worms weary of existence."

Tom looked on secretly amused, as his father smiled indulgently at Miss Sefton's confession of indolence. He asked her how she had slept, and made room for her beside him, and then questioned her about her intended journey, and finally arranged to drive her to the station before he went on his usual round.

An hour afterwards the whole family collected in the hall to see Miss Sefton off. Edna bid them good-bye in her easy, friendly fashion, but as she took Bessie's hand she said—

"Good-bye, dear; I have an idea that we shall soon meet again. I shan't let you forget me," and then she put up her face to be kissed.

"I am not likely to forget you," thought Bessie, as Edna waved her little gloved hand to them all; "one could soon get fond of her."

"How nice it must be to be rich!" sighed Christine, who was standing beside Bessie. "Miss Sefton is very little older than we are, and yet she has lovely diamond and emerald rings. Did you see her dressing-bag? It was fitted up so beautifully, its bottles silver-mounted; it must have cost thirty guineas, at least. And then her furs: I should like to be in her place."

"I should not envy Miss Sefton because she is rich," retorted Hatty disdainfully. "I would rather change places with her because she is so strong and so pretty. I did like looking at her so much, and so did Tom. Didn't you, Tom?"

"I say, I wish you girls would shut up or clear off," responded Tom, crossly; for things felt a little flat this morning. "How is a fellow to work with all this chattering going on around him?"

"Why, you haven't opened your books yet," replied Hatty, in an aggrieved voice; but Bessie hastily interposed—

"Tom is quite right to want the room to himself. Come along, girls, let us go to mother, in the morning-room; we might do some of our plain-sewing, and then I can tell you about Aunt Charlotte. It is so long since we have been cosy together, and our needles will fly while we talk—eh, Hatty?"

"There are those night shirts to finish," said Christine, disconsolately; "they ought to have been done long ago, but Hatty was always saying her back ached when I wanted her to help, and I could not get on with them by myself."

"Never mind, we will all set to work vigorously," and Bessie tripped away to find her work-basket. The morning-room, as they called it, was a small room leading out of the drawing-room, with an old-fashioned bay window looking out on the garden.

There was a circular-cushioned seat running round the bay, with a small table in the middle, and this was the place where the girls loved to sit and sew, while their tongues kept pace with their needles. When Hatty's back ached, or the light made her head throb with pain, she used to bring her low chair, and leave the recess to Bessie and Christine.

The two younger girls went to school.

As Hatty brought her work (she was very skilful with her needle, and neither of her sisters could vie with her in delicate embroidery), she slipped a cold little hand into Bessie's.

"It is so lovely to have you back, Betty dear," she whispered. "I woke quite happy this morning to know I should see you downstairs."

"I think it is lovely to be home," returned Bessie, with a beaming smile. "I am sure that is half the pleasure of going away, the coming back again. I don't know how I should feel if I went to stay at any grand place; but it always seems to me now that home is the most delicious place in the world; it never looks shabby to me as it does to Tom, it is just home-like."

Mrs. Lambert, who was sitting apart from the girls, busy with her weekly accounts, looked up at hearing her daughter's speech.

"That is right, dear," she said, gently; "that is just how I like to hear you speak; it would grieve me if my girls were to grow discontented with their home, as some young ladies do."

"Bessie is not like that, mother," interposed Hatty, eagerly.

"No, Hatty, we know that, do we not? What do you think father said the other day, Bessie? He said, 'I shall be glad when we get our Bessie back, for the place does not seem like itself when she is away.' That was a high compliment from father."

"Indeed it was," returned Bessie; and she blushed with pleasure. "Everyone likes to be missed, but I hope you did not want me too much, mother."

"No, dear, but like father, I am glad to get you back again. And the mother's eyes rested fondly on the girl's face. "Now you must not make me idle, for I have all these accounts to do, and some notes to write. Go on with your talking, it will not interrupt me."

It spoke well for the Lambert girls that their mother's presence never interfered with them; they talked as freely before her as other girls do in their parents' absence. From children they had never been repressed nor unnaturally subdued; their childish preferences and tastes had been known and respected; no thoughtless criticism had wounded their susceptibility; imperceptibly and gently maternal advice had guided and restrained them.

"We tell mother everything, and she likes to hear it," Ella and Katie would say to her schoolfellows.

"We never have secrets from her," Ella added. "Katie did once, and mother was so hurt that she cried about it. Don't you recollect, Katie?"

"Yes, and it is horrid of you to remind me," returned Katie, wrathfully, and she walked away in high dudgeon; the recollection was not a pleasant one. Katie's soft heart had been pierced by her mother's unfeigned grief and tender reproaches.

"You are the only one of all my little girls who ever hid anything from me. No, I am not angry with you, Katie, and I will kiss you as much as you like," for Katie's arms were round her neck in a moment, "but you have made mother cry, because you do not love her as she does you."

"Mother shall never cry again on my account," thought Katie, and, strange to say, the tendency to secretiveness in the child's nature seemed cured from that day. Katie ever afterwards confessed her misdemeanours and the accidents that happen to the best regulated children with a frankness that bordered on bluntness.

"I have done it, mother," she would say, "but somehow I don't feel a bit sorry. I rather liked hurting Ella's feelings; it seemed to serve her right."

"Perhaps when we have talked about it a little you will feel sorry," her mother would reply, quietly; "but I have no time for talking just now."

Mrs. Lambert was always very busy; on these occasions she never found time for a heated and angry discussion. When Katie's hot cheeks had cooled a little, and her childish wrath had evaporated, she would quietly argue the point with her. It was an odd thing that Katie generally apologised of her own accord afterwards—generally owned herself the offender.

"Somehow you make things look different, mother," she would say. "I can't think why they all seem topsyturvy to me."

"When you are older I will lend you my spectacles," her mother returned, smiling. "Now run and kiss Ella, and pray don't forget next time that she is two years older—it can't possibly be a younger sister's duty to contradict her on every occasion."

It was in this way that Mrs. Lambert had influenced her children, and she had reaped a rich harvest for her painstaking, patient labours with them, in the freely bestowed love and confidence with which her grown-up daughters regarded her. Now, as she sat apart, the sound of their fresh young voices was the sweetest music to her; not for worlds would she have allowed her own inward sadness to damp their spirits, but more than once the pen rested in her hand, and her attention wandered.

Outside the wintry sun was streaming on the leafless trees and snowy lawns; some thrushes and sparrows were bathing in the pan of water that Katie had placed there that morning.

"Let us go for a long walk this afternoon," Christine was saying, "through the Coombe Woods, and round by Summerford, and down by the quarry."

"Even Bessie forgets that it will be Frank's birthday to-morrow," thought Mrs. Lambert. "My darling boy, I wonder if he remembers it there! if the angels tell him that his mother is thinking of him. That is just what one longs to know, if they remember." And then she sighed, and pushed her papers aside, and no one saw the sadness on her face as she went out. Meanwhile Bessie was relating how she had spent the last three weeks.

"I can't think how you could endure it," observed Christine, as soon as she had finished. "Aunt Charlotte is very nice, of course; she is father's sister, and we ought to think so, but she leads such a dull life, and then Cronyhurst is such an ugly village."

"It is not dull to her, but then you see it is her life; people look on their own lives with such different eyes. Yes, it was very quiet at Cronyhurst; the roads were too bad for walking, and we had a great deal of snow, but we worked and talked, and sometimes I read aloud, and so the days were not so long after all."

"I should have come home at the end of a week," returned Christine; "three weeks at Cronyhurst in the winter is too dreadful. It was real self-sacrifice on your part, Bessie; even father said so; he declared it was too bad of Aunt Charlotte to ask you at such a season of the year."

"I don't see that. Aunt Charlotte liked having me, and I was very willing to stay with her, and we had such nice talks. I don't see that she is to be pitied at all; she has never married, and she lives alone, but she is perfectly contented with her life. She has her garden and her chickens and her poor people. We used to go into some of the cottages when the weather allowed us to go out, and all the people seemed so pleased to see her. Aunt Charlotte is a good woman, and good people are generally happy. I know what Tom says about old maids," continued Bessie, presently, "but that is all nonsense; Aunt Charlotte says she is far better off as she is than many married people she knows. 'Married people may double their pleasures,' as folk say, 'but they treble their cares, too,' I have heard her remark; 'and there is a great deal to be said in favour of freedom. When there is no one to praise there is no one to blame, and if there is no one to love there is no one to lose, and I have always been content myself with single blessedness.' Do you remember poor Uncle Joe's saying,

'The mare that goes in single harness does not get so many kicks'?"

"Yes, I know Aunt Charlotte's way of talking; but I dare say no one wanted to marry her, so she makes the best of her circumstances."

Bessie could not help laughing at Christine's bluntness.

"Well, you are right, Chrissy; but Aunt Charlotte is not the least ashamed of the fact. She told me once that no one had ever fallen in love with her. 'I could not expect them to do so,' she remarked, candidly; 'as a girl I was plain featured, and so shy and awkward that your Uncle Joe used to tell me that I was the only ugly duckling that would never turn into a swan.'"

"What a shame of Uncle Joe!"

"I don't think Aunt Charlotte took it much to heart. She says her hard life and many troubles drove all nonsense thoughts out of her head. Why, grand-mamma was ill eight years, you know, and Aunt Charlotte nursed her all that time. I am sure when she used to come to my bedside of a night, and tuck me up with a motherly kiss, I used to think her face looked almost beautiful, it was so full of kindness. Somehow I fancy when I am old," added Bessie, pensively, "I shall not care so much about my looks nor my wrinkles, if people will only think I am a comfortable, kind-hearted sort of a person."

"You will be the dearest old lady in the world," returned Hatty, dropping her work with an adoring look at her Betty. "You are cosier than other people now, so you are sure to be nicer than ever when you are old. No wonder Aunt Charlotte loved to have you."

"What a little flatterer you are, Hatty! It is a comfort that I don't grow vain. Do you know, I think Aunt Charlotte taught me a great deal. When you get over her little mannerisms and odd ways, you soon find out what a good woman she really is. She is always thinking of other people, what she can do to lighten their burdens; and little things give her so much pleasure. She says the first violet she picks in the hedgerow, or the sight of a pair of thrushes building their nest in the acacia tree, makes her feel as happy as a child, for in spring, she said once, 'all the world is full of young life, and the buds are bursting into flowers, and they remind me that one day I shall be young and beautiful too.'"

"I think I should like to go and stay with Aunt Charlotte," observed Hatty, "if you think she would care to have me."

"I am sure she would, dear. Aunt Charlotte loves to take care of people. You must go in the summer, Hatty; the cottage is so pretty then, and you could be out in the garden or in the lanes all day. June is the best month, for they will be making hay in the meadows, and you could sit in the porch and smell the roses, and watch Aunt Charlotte's bees filling their honey bags. It is just the place for you, Hatty—so still and quiet."

This sort of talk lasted most of the morning, until Ella and Katie returned from school, and Tom sauntered into the room, flushed with his mental labours, and ready to seek relaxation in his sisters' company.

Bessie left the room and went in search of her mother; when she returned a quarter of an hour later she found Tom sulky and Hatty in tears.

"It is no use trying to keep the peace," observed Christine, in a vexed tone. "Tom will tease Hatty, and then she gets cross, and there is no silencing either of them."

"Come with me, Hatty, dear, and help me to put my room in order. I have to finish my unpacking," said Bessie, soothingly. "You have been working too long, and so has Tom. I shall leave him to you, Chrissy." And as Hatty only moaned a little in her handkerchief, Bessie took the work forcibly away, and then coaxed her out of the room.

"Why is Tom so horrid to me?" sobbed Hatty. "I don't believe he loves me a bit. I was having such a happy morning, and he came in and spoiled all."

"Never mind about Tom. No one cares for his teasing, except you, Hatty. I would not let him see you mind everything he chooses to say. He will only think you a baby for crying. Now do help me arrange this drawer, for dinner will be ready in a quarter of an hour, and the floor is just strewn with clothes. If it makes your head ache to stoop, I will just hand you the things; but no one else can put them away so tidily."

The artful little bait took. Of all things Hatty loved to be of use to anyone; in another moment she had dried her eyes and set to work, her miserable little face grew cheerful, and Tom's sneering speeches were forgotten.

"Why, I do believe that is Hatty laughing," exclaimed Christine, as the dinner bell sounded and she passed the door with her mother. "It is splendid the way Bessie manages Hatty. I wish some of us could learn the art, for all this wrangling with Tom is so tiresome."

"Bessie never loses patience with her," returned her mother; "never lets her feel that she is a trouble. I think you will find that is the secret of Bessie's influence. Your father and I are often grateful to her. 'What would that poor child do without her?' as your father often says, and I do believe her health would often suffer if Bessie did not turn her thoughts away from what is fretting her."

TYPES OF VIRTUE ;
OR,
IDEAL HEROINES OF ENGLISH WRITERS.

PATIENCE. . . . PATIENT GRISELDA.
We must love all the virtues ; that is certain. To say that we do not care for such and such a one is tantamount to owning a fondness, or at all events a toleration, for the opposite vice ; nevertheless, while there are some virtues which at first sight appear not very attractive, so also there are faults we are liable to excuse ; that is, if they are accompanied with some quality such as valour, strength, or generosity.

I will give an example. One of you, my readers, has a brother at school, who, owing to a mistake, has been wrongly accused of a fault, and without waiting for an explanation loses his temper and fights his accuser. "How brave !" some would say ; "what a detestation he must have for that fault !" This is quite a wrong way of looking at the matter ; your brother has lost his head and his temper—he is not afraid to fight, quite true, and that valour may come in useful some day, but there is no occasion for it here. What is wanted is a little patience, leading to a reconciliation.

A boy would have none of this. "I hate milksops ; give me a brave fellow." That is boy-like, and taken in its literal sense is a right idea ; but taken in the sense the boy intends, it is anything but man-like. And why ? Because a man, however naturally impatient, is taught by experience the absolute necessity of a certain amount of patience. The older we get the more patient we become, as a rule, and though the practice of this virtue requires a large amount of self-control, so great is the benefit which accrues to the patient that it is passing strange the virtue is not more popular.

Hardly a lofty manner of discussing a virtue this, to prove that, like honesty, it is the best policy ; but when I come to Griselda's story, I shall have plenty to say on the moral aspect of patience.

I am afraid we must own that even with men patience, in theory, is hardly very popular. A man says of another, "Oh, he is such a patient man ;" and in like manner, "he is such a meek man," with a sneer, inferring thereby that these are effeminate and weak qualities ; and yet we know patience to be a necessity of success in life. Women and girls are still harder on the patient and the meek man, for in their eyes these virtues lose their beauty when applied to the rougher sex. Women are bound, however, to acknowledge that with themselves patience is a virtue, but they are not very enthusiastic about it. "It's a hum-drum virtue," I once heard a girl say.

Often we are patient under present ills, if we have an end, a worldly end, in view. Often we endure privations without murmur, when we see success and happiness as a crown and reward for suffering. This is a low form of the virtue. We ought not to practise virtue because it will pay ; and though, as I have said, patience does pay, and, even more than honesty, is the best policy—for who can be happy and impatient ?—we ought to be patient just as we are truthful, charitable, and in a word, good, because it is right and according to God's precepts, and the better principles He has implanted in us.

As my readers see, I have chosen Griselda, a heroine from "Chaucer's Canterbury Tales," as a type of this ill-understood and much underrated virtue. But first a word or two about the author of the work in which our heroine appears. Geoffrey Chaucer is called "the father of English literature ;" he lived five hundred years ago, and is the earliest of our great writers. Before Chaucer there were one or two writers who had expressed their thoughts in English ; but their works are never read, except by historians and archaeologists ; and not only is Chaucer the first of that list of geniuses who have made England pre-eminent in the literature of modern Europe, but he is one of the greatest.

Then why with his great reputation is he comparatively so little read ? There are several reasons, amongst the principal being that in his works there are numerous words which have disappeared from our language. Many of his idioms, also, are obsolete ; nay, some are scarcely even understandable. Then there is a great admixture of French words in his poems ; while that perfect arrangement of accent, that regularity of versification, that easy "flow" which characterise the works of our later great poets, is perhaps not to be expected and certainly not to be found in Chaucer's works.

On the particular excellences of the poetry of the "Canterbury Tales" it is not my object to descant ; but my readers will perhaps like to know why these poems are called "Canterbury Tales," and I will say a few words on this subject, which will also serve as an introduction to our heroine, the fair Griselda.

My readers must transport themselves back, in fancy, five hundred years, and seek the ancient hostelry, the Tabard Inn, of Southwark. Here, according to the prologue of the "Canterbury Tales," were assembled together, towards the end of April, nine-and-twenty pilgrims, a motley company, different in degree, still more different in character ; but having for the time being a common object in view—a pilgrimage to Canterbury to visit the shrine of Thomas à Becket.

After a beautiful description of an early spring day Chaucer introduces us to the company. First there is the knight, a pattern of chivalry ; next in order of description comes the son, a young squire, lithe, active, and handsome, a lover and a bachelor. Then a nun, a monk, a merchant, a clerk of Oxenforde—with a mind full of logic and an ill-fed body ; threadbare are his garments and lean his horse ; a philosopher and a scholar is this clerk.

"Yet hadde he but litel gold in cofre,
But all that he might of his frendes hente (get),
On bokes and on lerning he it spente."

And so on, each of the company being described with so graphic a touch that, notwithstanding the centuries that have elapsed, and all the changes in manners, characteristics, and dress that have taken place since Chaucer's time, we realise the scene and see before us the motley company.

The host of the Tabard was a cheery fellow, and served his guests right well.

"Gret chere made oure hoste us everich on,
And to the souper sette he us anon :
And served us with vitaille of the beste ;
Strong was the win, and wel to drinke us leste (it pleased us well)."

After the supper is over he makes the company merry with his tales, and the reckonings being paid, he suggests a plan whereby the long journey to Canterbury may be made pleasant. Truly, he remarks, there is little comfort and fun "to riden by the way dombe as the ston," and suggests that each of the company shall tell a tale, and he whose story is the best shall have a supper on the return at the cost of the rest. In addition to this he volunteers to go with the pilgrims at his own cost, and offers his services as guide.

Both proposals meet with great favour, and one by one the company tell their stories. By-and-by the clerk of Oxenforde, who appears to have been poor company, and is therefore chided by the host, is called upon for his tale, and right well does he respond, for it is the clerk who gives us the story of patient Griselda. He mentions in an introduction that he heard of Griselda from Petrarch, the Italian poet, so the creation of the character is not Chaucer's; probably, indeed, the outline of the story is legendary, but it is Chaucer who fills in all details, invests the character with reality and interest, and works the legend into a harmonious and beautiful picture.

The clerk tells of a state in the "West side of Itaille," Saluces by name, rich in produce, and blessed in its ruler the Marquess Walter, a young man of good lineage, fair and strong, courteous and honourable, "discret ynough, his contree for to gie" (guide). Greatly beloved is Walter, who, however, cares not to marry, and devotes himself to hunting and hawking. The people are sad at heart that their ruler will not take to himself a wife and give them an heir, and by-and-by their desire becomes so great that they make their wish known to the marquess, and with much humility ask him to assent to their choosing him a wife, "borne of the gentillest and of the best of all this lond."

Walter says he wishes not to wed, but hearkens to their prayer, making, however, the reservation that he himself chooses his bride, with whom they must be content.

Now, not far from the palace there was a village with a poor population, subsisting on cattle and husbandry; and poorest of all the inmates of the village was a man, Janicola by name, who was possessed of a beautiful daughter, our heroine Griselda. Virtuously and poorly brought up, understanding work and never idle, Griselda was of tender age, but most courageous. Simple was her food and hard her couch; "and in gret reverence and charitee hire olde fader fostred she."

Often when hunting had the marquess seen the poor maiden, and looked fondly on her, admiring her goodness and pitying her hard fate; and now, as wed he must, why not choose Griselda as his bride? But he kept his purpose from his people, and when the day fixed for the bridal came, no one knew on whom his choice had rested. Meanwhile Walter caused to be made "Of gemmes, sette in gold and in asure, Broches and ringes, for Griselde's sake;

And of hire clothing toke he the mesure
Of a maiden like unto hire stature;
And eke of other ornamentes all,
That unto swiche a wedding shulde fall."

Great were to be the festivities at the marriage; but all was ready before either the people or Griselda knew of Walter's choice. In a thoughtful and sober fashion the marquess told Griselda to bring her father, Janicola, to him. Walter then took the poor old man kindly by the hand, and said—

"Janicola, I neither may ne can Lenger the plesance of mine hert hide,
If that thou vouchesauf, what so betide.
Thy daughter wol I take or that I wend
As for my wif, unto hire lives end."

The old man was dumb with surprise, but of course consents, and turning to Griselda, the marquess tells her that it is his wish and that of her father that they should wed. Then he asks for her consent that she will do his will with good heart and cheerfully, that when he says yea she says not nay, "neither by word ne frowning countenance."

"Wondring upon this thing, quaking for drede,

She saide: Lord, indigne and unworthy
Am I, to thilke honour, that ye me bedo (offer),

But as ye wol yourself, right so wol I;
And here I swere, that never willingly
In werk, ne thought, I n'll you disobeie For to be ded, though me were loth to deie."

The marquess then tells the people of Griselda, and asks them if they love him to love and honour his bride. And that there should be nothing lowly about Griselda, ladies dress her in great magnificence, a crown is put upon her head, and on a snow-white horse she rides to the palace.

Thus the poor maid becomes the wife of the marquess, and yet so clever is she and so good that the people can scarcely believe that she is the daughter of a peasant. She shows infinite judgment, she settles difficulties and redresses wrongs, she is beloved by the people, who praise Walter's choice, and hold him a prudent man. By-and-by a daughter is born, and Griselda's cup of joy is filled to overflowing.

So far all has been well, but our heroine's

troubles are about to begin. Walter, after awhile, is seized with a wish to prove the obedience and constancy of his wife, and by making her terribly miserable, to see if in adversity she will prove as good as she has been when happy and prosperous. God, as we know, so tried Job, but it is not allowed to men so to do. God permits temptation to assail us; no man may, however, tempt his fellow-creatures. Chaucer does not excuse the marquess—

"Though som men praise it for a subtil wit,
But as for me, I say that evil it sit,
To assay a wife whan that it is no nede,
And putten hire in anguish and in drede."

One day with a stern face Walter approaches Griselda and asks her to remember her former condition, and says that although she is dear to him, the people are loth to show allegiance to one so lowly born; and adds, that it is necessary for him to live in peace with his subjects, who have clamoured more since the birth of the daughter. Therefore must he, though much against his will, deal with the daughter as the people wish. Walter concludes by asking Griselda to show that patience and allegiance which she promised before her marriage, and give her consent to his proposal.

What a cruel ruse! What a temptation to our heroine! To be chosen wife of the ruler, and having risen to her duties in so noble a fashion; to be beloved by her husband and the people; to have become famous for her goodness and cleverness, then to be suddenly reminded of her lowly origin, and told she is hateful to the people, and that her daughter must be taken from her! Whither? Probably to be sacrificed. Well might Griselda lose all patience, curse her unhappy lot, upbraid her cruel, weak husband, and despise the fickle people. It required a saint, a noble woman, to remain calm in such terrible trouble. Griselda, however, was equal to the occasion; no upbraiding word, no complaint does she utter, but bows her head in resignation; she was thankful for her former happiness, and when unhappiness is sent her she accepts it without murmur. She humbly answers Walter that she and her daughter are his, and after kissing her child and blessing it, and commending its soul to God, she resigns it to a servant, who makes as though he would slay it, but really does not do so, and at the command of his master sends it to Bologna to be nurtured.

Full glad was Walter to find how noble was his wife; well might he now abandon his wretched purpose, and explain the reason of his craft. But no; more terrible woes are in store for Griselda, her patience is to be more severely tried. Meanwhile Griselda is the same good, loving wife as of yore, and in the course of time a boy is born, an heir, and right glad are the people, and delighted the father, at this happy event.

Again Walter tempts his wife, and, dissembling his feelings, again affects that his people clamour against Griselda and the child. The blood of Janicola must not succeed, the people must be appeased, and she is again asked to part with her child. She is told to be patient under this second trial! Miserable wit, wretched ruse to see how much a woman can suffer! Who could be patient under such great trouble? Griselda answers, however, in meekness and submission—

"I have, quod she, sayd thus and ever shal,
I wol no thing, ne n'll no thing certain,
But as you list: not greveth me at al,
Though that my doughter and my sone be slain
At your commandement: that is to sain,
I have not had no part of children twein,
But first sicknesse, and after wo and peine.

"Ye ben my lord, doth with your owen thing
Right as you list, asketh no rede of me:
For as I left at home al my clothing
Whan I came first to you, right so (quod she)
Left I my will and al my libertee,
And toke your clothing: wherfore I you prey,
Doth your plesance, I wol youre lust obey.

"And certes, if I hadde prescience
Your will to know, er ye your lust me told,
I wold it do withouten negligence:
But now I wote your lust, and what ye wol,
All your plesance ferme and stable I hold,
For wist I that my deth might do you ese,
Right gladly would I dien, you to ples."

Walter marvels at his wife's exquisite constancy; he casts down his eyes and wonders at her patience. Surely now he will not tempt her more! Had he not known her love for her children he might have doubted it, so great is her submission to his will. The second child is sent to Bologna, to be brought up with the daughter; and still Griselda remains a loving wife.

But the people are scandalised at what appears a second murder. Their lord, whom once they loved, they now abhor. A murderer rules over them. Far and wide the terrible news spreads, and Walter is the hated of his people. Still he must again tempt his wife, and this time more terribly than before. Strange that he should be so obdurate.

"But ther ben folk of swiche condition,
That, whan they han a certain purpos take,
They can not stint of hir intention,
But, right as they were bounden to a stake,
They wol not of hir firste purpos slake:
Right so this markis fully hath purposed
To tempt his wif, as he was first disposed."

Years pass on, and Griselda's third temptation happens in this wise. Walter feigns that he has permission to put away Griselda, and marry another wife; and sending for his two children from Bologna, his daughter is arrayed as if for bridal, and approaches Saluces apparently as his future wife.

The marquess then tells Griselda that the people constrain him to marry another wife, and a dispensation having been granted, his new wife is on her way to Saluces. Griselda is told to return to her father's house, and to be patient under her third affliction. "With even herte I rede (advise) you to endure the stroke of fortune, or of aventure."

Again Griselda's answer is meek and submissive, though her heart is well-nigh broken under her terrible troubles; she wishes Walter happiness with his new wife.

"And of your newe wif, God of His grace
So graunte you wele and prosperite:
For I wol gladly yelden hire my place,
In which that I was blisful wont to be.
For sith it liketh you, my lord (quod she)
That whilom weren all myn hertes rest,
That I shal gon, I wol go whan you lest."

All her grand clothes, all her jewels are left in the palace, and in a peasant's gown she sorrowfully seeks her village home. Many folk follow her weeping, and the poor old father again receives his unhappy daughter. Griselda seeks her old duties, and returns to her former life with all humility; every sign of former state is abandoned, and she is again the simple village maiden.

The new marchioness approaches Saluces with great pomp—never was seen such magnificence. Walter then sends for Griselda to receive his new wife, and array the castle for her abode. Griselda stirs herself to do his bidding, and gets all things ready for the advent of her rival.

The people rush to see the new marchioness and her brother, Griselda's wrong is soon forgotten, the rabble whisper that their lord is right to change Griselda for a younger and a fairer wife. Chaucer here bursts forth into the following magnificent passage, the theme of which is ever new to poets:—

"O stormy peple, unsad and ever untrew,
And undiscrete, and changing as a fane,*
Delighting ever in rombel† that is newe,
For like the mone, waxen ye and wane:
Ay ful of clapping, dere ynough a jane,‡
Your dome|| is fals, your constance evil preveth,
A ful gret fool is he that on you leveth."§

Griselda works hard, receives the guests, and prepares for the feast, and with so much grace and tact does she manage, that all marvel at her prudence and industry. As the lords were about to sit down to meat, the marquess turns to Griselda and asks her opinion of her rival.

"Right wel, my lord, quod she, for in good fay,
A fairer saw I never non than she:
I pray to God yeve you prosperitee;
And so I hope, that He wol to you send Plesance ynough unto your lives end."

But she advises Walter not to try the young marchioness as she herself has been tried, as so tender a creature could not stand such rough treatment.

At this almost superhuman patience Walter gives way, and turning to Griselda tells her all.

"Thou art my wif; non other I ne have,
Ne never had, as God my soule save.
This is thy doughter, which thou hast supposed
To be my wif; that other faithfully
Shal be min heir, as I have ay disposed;
Thou bare hem of thy body trewely;
At Boloigne have I kept hem prively:
Take hem agen, for now maist thou not say,
That thou hast lorn non of thy children tway."

Then he tries to excuse himself, and explain his reason for trying Griselda.

"And folk, that otherwise han said of me,
I warne hem wel, that I have don this dede
For no malice, ne for no crueltee,
But for to assay in thee thy womanhede:
And not to slee my children (God forbede),
But for to kepe hem prively and still,
Til I thy purpose knew, and all thy will."

Thus does our earliest poet sing of the virtue patience, and personify it in the good and beautiful Griselda. Hers was patience of the highest order, virtue under terrible temptation, and of course few could go through so great an ordeal. Few, however, are placed in such trying positions, but we can all practise this virtue, which, though it possesses not the glamour of some others, leads greatly to that higher life to which we all ought to attempt to attain. More especially to women and girls ought this virtue to appeal. They are perhaps more often than men called upon to practise patience; moreover, it helps greatly to build up that gentle charm which is the chief and characteristic beauty of the gentler sex.

Strength—that is, strength of character—appeals more perhaps to human beings than any quality, and rightly so, for it is the source and fountain-head of goodness. But this strength can be shown in innumerable ways: it is as much a characteristic of women as of men, and a high form of strength is that which enables us to bear without murmur those miseries, those adversities, and those ailments which God allows to assail us, in order that we shall not centre our interest on this place of pilgrimage, but shall look forward to a higher and a better world, where good eternally prevails.

JOHN FRANCIS BREWER.

EATING RUE PIE.

A SHORT STORY FOR WORKING GIRLS.

By RUTH LAMB.

CHAPTER IV.

"THIS was what poor Fanny told me," said Mrs. Beckett, continuing her account, whilst her son listened with a thoughtful face.

"She said she wished she had been willing to be guided when George was persuading her into a hurried marriage, but she was vain of her good looks, and pleased herself with thinking that he had given up another girl for her sake. He had made her believe this, but after they were married, and when he was angry at her ignorance and shiftlessness, he told her the truth, that I had refused him, and that he had taken up with her more to vex me, as he thought, than because he really cared for her. It seemed my name had been often brought up in a cruel, cowardly way, for when he blamed Fanny he praised me, and said how clever I was in house matters, how neat in my dress, and how differently I should have managed with the same means, if only he had had the luck to get me instead of her. 'But I had no chance,' said Fanny. 'I did care for him, and I wanted to make him comfortable, but I did not know how. Then we started in debt for our bits of things; his work was not very regular, and when he was getting good wages a great part was spent on himself, and never came to me at all. It was always from hand to mouth; getting credit as long as we could, and paying part when the shopkeepers would trust us for no more. The children came, and were to be fed and clothed, and I was not strong, and got quite worn out with over-work and no—no comforts.'

"Poor soul! It was really no food she should have said, for, mother like, she took care that the children had nearly all there was, and she bore starvation for their sakes. 'He' (meaning her husband) 'was never very patient, and did not like to go short of anything for wife or children. At last he did what he had often threatened—he went off just before this poor baby came, and I have never heard of him since. I don't think I shall ever get up again, and I wanted you to say you forgive me for the silly airs I put on, and for boasting over you about George. If I could have known what was before me, I should have been humble enough.'

"What could I say but tell her how truly sorry I was for her, and that I never had any feeling of unkindness towards her. On the contrary, I had every cause to thank God for the goodness of my mistress, who had given me such wise advice, and also that He had inclined me to take it, and remain in my situation. There I was constantly gaining useful knowledge, and getting better fitted for the duties of a wife and mother, if I should be called on to undertake them. In the meanwhile I was very happy and contented.

"I have long since seen how rash and foolish I was, and how determined to listen to nothing but George's flattering words, and follow my own will," said Fanny. "If he had only stayed by me at this time. It is so very hard. I wish the young girls who think getting married means having everything that is best, could just see me now. I should preach to them without speaking. Mine has been a miserable life, and I am old and worn out at four and twenty.'

"Well, Richard, I need not tell you all that passed. I did what I could for poor Fanny, and I asked the help of my good mistress, who could and did more and better still. She had her removed to decent lodgings, so that the last few days of her life were spent in peace and comfort. She needed no one's kindness long, for a fortnight after she first sent for me she and her baby were laid in the same grave. Her greatest sorrow was that she could not see her husband, and forgive him in words as, in spite of all, she did in her heart. My good mistress got the other children into an orphanage, where they have been well taught and trained to be useful; but what became of their father we have never known. I stayed on in my situation until I was turned twenty-eight—fourteen years in all; and then I exchanged one happy home for another as happy and comfortable, though very humble in comparison with that in which I served so long. Many a mark of goodwill and kindly remembrance did I receive from the different members of the family, for the children had grown up into young men and women during my time of service there.

"I shall miss you far more now than I should have done ten years ago, when I persuaded you to pause before you married George Needham," said my kind mistress. 'Now I think you will be wise to marry the worthy, God-fearing man who loves you, and can offer you a comfortable home and a fair prospect of maintaining it.'

"You know what your father was, Richard, and how he was spared to see you, his youngest, grown up to sixteen years old and learning a trade. You know, too, that through his industry, steadiness, and thrift enough was saved to keep me above the fear of want, and that having health still, I am able to do something towards a living. But if he and I had married when we were ignorant, wilful young creatures of twenty and eighteen!—well, I will not say how things would have been with us and our children, but I am thankful we did not. And though I was joked many a time, and told that I should be an old maid, I can look over the four years of widowhood, and back upon twenty-five of nappy married life, with a truly thankful heart."

Mrs. Beckett paused, and Richard remained silent for a few moments. Then he said, "I don't think it is quite fair, mother, to put such a man as that George Needham and me together, as if we were alike. I care for Milly, and I want to make her happy."

"I am sure you do, dear lad, and she believes it. But it is because she is a good, unselfish girl, who wants to make you happy, but doubts her power to do it until she is older, wiser, and has learned many things of which she is ignorant, that she pleads for time and patience. She is right. I do not say wait until you are as old as I was when I married, for eight or ten years would seem very long to look forward to, though when you are working in earnest and feel an interest in what you are doing, the time flies faster than you would believe. But wait until you can prepare a home something like what you have been used to, and till Milly knows how to manage it and to get a fair penny worth in return for every penny of your earnings that will pass through her hands. Wait until you have a little spare money to fall back upon if bad times come. And above all, my boy—for you and Milly are but boy and girl yet—wait until you are fitter to be trusted with the training of immortal souls for God's service. Oh, my lad! if the young would think of the awfully solemn charge placed in them when a little child is given them to bring up in His faith and fear, they would trust themselves less, and oftener ask for guidance from above."

Mrs. Beckett would not say more to her son, but left him "to sleep upon her words."

On the following morning, when Richard came in to breakfast, he said, "Mother, you and Milly are right. I lay awake for hours thinking over all that you told me, and I made up my mind that there's a good deal of selfishness in my love for Milly. Still, there is too much reality about it for me to wish to see her worried and harassed and made old before her time, for my sake. You will teach her and help her, won't you, mother? And listen. I shall not ask her to be married until you say that the right time has come. If that is not trusting my mother, I don't know what is," and the brave lad threw back his head, and looked with honest eyes into those of his parent. Hers were moist enough, and for a moment she could scarcely answer. She had hoped for a good result from her talk of the previous evening, but not for anything so good as this.

Her arms went round his neck, and in a broken voice she said, "You have made me very happy, my dear Dick, and some one else will be as glad as I am."

The "someone else," in the shape of smiling, blushing Milly, was at Mrs. Beckett's when Dick returned from work that evening, and some very happy hours were spent together. The girl became Mrs. Beckett's scholar, and was eager to resemble her teacher. The mother identified herself with the hopes of the young people, entered into their plans, and gave them the benefit of her larger experience.

Richard worked harder than ever, and had more than one or two extra "rises" in wages before even he thought the right time had come for marriage. And Milly did good work in her own home by taking Mrs. Beckett's better ways into the disorderly household, and teaching her younger sisters to practise them.

When at length she became mistress of Dick's snug, comfortably furnished cottage, which was when she was turned three and twenty, she started with as fair a prospect as any young working girl could expect or wish for. Both bride and bridegroom gave the credit to Mrs. Beckett, and said, "But for you, mother dear, we might have been 'eating rue pie' for years past. As it is, we believe that as the years come and go they will only draw us closer together, and make us truer helps to each other, as husband and wife ought to be."

[THE END.]

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

OUR long and wintry summer has come to an end, and we only hope we may not be beginning a long and cold winter. Very few people have had the courage to wear their summer dresses this season, and the things most generally seen have been thin woollens in their almost endless variety. The woollen skirt was nearly always accompanied by a jersey or Garibaldi bodice, in some thin material—cotton, Surah silk, cashmere, flannelette, or a woven jersey web material. The last-named is made with full fronts of Pongee or some other soft silk, which is generally of the same colour as the jersey itself; but the "smocking," or "honey-combing," is carried out in white or coloured silks, the work being very fine, and in different patterns. Shirt bodices of silk are much worn with thick skirts also. These are always ornamented, either with fine tucks, honey-combing, or with embroidery. On cold days little jackets of the Zouave kind (without sleeves) are worn with these skirts, and are made of the same material as the skirt of the dress. The basque of the skirt is always visible below the belt, and there seems no longer any desire to return to the true Garibaldi, which ended at the belt, and did not go below.

The drapery of all skirts continues to be plain, and long, gracefully-flowing effects only are sought after. The usual skirt, with a bodice, is draped long on a foundation like many that I have illustrated. The other skirts worn are straight and simple, of the "Empire" class; or the old "Housemaid skirt," which has reappeared again amongst us under a new name, only without the tucks all round the edge. The new "Housemaid" is called "Corday," and is pleated at the waist, not gathered. It has a ribbon run round where the two or three tucks used to be seen above the hem, and is only as long as to touch the ankle. The "Empire" skirt is also ankle-length, and is gathered into the waistband, the trimming being a very full ruche, a festooning, or an edge of gathered embroidery. I have given an illustration of the "Empire" dresses for the winter, and this description of gown will be found on the young girl who stands with her back to the spectator; a very pretty, graceful style for girls, and not difficult to make up at home. By this picture it will be seen that full sleeves are on the increase, and will probably be as popular as the tight ones have been. They are decidedly more suitable than the latter for the usually thin arms of girlhood. The sash tied at the side of the waist is also graceful and suitable. In fact, I think all the fashions of the "Empire" are youthful; for were they not worn by women like the Empress Josephine, who wished to be a girl always? The short skirts are a great boon, as they should quite clear the ground, and now that I am talking about them, I want to mention the fact that gaiters are already much worn, and will be more worn as the cold season advances, by women who are obliged to walk, or who prefer it to driving. They are made of the same material as the dress in general, and most tailors will undertake their manufacture. I see that one of the most sensible of our writers considers that in the gaiter lies the true solution of the "Dress Reform" question; for were these comfortable articles of dress once adopted, the need for divided skirts would be obviated, as both feet and legs could be protected to any extent, because the gaiters could be made to reach above the knees. Many ladies have them made also, for constant wear, of fine black cloth, which looks very well indeed, and is not too thick.

THE NEW LONG CLOAKS.

I must give a few words now to the new colours prepared for the winter season. I think the generality of the cloths and materials seem to be either brown or green, but the tones are all very mild, indeed, almost dull. Stripes are again the ruling idea everywhere, the prettiest perhaps being those about two inches wide of two quiet contrasting colours. Dark slate, black currant, opium seed, ash, stone colour, and livery drab are amongst the names I hear most frequently. Virginia and Etruscan are the only two reds; the former is the dark shade of the Virginia creeper when turning in autumn; the latter is a kind of terra cotta. The prettiest of the winter woollens are those with a striped woven border along the selvedge above the hem. I should not be surprised if these pretty dresses in time quite superseded stripes.

There is hardly any change in the ordinary cloak, and though I have illustrated the new long cloaks, as they are the latest idea, I cannot be sure that they will take the place of others; they are excellent wrap cloaks, most comfortable and warm. Short jackets are being made in black and blue pilot cloth, and black and brown plush is made into covert jackets, with large buttons covered with plush also. Short autumn mantles are still short at the back and long in front, black cashmere being a favourite material for them. The new ulsters are mostly tight-fitting, and have had the wide lapels and pockets of the Directoire style added to them. They are very generally made in checked material, Scotch tweeds, homespuns, and Cheviots.

Cloth bonnets will probably be worn again this winter; the cloth being in a piece, and tucked and pleated loosely over the frame. Hats, in general, will be quite low in the crown and wide in the brim; and a new idea seems to be to take the crown out and supply its place with up-standing bows of ribbon. The ends of all ribbons, this autumn, are cut in "swallow tails," with very sharp points. Silk-beaver and felt hats are both likely to be popular. The former will be used for bonnets as well, with ribbon and feather trimmings, ostrich feathers promising to be more in vogue than ever. Some of the large felt hats with wide brims and low crowns are most picturesque when they are arranged with two ostrich feathers; the one not very long and coming to the front of the hat, the other long, and hanging below the brim at the back, so as to show behind the ear. The newest ribbons are very handsome, some of them having velvet stripes on a ground of thick grosgrain silk. Hat ribbons are, some of them, five inches in width, and all ribbons intended for millinery are manufactured with a plain satin edge or rows of cords.

Perhaps the most singular development of the subjects of the British Association occurred at its late meeting in the Biological Section, when two medical gentlemen read a joint paper on "The Physiological Bearing of Waistbands and Belts." After a short preamble they simply announced it as their opinion that tight-lacing, or, as they call it, "abdominal compression," was, in many cases, advantageous, as by its means a quantity of uselessly-stored blood was placed at the disposal of the muscles, brain, and skin. There was, of course, much more in the paper, but this seems to have been the gist of the matter. It created quite a hubbub, as may be supposed; the doctors present thinking it a dangerous doctrine to give out, especially in that meeting, and declaring that manifold evils were due to the very blood claimed to be so advantageously distributed into the other parts of the body, i.e., red noses and faces, palpitation and want of breath, varicose veins and swelled ankles, as well as all kinds of indigestions. Miss Lydia Becker was the only lady who supported the doctors in their rebellion against preconceived ideas, and the proceedings are stated to have "caused much amusement."

Although it is nearly a year since the redingote was first seen in town, it cannot be said to have ever quite become the fashion. But this winter they will be more generally adopted as a useful garment for cold weather. They are, in fact, quite unsuited for hot weather, as they only look well when made up in thick materials. I think it is best to say, that while the redingote is eminently suited to tall, slim, or girlish figures, it is most unbecoming to short stout people, or to those who, being tall, have exceeded the ordinary bulk of women. There is no question but that this shape grows more in favour every day. The foundation skirt for wearing with it is made like any other. It has one or two steels, and a cushion of small dimensions at the back. The front of the skirt (the only part which shows under it) may be of another material. It may be tacked to the skirt, and one side of the redingote may be sewn down upon it. The other side of the latter is fastened on by a row of buttons, which may be hidden under the hem, if preferred. The redingote is very plainly made up—without trimming if the material be rich, or consist of a coarse woollen, or a cloth; but thinner materials may have a trimming of passementerie.

The lapels of the front are turned back and faced with silk velvet or moiré. If made at home it will be safer to make them separately, and then put them on, as they will probably fit the better. The inside foundation must be cut out in stiff muslin, the two materials being laid on together and all run round, so as to turn them over and conceal this lining of muslin. The quantity of material—twenty-two inches wide—that will be required is eight yards. If velvet or moiré silk be used for the revers, half a yard of the first and a yard of the last is needed. The number of pieces in our pattern is thirteen—namely, two sleeve portions, cuff, front, side of front and side of back, back, skirt, pocket, revers, half of breast-front, small under-vest, and collar to it. I will be found a little difficult to put together, but the sketch is very plain, and only attention is needed to finish a successful garment at home.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker, care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.," price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county; and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, the Lady Dressmaker selects such patterns as shall be of constant use in making and re-making at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of the "G.O.P." may know of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic under-clothing have already been given:—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing-jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke, blouse polonaise, princess dress or dressing-gown, Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain basque bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials, Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, Emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, new spring mantle, and new polonaise.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "Fair Katherine," "The Shepherd's Fairy," "Seven Sons," "Spoilt Guy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER IV.

IT was quite dark by the time Noah and Adam had finished working, and then, full of hope that they might make a good thing out of the decoy which they meant to begin working in the autumn, and pleased with the success of their labours, they rowed back to Windham. "It is sure to succeed. Everything you touch does, Father Noah," said Adam, hopefully. "I never saw such a lucky man as you are."

"Say happy, not lucky, Adam; and thank the Lord it is true. I often think He does not try me enough, for I have no troubles now worthy the name. It is true we had some when we began life, as that row of little graves in Windham churchyard bears witness, but I doubt if there is a happier man in England than I am now. Indeed, I am not one of those who think that youth is the happiest time. It isn't. The happiest time is when the struggle for our own will is over, and we are content to accept what God sends us."

"But is that ever over on this side of the grave?" said Adam.

"I think so. Look at our rector, now: he is a happy man, though I don't believe he has ever got over, as people say, the loss of his wife; but he has accepted his sorrow, and I hope I am not presumptuous or deceiving myself if I say I believe I could accept cheerfully any sorrow the Lord might send me. But I could not have said that when I was a young man. No. Youth is the time of struggle and discipline; as we grow older we cease to struggle, and the discipline relaxes. I am speaking of course only of those who have given themselves to God, and so I think our happiness increases with our growth in grace on this side of the grave."

"You may be right, but it seems to me there are troubles I can never learn to accept."

"Ah, we all think so when we are young, Adam, my boy; our own will is so strong then; the tide of youth flows strong and fast; the waves of passion sweep over us and dash us against the rocks, and our own tears blind us, perhaps, to the Hand stretched out to save us; but as we grow older the sea of life is calmer, and the haven where we would be nearer. But you seem out of sorts to-night; is there any new trouble besides your mother's illness?"

"None I can tell you; though, as you know, I would tell you before anyone, Father Noah. It is not a new, but a secret trouble, and I fear a life-long one—a sorrow I can never accept."

"Tell the Lord then, my boy, and maybe He may turn it to joy; you know He can do all things."

"Thank you for saying that; you have put new hope in me. And now come in and see mother before you go home; she always says a talk with you is wine and oil to her," said Adam as they reached the school-house.

Noah accepted the invitation, and went in to spend half-an-hour with Mrs. Day, a querulous old woman, paralysed and rheumatic, who led poor Adam a miserable life, for her temper, never very amiable, was soured by pain, and its irritability increased since her first stroke of paralysis. After dissipating some of her ill-humour, Noah was persuaded to stay to supper, so that it was about ten o'clock when he returned to the ark.

"A splendid night for fishing," said Adam, coming to the door with him and looking out at the soft steady rain which was falling.

"Yes, I wish I had mended my net. However, this rain is likely to last now it has come; I didn't expect it so soon, or I should have hurried more."

"Is it too late to set it if I come over and help you to mend it?" suggested Adam.

"Yes, the tide began to flow two hours ago, and there is a good two hours' work at the net; thank you all the same. I'll have it out to-morrow, day and night, to make up though," said Noah, as he hurried home.

Accordingly when he got home Noah determined to finish mending his net before he went to bed, so as to have it ready to set for the next ebb-tide; so he sat down and worked away diligently by the light of his lamp; but it was a longer job than he expected, and at one o'clock he was still at it. Soon after one o'clock his quick ear detected footsteps outside, and putting aside his netting, he lighted a bull's eye and went out to see who it could be at that hour, though it could hardly be anyone except the police, who occasionally went round to the various eel-sets to examine the nets and see that no mesh less than an inch and a half from knot to knot, measured when wet, was used.

"Who's there?" shouted Noah, as he discerned two figures with lanterns going towards his eel-set.

"The police; your net is sure to be all right, Mr. Oldman, but we must just have a look, for form's sake," replied one of the figures.

"My net is not out to-night; it is broken, and I am mending it, or I should have been in bed," said Noah.

"What's this, then?" said the other policeman, who had reached the eel-set, and stooping down, turned his bull's eye on to the water to show a net was set, and then turning up his sleeve he plunged his hand into the water and pulled up a piece of the net whose mesh was certainly below the legal measurement.

"What is this? Why, it is an eel-net sure enough, and on my set, too, though how it came there I no more know than you do," said Noah, in amazement.

"It is a prohibited size, too," said the policeman, who held the piece of net in his hand.

"Impossible; let's measure it," said the other man.

"There is no need, it is a one-inch mesh," said Noah, dumbfounded, his practised eye knowing the size at a glance.

"Well, we shall have to confiscate the net and the fish, so we may as well haul it up, and as it is on your set, Mr. Oldman, you'll have to appear before the magistrates next week; but let us hope we may find out who set it before then or you'll have to pay a fine of five pounds," said the man who had discovered the net.

"I suppose it is a practical joke some of the broadmen have been playing on me; we may be able to identify the net, so let's haul it up; it is very heavy. I'll lend you my eel-trunks, or we shall lose the fish," said Noah.

And then he helped the policemen, who were not experienced in the work, to haul up the net, and seize the eels with a handful of dry grass and pop them into the eel-trunks; this took about an hour, for the policemen were not half so clever at grasping the slippery fish as Noah, and then when the net was emptied they spread it out on the grass to examine it.

"Why, this is a queer affair and no mistake; this is my own net, one I had new just a year before the Act was passed; I would swear to it anywhere, for it was a few inches too short and I lengthened it with a larger mesh. See!" And Noah held the lengthened net out for the policemen to examine.

"Queer is the word," was their comment.

"We'll soon make sure of it, for I keep my old net in a shed; we'll go and have a look, and if it isn't there we shall have no further doubt," said Noah.

"But we shan't be any nearer the truth," said policeman number one, who was a friend of Noah's, and as convinced of his innocence, in spite of appearances, as he was of his own.

"I am not so sure of that," said the other, in an undertone, for he was a new comer and inclined to believe everyone guilty until proved innocent, thus reversing the theory of the law of which he was an emissary.

"No, we shan't be any nearer the truth, as you say; but if we find my net in the shed, it won't look so bad for me, but I don't believe there is another net in Norfolk exactly like this one," said Noah, leading the way to the shed.

They found the door of the shed open, but Noah explained it had no lock, though when he went out it was fastened as usual by a hook, and, as he had foreseen, there was no eel-net anywhere in the shed, so it was clear enough it was his own net which had been set, and yet, so far as he knew, Noah had no enemy, no one who owed him a grudge in the county; on the contrary, he was not only very popular but very much respected also.

"I thought as much; I knew it was my net. Now what is to be done?" said Noah, who, surprised though he was, took the matter very calmly.

"We must take the net and the fish and serve you with a summons to appear before the magistrates next Tuesday, and you'll have to pay the fine, I am afraid, for I see no prospect of discovering the author of this trick, for trick it is, and a nasty one too; but I'll do my best to discover who it was. We may get the case remanded for a week, perhaps, and that'll give us more time," said Noah's friend.

"I hope we may, not so much on account of the fine, though five pounds is five pounds to me; but because I should like to come out of court cleared; if not, why I shan't be the first man that has been unjustly accused and punished, and I must just try and bear it as patiently as I can. As for the net, it is no use to anyone, though it was worth thirty pounds before the mesh was prohibited; and the eels I shan't miss because I never intended to set my net to-night. I wish now I had finished mending it in time, for then I should have found it out, but I was down at the schoolmaster's till just ten o'clock to-night. However, it is no use wishing. I was a bit lazy, perhaps, and I must suffer for it."

And after a little more conversation the policemen departed, taking the net with them and promising to send for the eels at daybreak to get them off to Billingsgate by the first train, while Noah went into the ark to get a few hours' sleep and to wake in the morning with a confused sense that trouble was at hand.

OUR ART NEEDLEWORK COMPETITION.

It has been suggested to us that an Art Needlework Competition would prove interesting to our girls; therefore, particulars of this, with designs and instructions how to carry them out, form the first of the new series of papers on the subject which commences in this volume.

The fact that the articles sent in for competition are to be presented to English Convalescent Homes will not, we are well assured, render our scheme less interesting in the eyes of the workers; for the thought that they are thus doing so much to make the rooms of the invalids bright and beautiful cannot fail to add zest to the tasteful labours of their busy fingers. You all know the keen sensation of pleasure which the contemplation of a beautiful and artistic object gives you; it is even conducive to a serenity of mind which is sure to be beneficial to a convalescent. For our own part, we confess that we should get well much more quickly in a room with pretty surroundings than would be the case in one which irritated our nerves by its bareness or ugliness. A patient might not herself be conscious of this, but with regard to many it is a fact all the same.

With this object in view, the four articles chosen for competition are such as will prove most likely to be useful as well as ornamental, and the designs are such as can be worked in the greatest variety of ways.

The material, colours, and style of making up we leave to the workers themselves, as by this means we are most likely to avoid sameness. The prizes of £5 5s. and £3 3s. offered by the Editor will be awarded to those articles which are finished with the highest degree of excellence, not only with regard to embroidery, but as a whole.

All articles must be sent in to 56, Paternoster Row, by the first Wednesday in July, 1889.

FIG. 1.—CHAIR-BACK.

Size—30 inches long by 18 inches wide. Scale— $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch to a foot

FIG. 2.—SUMMER BED QUILT FOR SINGLE BED.

Size—2½ yards long, 1½ yards wide. Scale— $\frac{1}{8}$ of an inch to a foot.

We do not make it a condition that the designs be enlarged and transferred to the material by the workers themselves. The best needlewomen are not always clever draughts-women. Competitors are therefore at liberty to manage this preliminary as they find most convenient. By drawing each design to scale, we have made the task as easy as possible, for it is above all things essential that they should be clearly and correctly drawn and transferred.

The chair-back which is shown in Fig. 1 is conventional grape-vine.

The material may be of either linen, flax, Kerrie-muir twill, silk, satin, or silk sheeting, and in any colours you prefer. It may be embroidered in crewel or silk, or both, either in outline with two or three shades of the same colour, or solidly. If worked in costly material, Japanese gold may be used in the outline, and a narrow fringe must be sewn on. The little borders at the lower edge of the design must be repeated at the other end of the chair-back, which should also be fringed. If either of the three first-named materials be used, the fringe should be made by means of drawing out threads. To a chair-back thus fringed, a prettier effect may be given by working silk or crewel, of the colours used in the embroidery, into it. It is always safer and easier to embroider costly material in a frame, but linen fabrics are as well done in the hand, if carefully stretched afterwards.

Fig. 2 is a summer bed quilt, which, therefore, with the exception of the border, which to ensure neatness must either be backed or placed on a margin of the material, need not be lined. We think we must in this case limit our competitors to linen fabrics as a ground for the work. Kerrie-muir twill or workhouse sheeting would be the best, and the border may be of coloured twill. Competitors are not bound to reproduce the stitches we have suggested in this design. The form and character must be retained, but they are at liberty to use their own taste with regard to the stitchery. The design is carefully chosen as giving a wide scope to the skill and ingenuity of the workers, and the greater variety of flat, raised, and seedling stitches introduced into the flower and leaf forms the better.

It may be worked with either crewel or "flourishing" thread, and with one colour throughout, shades of the same colour, or in any number of well-chosen and harmonious colours. If you propose to raise any part of the work, it will be well to choose only the smaller powderings, such as the acorns, cherries, etc., for the purpose.

If you will turn to a paper on the subject of Art Needlework, published last November, you will find in the description of Fig. 2 some hints which may be utilised in working out this design, as the powderings are somewhat similar in style to that of the panel.

Fig. 3 is a cushion of natural orchids, for some of our girls will no doubt prefer to work a natural design. Silk, satin, velvet, or linen would do for this. Competitors must bear in mind that the more costly the material chosen, the finer and more delicate should be the work. It must be solidly embroidered either in silk or crewel; crewel, with the high lights picked out by means of a few well-placed stitches of silk; or it might have the leaves in crewel and the flowers in silk. In any case it must be carefully shaded to be effective. Orchids are of so many shades of white, mauve, pink, yellow, etc., that you will have a good choice of colour. As the flowers are of necessity very much on one side of the design, in order to restore the balance of colour, a good many dead or faded leaf tints, such as red, brown and gold may be introduced into the tips of the leaves, and little sprays of moss at the roots. There is plenty of pale green in the buds, and of gold and yellow in the trumpet-shaped part of the flower. We would advise such of our competitors as can do so, to examine the flower for themselves, or, if that be out of their power, to get a good coloured drawing. We have often found the best Christmas cards fair guides to colour in such cases.

The Couvrette (Fig. 4) will we think, be a particularly useful article in a Convalescent Home, and therefore I hope it will be one of the prettiest. It must, of course, be rather warmly lined.

The material may be Kerrie-muir twill, silk, satin, or silk sheeting. If twill, it might be very cleverly worked in outline in two or three shades of the same colour, but we would advise solid work, and careful and delicate shading in natural colours. Either crewel or silk may be used: crewel leaves and silk flowers, or crewel having the lights accentuated with silk. The ribbon must also be solidly worked; shaded ribbons are so pretty in embroidery and always look well thus treated. The seedling stitch with which the ground is decorated should be all in the same colour, and may be worked with either silk or crewel.

Before commencing work, I would earnestly advise such of our girls as may be within a reasonable distance to visit the Royal School of Art Needlework in Exhibition Road, South Kensington, the South Kensington Museum, which is close by, or any exhibition or collection of art needlework they may be able to get at, in order to study varieties of stitches and harmony of colour.

BIRD LIFE IN NOVEMBER.

By A NATURALIST.

ALTHOUGH vegetation appears to have died out in this so-called dreary month of November, bird life is in a state of considerable activity, as any girl interested in the beautiful little creatures may see for herself if she chooses to look for them. Go where you will, bold robin redbreast will look at you with his full, dark eye, and his head cocked on one side, for robin is a most inquisitive and self-confident creature. I have made such friends with him in lonely places, that he would come to me regularly for his meals, taking the food from my fingers. A kind of superstitious regard for the robin, which is in a degree shared by the wren and the swallow, protects him most rigidly. Few schoolboys care to exhibit the eggs of the robin in their collections. If the weather is clear in November he sings most gaily, but if rough weather is brewing he will mourn dolefully.

If you chance to pass by a hazel hedge you may hear a rustle among the falling leaves, and looking down see the nuthatch in quest of nuts. Directly these are ripe he visits the hazel bushes, and takes his share; then, when the leaves lie thickly below, he hunts in the hedge once more, for he knows as well as the children do that two crops of nuts may be gathered in a season in that way. A bright, active bird he is, with blue-grey back and orange and white breast. The peculiar call he gives to his mate at times—twit, twit—will attract your attention to him.

Upon the upland pasture lands you will be sure to hear the chattering chack, chack, chack of the field-fares, the bluefelt of the country folks; or if you wander on and about the sheep pastures, where the juniper bushes flourish, you may hear a note like the alarm note of the blackbird, only wilder. It proceeds from the ring-ouzel, that has made his stay for a week or two, on his usual migration from the southern counties. He is a fine bold bird to look at—when you have the chance—but he is very shy. He is very irregular in his flittings to and fro. Some seasons the shepherds see great numbers of the ring-ouzel, other seasons not a November.

single one. Probably the year's crop of juniper berries has something to do with this. Wild berry-bearing trees and shrubs are like cultivated fruit trees, in rarely having full crops for successive years.

If we leave the uplands for the lower ground and enter the water-meadows, the first bird we are likely to see will be the gentle redwing. When hard times come he will sit with his head on his shoulders and his breast feathers puffed out; but you will not hear him complain, for, like most gentle creatures that God has created, he suffers in silence.

Close to the redwing a bird springs up, crying "scapè"! and you see a flash of white and a streak of brown—just enough to let you know that you have disturbed a snipe. Strange it is that the wader and the song bird should feed at the same table, so to speak.

As the afternoon shortens, the starlings go through their manoeuvres before settling for the night, and all the members of the finch tribe leave the stubble and lea grounds for thick copse and hedge shelter. Close by, a chattering rattle sounds; it is the wren fussing about and talking to himself before going to rest. And now there is a regular row among the members of the finch tribe; they are clattering in and about the bare stems and twigs in all directions. On looking we see a grey flash glide over the fields—it is the dread sparrowhawk.

Daylight fades. A grey mist comes over all things. Flapping bird forms show here and there over the bare fields, low down, twisting and turning, and you hear "Pewit, pewit, pewit." The green plovers are on their feeding-ground. Very good friends to the farmer are the full-eyed crested plovers.

You have an impression that some bird has passed over your head whilst you were looking at the plovers—it was the barn owl; the gloom that is fast gathering is his best hunting time.

NOTICES OF NEW MUSIC.

PATERSON AND SONS (EDINBURGH).

A Sailor's Song. This is a capital bright four-part song by Otto Schweizer, with both English and German words.

Bonny Kilmeny. A cantata for soli, chorus, and orchestra. By Hamish MacCunn. —A most fascinating work, full of graceful melody and very musically treatment. It is to be regretted that the pianoforte arrangement of orchestral accompaniments, of such interest as, at least, the work before us, does not contain indications of the various instruments employed. This is a great help, even to a piano accompanist, in imparting character to each section of the work. The subject of the opening chorus is often pleasantly referred to in the course of the cantata, and where all things are good, we would call special attention to No. 2, tenor solo; No. 7, a chorus, ending Part II.; No. 11, Kilmeny's solo, and the Epilogue, which is an excellent piece of part-writing. Although, to a musician, the accompaniments are most suggestive throughout, nevertheless we feel that great additional enjoyment might be given to the average reader were the orchestral combinations named here and there.

We have also received Nos. 3, 4, and 5 of a set of six songs by the same clever young composer, each one evincing his tasteful fancy and considerable versatility. Let us sincerely hope that nothing may break the promise of great things contained in Mr. MacCunn's work thus far.

Andante and Allegretto, for two violins and piano, by Pierre Perrot, is a useful piece, containing in the allegretto in B minor a good brisk contrast to the 3-4 opening movement.

Two Short Movements, for either violin or violoncello, by the same composer, are inscribed "for pupils," and very good material for practice will they make. The movements are connected, and form one short work.

ROBERT COCKS AND CO.

Ellaline Gavotte. Composed for the piano, by Hamilton Clarke.—A capital little dance, in every way above the average of the modern gavotte. We often wonder that a composer of such enormous talent as Hamilton Clarke should never let us hear or see the Symphonies and other important works of which we know him to be the able writer.

MARRIOTT AND WILLIAMS.

Away, Far Away is an excellent song, by Miss Edith Marriott, a lady whose work we have often had occasion to recommend to our readers. The song is published in two keys.

As I went down to Richmond Town is a very fair imitation of the old English ballad, the words, which are written by the composer of the music, F. W. Deane, being very quaint and old-fashioned.

Outward Bound is a simple duet for mezzo-soprano and tenor, by Stanislaus Elliot.—There are very few duets written for these voices, and some new ones are much needed.

Slavenski Mazurka; Seladon Valse, and Nocturne "In Vain," are the titles of three duets written for violin and pianoforte, by the late Franz Leideritz.—The recent death of this clever writer is much to be regretted.

Polacca, by Josef Trouselles, is also a number of the "Violinist's Album," which seems to be a very good collection of drawing-room pieces for this favourite instrument.

NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

We have before us a most interesting collection of Hymns and Anthems of a Congregational character, composed by the late Miss Eliza Flower, and set to words chiefly selected from Holy Scripture and the writings of the poets. Amongst many original thoughts and phrases we would select, for special consideration, the setting of the words "Nearer, my God, to Thee." The idea of making the congregation respond to the Choir in certain passages is excellent.

Six Pieces for Violin. Composed by Dr. A. C. Mackenzie. This collection of violin solos is dedicated to Madame Norman Neruda (whom we congratulate as Lady Hallé), and is a most valuable addition to our violin library. Our readers may not all know that the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music is an accomplished violinist in addition to his other talents.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ART.

MERRY-GO-ROUND.—It is quite true that red is an exciting colour to the whole tribe of oxen, and probably to the rest of the grazing animals as well. Turkeys and geese are annoyed by it also. The reason given is that red is the complementary colour to green, and as the eyes of the animals are during most of the day fixed on the green herbage on which they are feeding, a red article impresses their sight with great intensity. Of all the grazing tribe, oxen are the most pugnacious; and consequently they are more easily provoked than the others by the sight of a red object.

HOUSEKEEPING.

INEXPERIENCE.—Dessert is generally now put on the table when it is arranged for dinner. If there be no room for fruit, it can be put on with the dessert plates and finger glasses. Fish carvers, i.e., a knife and fork of silver or electro-plate, for helping the fish, and also fish knives and forks for eating it, are sold by all silversmiths.

BOILED LOBSTER.—Professor Huxley in his book, "The Crayfish," is the only authority we can quote on the reason for the change of colour in the lobster when it is boiled. Many theories have been advanced for it, and the same effect would be produced by the action of alcohol, ether, and many acids. The reason assigned by Professor Huxley is, that the outer shell of the lobster and the crayfish contains rather more than half its weight of calcareous salts, of which 7-8ths consist of carbonate of lime, the rest being phosphate of lime. These salts become dissolved in the boiling water, and act chemically on the rest of the shell, causing the change of colour.

HOUSEWIFE.—The secret of preserving fruit seems to lie in gathering it in dry weather, sufficient boiling, and addition of sugar, and in keeping it, when finished, in a dry, airy place. Both dampness and lack of air are enemies to its preservation. Also, it should be covered down while hot.

ANXIETY, and AN IRISH TOURIST.—We do not know of anything, saving to try some of the many insect powders sold, or else turpentine, or kerosene oil, applied with a brush. If the worms you speak of are the little white ones of the moth, you may destroy them by extreme care in hunting for them in May and June, and by ironing your carpet on the wrong side with a hot iron. We should advise that more care be used in turning out and cleaning the rooms, and that more frequently, and in giving plenty of air and light. Damp, dark rooms are great inviters of moths and of all insects.

RUB.—Grease stains of any kind can be removed with fuller's earth, moistened with lemon juice, and a small quantity of pulverised pearlsh. This may be made into balls (enough lemon juice being employed) and used to scour the stained places whenever needed. A little French chalk scraped on a fresh grease or oil spot will take it out.

MUSIC.

A LOVER OF MUSIC should attend a class, if one could be formed amongst her acquaintances, and arranged for with some good teacher.

ESSY W.—The violin is a very difficult instrument to play well, and perhaps the anxiety to excel in so doing causes you too much nervous excitement; or else you protract your practising too long at a time, and being liable to headaches, you suffer from it.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER.—Do not attempt to play music for which you have no taste, and which you will play with no feeling nor correctness of expression. You will only disgust others as well as yourself.

D. DENHAM.—You are by no means too old to learn the violin at twenty, but we advise you to obtain a few lessons to commence with, from an amateur, if not a professional. Nevertheless, we know some persons, of both sexes, who taught themselves. Your ear should be thoroughly good.

COPPERS.—The only legend of that kind attached to Loch Lomond would probably be of the days of Mary Queen of Scots, we think. You must not imagine that there is a tale attached to every song, as most of them are purely imaginary.

MARY B.—A volunteer's "buglette," as it is called, has eight or ten notes, and gives any call whatever. The bugles used for a tricycle club should be of the same kind. They cost under a pound, and can be got of any good instrument maker, we suppose.

THE GIRL'S OWN ORDER OF MERIT.

The following has been received from Nurse Finnis:—

Rochester,
August 25th, 1888.

Sir,—This morning I received the "Medal of the Girl's Own Order of Merit," which I beg thankfully to acknowledge and gratefully accept. I need scarcely say how much I appreciate and value the honour conferred upon me by both yourself and subscribers. I feel that it will be an incentive to try and make myself more worthy of it.

Believe me to remain, sir,

Yours obediently,

LAURA FINNIS,

Head Nurse, St. William's Hospital.

THE GIRL'S OWN INDOOR BOOK,

Containing Practical Help to Girls on all Matters relating to their Material Comfort and Moral Well-being.

EDITED BY

CHARLES PETERS,

Editor of "A Crown of Flowers," etc.

WITH OVER ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY ILLUSTRATIONS.

THIS volume is compiled from material published in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER during the nine years of its issue. The earlier volumes being now out of print, and many of the papers contained therein being frequently in request, it remained for us to snatch from oblivion those sections of our girl literature that were considered worthy of permanent use.

This Book is published to supply in one volume directions in those particular matters that each girl must be conversant with in order to attain anything like the ideal and practical perfection of girlhood. The writers of the varied subjects treated of are recognised specialists in their particular work, so that every girl reading with care and intelligence will derive, if not initial instruction, yet help of an important kind, tending to the increase of her reasoning faculties, and an improvement in indoor handicraft consequent thereupon.

LIFE'S REFRESHING.

By FRANCIS GEORGE ROBERTON.

WHENE'ER the heart is bowed with care,
And toilsome life too hard to bear,
To Nature undefiled repair,
And rest thee there.

Where poppies nod their crimson heads,
And violets hide in mossy beds,
And not a flower or creature dreads
The morrow there;

Where dreamy-eyed cows seek the shade
By leafy trees so welcome made,
Or in the dimpling brooklet wade,
And cool them there.

To see the sun-lit butterfly
O'er meadows sweet flit gaily by,
Should make the dullest, dimmest eye
Grow debonair.

"NATURE UNDEFILED."

THE ROMANCE OF NATURE:

OR,

THE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS, PLANTS, EARTH, AIR, SEA, AND SKY.

By JAMES MASON.

I.—THE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS.

HERE is a matter-of-fact way of looking at nature, and there is a romantic.

Much is to be said in praise of both, but on the side of the romantic the balance of interest certainly lies. It may sometimes need a strong sense of duty to study details of structure, intricacies of classification, and hard names, not to speak of other often dry-as-dust particulars. The mention of romance, however, sets us reading for the mere pleasure of it.

Everything in nature is surrounded by a halo of fanciful notions, and when this ideal glory is recognised, the commonest objects become attractive. We find them linked with the doings of fairy folk, revealing the secrets of the future, influencing good fortune, scaring away witches, forming the subjects of odd legends; a refreshing contrast, in short, to things as they ordinarily appear, in our practical, utilitarian, unbelieving present-day world.

No doubt much of the folklore of nature is to us not learning at all, but only folk-nonsense. But what of that? "A little nonsense now and then," we know, "is relished by the wisest." We must consider, besides, that traditional stories and traditional practices, of which we now think lightly, once formed articles of faith and had their roots deep in the minds of our forefathers. When the study of such beliefs is pursued in a scientific spirit, we discover strange things. Every piece of folklore will be found to have an instructive history, if we only succeed in following it to its source. Even "Beauty and the Beast" can be made to furnish evidence of human life in Asia, thousands of years ago, and "Cinderella" takes us back to a time when Europe was covered with thick forests lively with the howling of wild beasts.

But folklore, even without scientific treatment, may well take up a small portion of our time and occupy a nook in our memories. By its means a new relish is given to the enjoyment of nature. It is a subject that is in season summer and winter, within reach of everybody, and, like every other subject of interest, a promoter of good spirits; she, indeed, who goes about trying to see the romantic side of everything is never likely to be melancholy.

Our object in the following papers is to wander awhile in this pleasant field, dealing in order with the folklore of animals, plants, earth, air, sea, and sky. We shall not try to set down all the folklore that might be told, as it is best to follow the advice of La Fontaine, who says, "Far from exhausting a subject, we ought only to take the cream of it." A great deal will be left for any girls who desire to pursue the subject on their own account.

This is all we need say in a general way, so now to turn to particulars. We shall begin with the horse, the friend and companion of man, and an important object of superstitious belief. Horses are supposed to be able to see spirits, and the exhibition by them of signs of terror when no cause of alarm is noticeable by human vision, is regarded in some localities as an omen of death. The house at which they shy, it is said, must expect calamity, and if a horse neighs opposite any door the people living there will be visited by sickness. In the west of Scotland it used to be held that if a horse stood and looked through a gateway or along a road where a bride or bridegroom lived, it was a bad omen for the future happiness of the intending couple.

In the olden time the neighing of a horse was a sure pledge of coming victory, and his silence was an indication of defeat. We find that so late as the battle of Agincourt, in 1415, the French augured badly for their success from the fact of their horses not having neighed the night before.

To find the shoe of a horse and hang it behind the door was thought to be a means of securing good luck to the household, and protecting it from witchcraft and from the influence of the evil eye. "I have seen this charm," says Mr. James Napier, "in large beershops in London, and I was present in the parlour of one of these beershops when an animated discussion arose as to whether it was most effective to have the shoe nailed behind the door or upon the first step. Each position had its advocates, and instances of extraordinary luck were recounted as having attended each position." The reason for this strange superstition, according to some, is that "Mars, the god of war and the war-horse, was thought to be an enemy to Saturn, who, according to a mediæval idea, was the liege lord of witches." This explanation must be taken for what it is worth.

The teeth of horses are believed by some to be a preservative against toothache, and a horse's hoof is often put under a child's pillow to avert convulsions.

With the superstitious the colour of horses is of importance. To meet a piebald horse is lucky, and if you meet two in succession you have but to express any reasonable wish and it will be gratified within a few days! The Arabs are much influenced in their estimate of horses by what they consider lucky colours. "Prosperity," says their prophet Mahomet, "is with sorrel horses."

The dog, like the horse, is supposed to be able to see beings in the air, to us invisible. This is an old superstition. In the Odyssey the dogs of the swineherd Eumæus are described as terrified at the sight of Minerva, though at the time she was invisible to Telemachus.

The howling of a dog at night is held as indicating approaching death to those who may be ill in the neighbourhood. Grose gives this as a certain sign that some one of the family will very shortly die, and in Home's "Dæmonologie" we read, "If dogs howle in the night neer an house where somebody is sick, 'tis a signe of death." Some say this arises from the animal's keen scent, by which it detects the odour of approaching dissolution, but according to others the dog knows what is going forward because it sees spirits hovering round the house ready to bear away the soul of the departed. The belief in the howling of dogs before death occurs in a non-Aryan race in India, where it is explained by a curious myth about the creation of man.

Puss has long been held to have a close connection with the world of witches. Change of shape was one of the everyday occurrences of that uncanny realm, and a witch not seldom took the form of a cat. Black was the usual colour, to correspond with the unhallowed business on which the witch was ordinarily engaged. For this reason black cats often had a bad time of it. If a witch did not herself assume this form, she might be attended by an evil spirit in the shape of a black cat.

"In some of the more unfrequented districts of Scotland," Dr. Gordon Stables mentions, "the good folks are still very careful to shut up their cats on Hallowe'en, i.e., the 31st of October. And they tell me that those cats that have managed to escape incarceration that night may be seen, by those brave enough to look, scampering over hill and dale, and across the lonely moors, each one ridden by a brownie, a bogle, a spunkie, or some other infernal jockey."

Everyone knows the rhyme about children: "Born in May die of decay." May-kittens, it seems, have also a streak of ill-fortune in their composition. In the West of England cats born during the months of May are despised as mousers, it being believed that instead of following their proper business of catching mice and rats they devote their attention to snakes and slowworms. Speaking of mousers, there is a curious superstition in Hungary, that before a cat can become a good mouser it must be stolen.

Cats have a brilliant reputation as weather prophets. If a cat frisks about the house in an unusually lively manner she has a gale of wind in her tail, and storms may be looked for. If she washes her face with unusual diligence, especially with her paw behind her ears, it is going to be stormy. If she sits with her back to the fire you may expect in winter frost and snow, in summer thunder and lightning with hail. She is also held to prognosticate illness. If a cat sneezes it is believed by some that the medicine chest may be produced, for all the family are sure to have colds.

There is a common and absurd popular error that cats suck the breath of children and so kill them. The origin of this notion is likely enough to be found in the old superstition that witches took the form of cats. "The idea," says Dr. Stables, "is simply preposterous. Cats being extremely fond of children, naturally like to get into the cradle to lie beside and watch them. They often crouch upon the child's breast; this may impede breathing more or less according to the relative size of the cat to the baby. If the cat actually sits upon the child's face, then indeed the poor creature may be suffocated. But such an occurrence is so very rare that it is hardly worth mentioning. Many more deaths occur from bad management of a baby's pillow, in which case the mother must be glad when there is a cat to put the blame upon."

It is held in some places to be very unlucky for a cat to die in the house, so when pussy is ailing she is placed in the coal-cellar or other outhouse, with plenty of food, and kept there till she either gets better, or comes to an end of her proverbial nine lives. Mr. James Napier, speaking of folklore in the west of Scotland, mentions his having known families where the death of a cat indoors threw them into the greatest consternation from a belief that it indicated approaching misfortune.

In Sicily, where the cat is looked upon as sacred to St. Martha, there is a superstition that anyone who either wilfully or accidentally kills a cat will be punished by the serious retribution of seven years' unhappiness. This must make Sicily a desirable place of residence for puss and her kittens.

The cats' paradise, however, must have been ancient Egypt. There they were held sacred to Isis, or the moon. Temples were raised, and sacrifices offered in their honour, and when, in the course of nature, they died, their bodies were embalmed. Amongst the modern Egyptians this exhibition of regard is not yet quite extinct, for in Cairo there is an endowment in operation for the lodging and feeding of homeless cats.

From cats to mice is an easy transition. A number of mice suddenly coming into a house is held in Northamptonshire to be an omen of death. The same is to be said of a mouse running over any person, or of one squeaking behind the bed of an invalid, or of a white mouse scampering across the room.

In going a journey it is reckoned unlucky to meet with a shrew mouse. Many country people have an idea that the harvest mouse is unable to cross a path which has been trod by man, and is struck dead whenever it tries to do so. This they say accounts for the numbers which on a summer's evening may be found lying dead on the verge of the field footpaths, without any marks of violence being visible upon them. A visitor to Hertfordshire once put an incredulous face on this piece of information and was met by the reply:—

"Ah! you Lunnners don't know everything. Why, I've found 'em dead upon the path scores o' times, and I know they can't get across alive."

About rats there have been some curious notions. One was that they had a presentiment of coming evil, and always took care to desert in time a ship about to be wrecked, or a house about to be flooded or burned. As late as 1854 it was seriously reported in a Scotch provincial newspaper that the night before a town mill was burned, the rats who frequented the establishment were met migrating in a body to a neighbouring pease-field. This notion has given rise to the verb "to rat," often used in political controversy, and applied to those who forsake a losing side for the stronger party.

Another notion about rats was that you might extirpate them by a persevering course of anathematising in rhyme. According to Reginald Scot, this poetical charm could be put in force against any beast; but the idea was in general restricted to the rat. Many old authors allude to it. When Orlando took to hanging odes upon hawthorns, and elegies on brambles, all deifying the name of Rosalind, we find Rosalind saying, "I never was so berhymed since. . . . I was an Irish rat"; that is to say, in a previous state of existence.

Rats were deified by the Egyptians and Phrygians. In Egypt they were a symbol of utter destruction; they also symbolised judgment, because they always selected the best bread for their repast. The Romans drew presages from them, and to see a white rat was held to be a token of good fortune.

There are many items of folklore connected with sheep and cattle. Country people in some districts think it lucky to see the head turned towards them of the first lamb they come upon in spring. Should he be standing with his tail turned in their direction, that is a harbinger of misfortune. In the southern counties of England it is held to be unlucky to count lambs before a certain time; if you do it is believed they will not thrive. "With this," remarks a writer, in Chambers's "Book of Days," "may be compared the popular notion of the character of David's sin in numbering the people of Israel and Judah, related in the last chapter of the Second Book of Samuel—a narrative which makes some people look with suspicion and dislike upon our own decennial census."

Should a farmer's cows become restive without any apparent cause it forbodes trouble to either the master or the mistress. An ox or a cow breaking into a garden is held by some to be an omen of death. There is a proverbial saying when any one is dangerously ill, and not likely to recover, "The black ox has trampled on him." A black ox was sacrificed to Pluto, the infernal god, as a white one was to Jupiter.

The pig, which is under the special patronage of St. Anthony, has a legend connected with it, thus told by Dr. Cobham Brewer: "In the forefeet of pigs is a very small hole which may be seen when the hair has been carefully removed. The tradition is that the legion of devils entered by these apertures. There are also round it some six rings, the whole together not larger than a small spangle; they look as if burnt or branded into the skin, and the tradition is that they are the marks of the devil's claws when he entered the swine. (Mark vi. 11—15)."

When on their rambles witches, it used to be believed, often assumed the form of hares, and many tales are told of their adventures and perilous escapes when in this disguise. To give an example of one of these, there was a large hare which haunted the neighbourhood of a Cornish village, and on numberless occasions baffled the hounds, or carried off unhurt incredible quantities of shot. One luckless day it crossed the path of a party of determined sportsmen, who followed it for many a weary mile and fired several rounds, with the usual want of success. Before relinquishing the chase, one of them, who considered the animal as something beyond an ordinary hare, suggested the trial of silver bullets, and accordingly silver coins were beaten into slugs for this purpose. The hare was again fired at, and this time wounded, though not so effectually as to prevent its running round the brow of the hill and disappearing among the rocks. In searching for the hare, they discovered instead old Molly crouched under a shelving rock, panting and flushed by the long chase. From that day forward she had a limp in her gait.

The possibility of a hare being a witch in disguise may have been at the root of the dislike people had in some parts of the country to seeing a hare cross the road in front of them when they were going to their work or proceeding on an errand. Many under such circumstances would return home and not pursue their business till the next meal had been eaten, for beyond that the evil influence did not extend.

We turn now to speak of feathered folk, and first among these shall place the melodious nightingale. There is an old German legend which shows that the nightingale, with all her fine voice, is in some respects no better than she should be. Once upon a time the nightingale and the blind worm had each but one eye apiece, and they lived together in one house for a long while in peace and content. At last the nightingale was invited to a feast by a friend. She said to the blind worm—

"I am invited out, and don't like to go with one eye; be so good as lend me yours and I shall bring it back to you in the morning."

The blind worm, out of good feeling, consented. The next day when the nightingale came home she was so pleased at having two eyes in her head and being able to see on both sides, that she would not give back to the poor blind worm the borrowed eye.

The blind worm said he would get it back again. "Try," said the nightingale—

"I have my nest on the linden-tree,
So high, so high, so high,
You will not find it."

Since that time all nightingales have had two eyes and all blind worms none. But when the nightingales build their nest a blind worm lives in the bush, and it always strives to climb up and bore a hole in its enemy's eggs and suck them.

The cuckoo is perhaps of all birds the one most closely connected with superstitious lore. On hearing the cuckoo for the first time in spring one should be walking; according to the old Scotch rhyme—

"Gang and hear the gowk (cuckoo) yell,
Sit and see the swallow flee,
See the calf before its mither's ee,
'Twill be a happy year wi' ye."

Above all things the bird's first note should not be heard in bed, otherwise illness or death in the family may be looked for. It is a popular belief in Norfolk that whatever you are doing the first time you hear the cuckoo that you will do most frequently all the year. In Cornwall it is said that if on first hearing the cuckoo the sounds proceed from the right, it signifies that you will be prosperous—"You will go vore in the world"—if from the left, ill-luck is before you.

If on first hearing the cuckoo you have money in your pocket you will never want it all the year. To this superstition some add, that you should turn your money and wish, and if the wish be within the bounds of reason, it is sure to be fulfilled.

The unmarried, it is said, may learn how many years they are to remain single by counting the cuckoo's notes the first time they are heard in spring. Others ascertain the length of their lives in the same way, a practice connected with which we have the old rhyme—

"Cuckoo, cherry-tree,
Come down and tell to me
How many years I have to live."

This recalls a curious legend found in Denmark. When in early spring the voice of the cuckoo is heard in the woods, every village girl kisses her hand and asks, "Cuckoo! cuckoo! when shall I be married?" And the old folks, borne down with age and rheumatism, inquire, "Cuckoo! cuckoo! when shall I be released from this world's cares?" The bird in answer continues saying, "Cuckoo" as many times as years will elapse before the object of their desires will come to pass. But as some old people live to an advanced age, and many girls die old maids, the poor bird has so much to do in answering the questions put to her, that the building season goes by; she has no time to make her nest, but lays her eggs in that of the hedge-sparrow.

In Shropshire not so long ago, when the first cuckoo was heard the labourers made a practice of leaving their work, making holiday for the rest of the day, and carousing in what they called the cuckoo-ale. Amongst the girls of the olden time it was a common article of belief that if one ran to the fields early in the morning to hear the first note of the cuckoo, and on hearing it took off her left shoe, she would find in it a hair of the same colour as that of her future husband.

According to a popular rhyme the owl, in telling the story of her experiences, says—

"Once I was a monarch's daughter,
And sat on a lady's knee;
But I'm now a nightly rover
Banished to the ivy-tree."

This, however, is mere pretence. The owl was never a princess; she was a baker's daughter. This humbler origin is alluded to by Ophelia in Hamlet. "They say," she remarks to the king, "the owl was a baker's daughter. . . . We know what we are, but know not what we may be." Commenting on this passage, Mr. Douce says that this is a common tradition in Gloucestershire. The story is as follows: Our Saviour went into a baker's shop where they were baking and asked for some bread to eat. The mistress of the shop immediately put a piece of dough in the oven to bake for him; but was reprimanded by her daughter, who, insisting that the piece of dough was too large, reduced it to a very small size. The dough, however, immediately began to swell, and presently became of enormous dimensions, whereupon the baker's daughter cried out "Heugh, heugh, heugh!" and was transformed into an owl for her want of charity.

The raven takes us back to the days when good King Arthur ruled this land. Speaking of Arthur, Don Quixote tells Vivaldo that there is an old tradition "and a common one all over that kingdom of Great Britain, that this king did not die, but that by magic art he was turned into a raven; and that in process of time he shall reign again and recover his kingdom and sceptre; for which reason it cannot be proved that, from that time to this, any Englishman has killed a raven."

This legend of King Arthur's existence in the form of a raven was repeated as a piece of folklore as late as the beginning of this century. A writer in Notes and Queries mentions that his father, when walking once along Marazion Green, with his fowling piece on his shoulder, saw a raven at a distance and fired at it. An old man who was near immediately rebuked him, telling him that he ought on no account to have shot at a raven, for that King Arthur was still alive in the form of that bird.

There is a curious superstition about magpies. According to the number seen so will be the good or bad fortune of the observer. A common rhyme tells us—

"One for sorrow, two for mirth, Three for a wedding, four for death."

"And it is a curious thing," remarks a writer in the "Book of Days," "that as the man said about the horsechairs being turned into eels, I have proved it; for as I was on my way to be married, travelling upon a coach-top to claim my bride the next day, three magpies—neither more nor less—flew across the road."

The rhyme, however, varies in some localities. In the West of Scotland, for example, it runs—

"One bodes joy, two's a death, Three's a wedding, four's a birth."

"I knew a man," says Mr. James Napier, "who, if on going to his work he had seen two piets together, would have refrained from working before he had taken breakfast, believing that if he did so it would result in evil either to himself or his family."

For seeing crows there is a rhyme very like that about magpies. In Essex the following lines are said to be true if the crows fly towards you—

"One's unlucky, two lucky,
Three is health, four is wealth,
Five is sickness, and six is death."

Pigeons are the subject of several superstitions. It used to be believed that pigeons always sat on two eggs, which produced a male and a female, and that these twin birds lived together in love all the rest of their lives. Being examples of fidelity did not, however, prevent them from proving ominous of ill-fortune. A pigeon sitting in a tree or coming into the house, or from being wild suddenly growing tame, is in some districts regarded as a sign of death. It is an omen of death also if an invalid asks for pigeons to eat. A correspondent of Notes and Queries mentions his applying to a highly respectable farmer's wife to know if she had any pigeons to sell, as a sick friend had expressed a longing for some. "Ah! poor fellow!" she said, "is he so far gone? A pigeon is generally almost the last thing they want; I have supplied many a one for the like purpose."

No one, it used to be believed in Northamptonshire, can die on a bed in which there are pigeons' feathers. Some, however, only go so far as to say, that with pigeons' feathers in a bed people "die hard," and it used to be a common practice in country places not to allow dying people to lie on a feather bed at all in case pigeons' feathers should be in it. The same belief exists in regard to game feathers. A resident in Sussex was one day talking to a labourer on the absurdity of such a notion, but he failed to convince the good man, who, as proof of the correctness of his belief, brought forward the case of a poor man who had lately died after a lingering illness.

"Look at poor Muster S.," he said, "how hard he wer a dying. Poor soul, he could not die one way till neighbour Puttick found out how it wer. 'Muster S.,' says he, 'ye be lying on geame feathers, mon, surely; and so he wer. So we took'n out o' bed, and laid 'n on the foore, and he pretty soon died then!'"

There is a proverb to the effect that "He who is sprinkled with pigeon's blood will never die a natural death." This is said to have had the following origin. A sculptor was carrying home a bust of Charles I., and stopped to rest on the way. Just at that moment a pigeon overhead was struck by a hawk, and the blood of the bird fell on the neck of the bust. The sculptor thought it ominous, and after the king was beheaded the saying became current.

The wood-pigeon builds about the worst nest of any of the feathered tribe, and this forms the subject of a legend which is thus told in Suffolk: The magpie once undertook to teach the pigeon how to build a more substantial and commodious dwelling, but instead of being a docile pupil, the pigeon kept on her old cry of "Take two, Taffy; take two, Taffy!" The magpie insisted that this was a very unworkmanlike manner of proceeding, one stick at a time being as much as could be managed to advantage; but the pigeon reiterated her "Two, take two," till Mag, in a violent passion, gave up the task, exclaiming, "I say that one at a time is enough, and if you think otherwise you may carry on the work yourself, for I will have no more to do with it." Since then the wood-pigeon has built her slight platform of sticks, which certainly suffers much in comparison with the strong substantial structure of the magpie.

The cooing of the wood-pigeon produces, it is said:—

"Take two-o coo, Taffy!
Take two-o coo, Taffy!"

an allusion, Dr. Robert Chambers remarks, to the story of a Welshman, who thus interpreted the note, and acted upon the recommendation by stealing two of his neighbour's cows.

SUNSHINE AFTER RAIN.

By LADY WILLIAM LENNOX.

ITTY MCGOWAN lived with her grandmother in a comfortable cottage near the River Dec. She had so lived ever since she was three years old, and had no other kith nor kin, her father having been killed in a railway accident when she was only two, and her mother—who never got over the shock of seeing her husband's body brought home, crushed almost beyond recognition—having faded slowly and died a year after. The old grandmother, nearly broken-hearted at the loss of her son and daughter-in-law, took the little creature to her own cottage, and lavished upon it all the love and tenderness of which she was capable. He husband had been a well-to-do farmer, though in a small way, and a thrifty man besides, so that what with his savings, and the money which came to her from his life insurance, and the sale of the farm, which she was unable to keep on after his death, the widow found herself in fairly good circumstances for her position in life. The little cottage was a model of neatness and cleanliness. The pots and pans in the kitchen, and the old-fashioned mahogany furniture in the parlour, were as bright as plenty of rubbing and polishing could make them. No speck of dust was ever to be seen, and no cobweb ever stretched its filmy thread in any corner, however dark. The rose-covered cottages in England, with their red-tiled roofs and pretty little gardens full of hollyhocks, pinks, and all sorts of so-called common flowers, are very much more picturesque than the somewhat severe-looking dwellings, generally of stone, in Scotland, where ornament, in the shape of anything green climbing about the rough walls, is but seldom thought of; but in Deeside Cottage, a name given evidently because of its proximity to the river, someone had been possessed of taste enough to plant creepers and train them over the low doorway and window frames, so that for a part of the year at least graceful festoons hung about and clothed the house with beauty, which made it quite distinctive in the neighbourhood—not that there was, however, much neighbourhood to speak of. A few cottages of a poorer class were dotted about here and there, at short distances apart, and two places belonging to Scotch lairds were near, if you went by rail, but the owners were oftener away than at home, sometimes only coming once a year for a few weeks' shooting, and sometimes not at all; so that, except for giving work to the men employed on the estates, they were not of very much account in the country. The people whom Mrs. McGowan and her granddaughter saw most of, and received little kindnesses from in the way of school treats for the child, and presents of extra good tea, or a smart new cushion for the armchair for the old lady, were the minister, Mr. McBain, and his wife and daughter, who lived a mile off, close to the little Presbyterian church, which was half filled every Sunday morning and afternoon by the inhabitants of the houses and cottages round about. A small country town, called Braeside, existed also, but it was nearly three miles away, and consequently "granny's" visits to it were few and far between; only, as a rule, when a pair of shoes or a new frock were urgently required for the child, or when she wanted a bit of stuff to make a gown or some aprons for herself.

How Kitty enjoyed those rare expeditions! Sometimes jolting along at a snail's pace in a friendly wagon which was going that way, the driver thereof kindly offering them a lift, and sometimes even going in the carrier's cart, which went at a smart trot to and fro on certain days between Braeside and Finaldie, another small town, and called at the outlying cottages to take up or deliver parcels. It was real delight to go to the shop with granny, and watch her buying such little stores as were necessary, then going to the baker's for flour, and having a bun and a cup of milk by way of dinner, perhaps being allowed to choose a few yards of pretty print for a frock, or having a penny or two given her to spend on acid drops or rose lozenges, two luxuries of about equal merit in her opinion. In after years these days of simple pleasure often came back to her mind, and she especially remembered one occasion when her grandmother was very mysterious, and sent her to eat the usual bun, while she herself remained in the shop for some reason which puzzled Kitty. But it was cleared up the very next day, her birthday, when a beautiful doll with fair hair and blue eyes was put into her arms by the old lady, with many kisses and blessings.

"Ye'll be careful with her, I know," said Mrs. McGowan, only she spoke in broad Scotch, which we will not attempt to reproduce, "and maybe some day ye'll have a real child of your own, or maybe no, we canna tell; but it'll be mony a year before that, and please the Lord we'll all be together still; there's room enough in the cottage even so."

Kitty threw her arms round her granny's neck, nearly choking her in her joy at seeing the lovely doll, and exclaimed—

"Yes, yes, granny, I shall always stay with you, always; and when you get quite old I shall do all the work for you."

"Eh, my dear, that you will," said her grandmother, with a smile, "till the right mon comes. Aweel, aweel, there's time enough for that, so I'll no fash myself."

The only other excitements in Kitty's life were the daily walks to school, which she thoroughly enjoyed, whether in the clear, bright days of winter or the warm, pleasant ones of summer, and the occasional treat of a visit to the Manse, when Miss McBain sometimes invited the children and young girls, who either were still attendants at, or had recently left the school, to come and have games in a large field attached to the Manse; and tea after in a tent, or in the house, according to the weather. This girl, only about sixteen when Kitty was ten, was the very life and light of her father's house, and indeed seemed to bring brightness and cheerfulness wherever she went. The peasants about perfectly idolised her; and once, when she was seriously ill, the road to the Manse looked as if a procession were passing, so anxious were the people for tidings of their beloved Miss McBain. Her mother was somewhat of an invalid, and consequently the direction and management of household affairs devolved on Bessie, and admirably well did she discharge the duties, still contriving to find time to attend to the school and mothers' meeting, as well as pay visits now and then to those among the cottagers whom she knew, which in fact included nearly all within a radius of about six miles. Her little pony-carriage was sure to be seen before the door of any house to which sorrow or sickness had come, and the very sight of her calm, sweet face had a quieting effect upon many; and her gentle voice, as she inquired in such a kind, sympathising way about their troubles, or read a few verses from the Bible to such of them as wished to hear her, were things upon which the cottagers would dilate to anyone who cared to listen. Bessie McBain was possessed by nature of one of those happy dispositions which, though not perhaps generally combined with much intellectual power, have the gift of conferring happiness on others in quite as great a degree, if not greater than the characters in which mental strength has a larger share. Practical and abounding in common sense, she knew what her duties were, and, so far as in her lay, she fulfilled them, and was happy in so doing. Healthy in mind as well as body, and but slightly endowed with imagination, she never was tempted to sit down and build castles in the air, nor to repine because her life was uneventful and dull. To her it was not dull; the indoor arrangements about the house, her father's comfort, and the attention required by her mother, filled her time; while out of doors there was the garden, a never-failing source of pleasure to her, and the little farmyard and stable, where she was a favourite with servants and animals alike: the grey horse and her own pony turning their heads for carrots or lumps of sugar, when she went near them, and the cow staring solemnly at her with its big eyes, as it chumped away at the grass. Only the little fluffy balls of wool, calling themselves ducklings, or young chickens how amused she was when a cousin from Edinburgh came to stay, and mistook one for the other—scuttled away in fear, their bright eyes peeping out from the soft feathers, and looking so pretty as they ran; but that was because she and they had not had time to become acquainted, otherwise no creature, however young and timid, could have been afraid of Bessie McBain.

Then, for human interest, besides her father and mother, she had "her girls," those whom she taught on Sundays before morning service, or rather, talked to in her own simple way, feeling, by a sort of instinct, what was the best thing to say; and as she grew up, and some of her girls also, being often consulted when the class was over, about all kinds of things, from the most trivial to those of gravest import. It came to pass, therefore, that as years went on she got an immense influence over the girls, and none of them took a situation or received a proposal of marriage without making "Miss Bessie" a confidant, and asking her advice on the subject; and more than once her clear, sensible way of seeing things as they really were, notwithstanding an external gloss which often hid their defects from less observant natures, was of great practical use in helping a girl to decide one way or another about some important matter. The little tea parties, too, which were held every now and then at the Manse, tended to increase the bond of affection between Bessie and her pupils. An invitation to go up at four o'clock on a cold, dark winter's day and have tea at Mr. McBain's, was enough to warm the invited ones by the mere anticipation. The well-lit room with crimson carpet and curtains and bright flowered chintz on the chairs, a bookcase at the end opposite the fireplace, and pictures on the walls, with pretty odds and ends of china on brackets, all this looked so cosy and comfortable; and Miss Bessie's welcome was so hearty and sincere, that her girls felt themselves in that sort of happy condition which, had they been cats, would have made them purr. Then the tea itself was a tea. No wishy-washy stuff with thin milk and brown sugar; no wretched slices of bread and butter which you could see the knife through; but real, excellent tea, with plenty of cream and white sugar; and for eatables, cakes of various sorts, and hot scones, of course, and jam and marmalade. In summer it was the same, except that if the weather was warm enough they assembled in a tent, and instead of scones there were strawberries and currants. Those days of harmless, simple pleasure were never forgotten, either by the hostess or the guests, and the remembrance of them was a link which never broke, though it may have weakened, through all the after years.

THE SERVICE OF BEAUTY.

BEAUTY IN ART.

ART is the effort of man to express his sense of the beauty in Nature; the history of art is the history of his education in the perception of beauty.

A work of art may be defined as the material embodiment of a conception of the beauty and truth in Nature, which, arising in the artist's imagination, is by his skilful labour perpetuated and made evident to the perception of others. He seizes upon some high moment, and eternizes it; he grasps the Real, frees it from its sordid settings, and places it in the Ideal. In every work of art (to distinguish these from the products of the useful arts) we find three constant elements; 1, skill in the worker; 2, permanence in the vehicle; 3, pleasure (in the widest sense) in the intention. A nursery-rhyme, a steam-engine, a wedding-cake, each lacks one of these essential elements, but in a symphony, a statue, a poem, a picture, they are all combined. We limit the fine arts to those which affect us through the eye and ear, for by these channels are conveyed our noblest and most intellectual pleasures, the impressions which touch the higher nature in us and endure. These fine arts we call literature, painting, sculpture, and music. Leaving the first for the present, let us consider art in respect to the two latter, and in its wider sense.

If we would understand anything more of it than its fashionable jargon, and appreciate its helpful power in our lives, we must study art. Though we cannot all be artists, we may, nay, we must, be critics, if art is to be anything real to us at all. And we must not be ignorant, flippant critics, but reverent learners and students, in presence of something greater than ourselves.

Two ways there are of studying art: the historical and the æsthetic; but neither of them alone can lead us to a thorough knowledge. If we trace the development of art through the influences of time in thought and deed, we get an acquaintance with the subject, accurate as far as it goes, valuable as it impresses on us "the eternal relation of life to art," but the subject will still be dry bones to us, a thing of facts and abstract reasoning. If we try the æsthetic method and occupy ourselves solely with the achievements of art, we may come to understand them up to the point necessary to the easy and selfish gratification of our taste, as do those whom we name "æsthetes," and to love them after a certain fashion, as the artist does who will profit in his work by studying them; but we shall find this method neither thorough nor sincere. It professes to seek the tree of art, but is content with its gathered fruit, and cares not for branch and stem and root, and all the deep mysteries of life and growth. One path leads us to one side only, the other to another side; the true point of view lies between. The history of a certain period will give us the facts about its art, but these must be made to live by illustrations of the art work, or it will remain a dead letter to us. What shall we know of Greek art, if we follow never so carefully its rise, development, and decline, through the various influences which moulded it, learn all about its social and political environment, trace its connection with the life of the nation, know by heart the lists of Greek sculptors and works of art, and all there is to know about them, if we do not study and love the embodiments of that art which have come down to us?

On the other hand, we can gain but a very imperfect knowledge of any art if we understand nothing of the conditions under which it was evolved; we shall have our vision limited by our pleasurable impressions, and never gain that insight, which is the highest teaching of high art.

The chief sources of modern art-culture are Greek and mediæval art. The perfection of the Greek school of sculpture grew up under many favouring circumstances, political and social. The high estimation in which the Greeks held the human body, the care with which they cultivated its strength and beauty, the gymnasium and national games, the living models of physical development which the warm climate allowed them to have constantly before their eyes—these together produced such a school for form as has never been surpassed. Then, too, in the highest period of Greek art, there was a healthy simplicity of life, enough of wealth and leisure without artificial restraint or excess of luxury, and freedom from grinding sordid poverty. The Paganism of the Athenian furnished him with ideals that could be grasped and expressed; there was nothing vague, nothing complex about his faith. His beliefs were personified in human form, and always representable. Humanity more or less perfect was always before him, and his ideal was a glorified humanity, an ideal never rising too high to inspire him to execution. And there was unity in religion: when the artist expressed his own faith, he appealed to the faith of every Athenian, the setting of their common life. This was an immense influence in favour of art; it created an enthusiasm which perishes under the cold touch of scepticism.

To the Greek ideal, which, being limited to natural things, had its strength concentrated in these, and found in art its full and free expression, succeeded the early Christian ideal, a breaking away from the sensuous Nature-worship of Paganism into two phases—the supernatural and the unnatural. The supernatural element of the Christian ideal, its recognition of the soul, of immortality, of the worthlessness of matter as compared to spirit, of the Fatherhood of God—all such revelations art could not at once grasp and express, although it was informed and elevated by them. Nor could the unnatural, the miraculous element be represented; the artist can never succeed in any contradiction of Nature. For instance, in painting Christ for religious teaching, has he made the Divinity visible to us? Has he not been limited to his highest conception of manhood, and so brought out in its eternal truth the human with the spiritual breathing through it? The "against Nature" is not representable; the "beyond Nature" is representable, but it had to force out for itself a wider range of expression than the Greek school of form, no longer adequate. The ideal had now become spiritual, the tendency now was to exalt the spirit at the expense of the body; the physical was to be used only as a means of revealing the inner life, the body to be treated merely as the vehicle, the garment, or even the fetter of the soul. So art, looking through the outer veil, had to see and portray the inspiring life. Something of a grander type than had heretofore appealed to men was calling them to come up higher, and they responded, and in course of time their art reflected their elevation.

This brought about the great period of Italian painting. But before this could be reached, there had to be shaken off the trammels of asceticism, which were binding men hard and fast, contrary to the spirit of Christianity, and making them believe all natural beauty and pleasure to be inimical to the life of the soul. Then took place that wonderful re-awakening from the darkness of the Middle Ages, which we name the Renaissance; which overthrew asceticism, and found a new delight in life for life's sake. It reconciled the forces of Mediævalism and Paganism, and drew from either source what was most servicable to life and most beautiful for art. Men began afresh to rejoice in every form of beauty, in the human body and in the whole world. No longer Paganism or asceticism alone could content the fuller Nature they had become conscious of. It was, indeed, a new birth; and the energy of that new life is still unexhausted in art and thought.

The old ideals had given way to something more in harmony with the complex nature of man, and in their place arose this truth: that the highest ideal an artist can set before him is the reverent and humble interpretation of Nature, fidelity to natural fact combined with expression of the higher inner truth of things. He must never scorn the real, yet never rest content with it, until it suggests or reveals the ideal. He must possess patience in gaining insight, purity in his purpose, passion to touch his work with sacred fire. A true work of art is always begotten by the noble intellect, quickened by the pure heart, and brought forth by the patient hand.

One essential distinction between true art and false, is that true art will never avoid or change that which is not beautiful; it simply lays the emphasis on what is beautiful, and leaves the rest to play its natural part of foil or contrast. But false art cannot trust its own power of dealing with what is not beautiful, and leaves it all out, fails in fidelity to Nature, and falls into insipidity or vulgarity. High art keeps close to the truth and accentuates the beauty in Nature; low art either aims at beauty without truth, or at truth without beauty, distorting or degrading Nature.

"Rien de beau que le vrai," or as Ellie, in the "Water Babies," says, "It is so beautiful that it must be true."

There is an excellence in art which comes of motive or idea, and there is an excellence which comes of thoroughly understanding the means of expression.

When these two are united, art is at its best; they have always been so in any great art-period. When the ideas are stronger than the power of expression, the art is in the stage of growth; when the facility and fluency are greater than the ideas, the art is in its decadence; the manner has become more than the matter, and an over-ripeness of style precedes the final stage of rottenness. And the art of each age must gain its own expression; there is no turning back; lessons for us, but no life in the experience of the past.

Every art must be judged by its own rules. Lessing has pointed out the principle of inherent fitness in each art to express certain ideas by certain treatment, of a special function for each which cannot be so well performed by any other. The poet must not attempt what is better done by the sculptor, or the painter try the method of the poet. For instance, the weakness of what is called "Descriptive Poetry" lies in its attempting the work of the painter.

Poetry has to do with action and emotion, with events in succession of time. The poet who describes objects, who paints in words, misses his true success to achieve a poor imitation of painting. The poet can suggest pictures for the painter; but if he tries to usurp the brush, he can but produce a catalogue of the qualities of material objects. The painter has to seize the most suggestive moment in which is concentrated the interest of his conception. He must be careful to perpetuate nothing accidental or momentary which could mar the unity of the whole. He must make other considerations subservient to beauty. The poet may safely arouse pain, horror, or disgust, for he can quickly replace them by other impressions; but the painter has to consider that his single impression is final, and he fails when he does not give pleasure.

In what we call the "modern spirit" there is much of unrest, of vague yearning, consequent upon the transition from old ideals in life and thought. All is being weighed and tested and judged anew; it is a condition which does not favour the enthusiasm of art-production. Music seems to be the fittest expression of this condition, the present outlet of our emotions. Just as the Christian ideal could not get itself expressed by means of mere form, so our complex life has passed out of the scope of sculpture and painting both. The modern school of music is our peculiar art.

We still have the masterpieces of the past; let us love and reverence them with all our heart and soul; we shall never come up to them, much less surpass them. But we shall best show our reverence by recognising the highest teaching they have for us, i.e., that we in our day must be true to ourselves, true in life and thought, as those old masters were true in their day, for in this way alone lies any hope of our having any art of our own. When we are living this true life, we shall find our wealth not in gold, but—

"In the lovely city, and the little house on the hill, And the wastes and the woodland beauty, and the happy fields we till;
And the homes of ancient story, the souls of the mighty dead,
And the wise men seeking out marvels, and the poet's teeming head,
And the painter's hand of wonder, and the marvellous fiddle-bow,
And the banded choirs of music—all those that do and know."

ENGAGEMENT RINGS.

Speaking of engagement rings, a French authority makes the following remarks—

"The first of the presents which must be given to an affianced bride ought to be the engagement ring; this ring must for ever be kept by her, it is the first openly allowed gage of love. It should be in perfect taste, and at the same time not inconvenient to the owner. I would not choose the ruby, it is too showy, loud, and indiscreet; my taste inclines towards the sapphire and the diamond, of which the one does not go well without the other. I should not choose a large sapphire surrounded by diamonds; I should ask our jeweller-artists to interlace in happy combination the sapphire and the diamond. The turquoise is also a tasteful stone, but when it is constantly worn it has the immense disadvantage of changing its colour, and to this change most ladies attach a sad and sentimental superstition. It should, therefore, not be chosen for the first present which is to be worn and cherished while life lasts, and which is to remain from the days of youth when everything else is changed."

BUYING REPENTANCE.—Repentance is a commodity always in the market. The purchaser names the price for it; lucky for her if she doesn't name the price too high.

THE SHEEP STEALER.—A man stole a sheep at Mitcham, in Surrey, one day in November, 1762. He tied its hind legs together and put them over his forehead to carry it away. In getting over a gate, however, the sheep, it is thought, struggled, and by a sudden spring slipped its feet down to his throat, for in the morning they were found, the sheep hanging on one side of the gate and the man dead on the other.

A HEAVY LOAD.

To mortal men great loads allotted be,
But of all packs, no pack like poverty.
Herrick.

LOVE.—Love, it has been said, descends more abundantly than it ascends. The love of parents for their children has always been far more powerful than that of children for their parents; and who among the sons of men ever loved God with a thousandth part of the love that God has manifested to us?—Harve.

THE QUARRLSOME COUPLE.

You are so like each other in your lives,
The worst of husbands and the worst of wives,

A mighty wonder, it appears to me,
That such a couple cannot well agree.

From Martial.

CONTENT TO DO WELL.

A father, wishing to dissuade his daughter from marrying, said to her—

"She who marries does well, but she who remains single does better."

"My dear father," she answered, meekly, "I am content with doing well; let her do better who can."

AT A WEDDING.

Bride (exchanging bridal costume for travelling suit): "Did I appear nervous at all during the ceremony, Clara?"

Bridesmaid (envious): "A little at first, dear; but not after George had said 'Yes!'"

A FATAL COAT.—The parish register of Ramsey records that Major William Cromwell, a cousin of the Protector, died of the Plague on the 23rd of February, 1660, and that he caught the infection by wearing a coat the cloth of which came from London. It adds "the tailor that made the coat, with all his family, died of the same terrible disorder, as did no less than four hundred people in Ramsey, and all owing to this fatal coat."

WISDOM IN FORGETTING.—Those things are generally best remembered which ought most to be forgotten. Not seldom the surest remedy of the evil consists in forgetting it.

Chapter v.

JACK FARRAR IS PUT OUT.

Eve, what were you up so early for this morning?" said Mrs. Oldman, the next day, as Eve handed her father his basin of tea for breakfast.

"Early, mother! it isn't so very early; it is getting on for eight o'clock," said Eve, evasively, turning to the fire to look at the fish which was frying.

"It is late enough now, I know as well as you, but I heard you moving about between four and five, and I thought I heard voices outside, too," persisted Mrs. Oldman.

"You must have been dreaming, mother," said Eve, who apparently found frying fish a very hot task, for her cheeks were crimson, and even her white forehead was flushed.

"No, you weren't dreaming, Mary, but it was an hour earlier than you say; it was I and the police, not Eve, that you heard between three and four," said Noah, quietly.

"The police, Noah! What had the police to do here, pray?" exclaimed Mrs. Oldman, forgetting all about Eve in her excitement.

"The police, father!" echoed Eve, suddenly turning pale.

"Yes, they'll be here again soon, with a summons for me to appear before the magistrates next Tuesday. The fact is, someone has been playing a joke on me, which is likely to cost me a five-pound note. They took that old net of a one-inch mesh out of the shed last night, and set it; the police came round and found it. I identified the net, which they confiscated with the fish, and I shall be served with a summons to-day."

"Oh, father, father! They mustn't, they can't, they shan't summon you," sobbed Eve, as bursting into tears she threw herself into Noah's arms, and hid her lovely face in his white beard.

"Well, I never! To think we should live to suffer such disgrace as this! you to be dragged before the magistrates, like a common thief. What is the world coming to next, I wonder?" said Mrs. Oldman, aghast at the news.

"Hush! my pretty one; it won't hurt me to be summoned, though I shall have to pay a fine of five pounds, no doubt; but I am not going before the bench like a common thief, Mary; I am going as an innocent man, and no one whose opinion I value will believe I am guilty, in spite of the evidence against me. It can't be a grudge, for no one owes me a grudge that I know of, so it must be a joke, but it is a costly one for me."

"Oh, but father, father, what shall I do, what shall I do?" sobbed Eve, wringing her pretty hands as Noah rocked her to and fro in his arms.

"You can't do anything, my child; it isn't worth all these tears. As for the money, I must take it out of the savings bank, that is all about that; and for the disgrace, that is nothing, because I am innocent; and though I don't suppose it is very pleasant to be had up before the magistrates, why, it won't last more than an hour or so at the utmost," said Noah, making the best of it for Eve's sake.

But Eve was not easily pacified; she ate no breakfast, and shortly after, when the policeman came to serve the summons on Noah, who was watching his net, her grief broke out afresh, and if Mrs. Oldman had not stopped her she would have rushed out to the policeman.

"But it is all my fault, mother. I ought to be summoned—not father," sobbed Eve.

"Bless the child! she is gone clean daft. What do you know about nets and meshes, I should like to know? Go into your own room and bathe your eyes; you aren't fit to be seen, and then I want you to take some laces I have been washing for Miss Grace, up to the rectory," said Mrs. Oldman.

This task was apparently a congenial one, for by degrees Eve dried her eyes, and when an hour later she started to the rectory, some dark lines under the beautiful eyes were the only traces of her tears, except she was a trifle paler than usual. Eve was certain of sympathy at the rectory, for she felt sure neither Mr. Leicester nor Grace would for one moment believe Noah was guilty of setting the forbidden net; and her hopes were realised, for Grace walked back with her to express her sympathy, and Mr. Leicester promised to call that day.

"Noah, here comes Miss Grace. I expected she would, for she is mighty fond of you, and Eve has told her of this trouble. What a pair of pretty maids they are! Any mother might be proud of either of them. Look; one looks every bit as much a real lady as the other, though I say it that shouldn't," said Mrs. Oldman, standing by Noah's side and watching the two girls as they approached the ark slowly, for they paused every now and then to gather some of the wild marsh-marigolds.

Grace was the taller and fairer, but though very sweet-looking, she could not rival the brilliant beauty of Eve. She had come out in a simple cotton dress; and Eve, in a clean print, was quite as well-dressed; so that a more critical judge than Mrs. Oldman might have agreed that to look at them one would never imagine how great was the difference in their position.

"Tush, wife! Eve is my own child, and a beauty, too, praise the Lord; but Miss Grace is a lady born and bred, as anyone may see, though there never was one with less pride, and Eve is nought but an eel-man's daughter, and never will be more unless it is a broadman's wife."

"Don't be too sure of that. Eve will be a lady some day, as sure as Adam Day will live to be a gentleman; and not one of the broadmen will she ever look at, though five or six of them are crazy after her, and she as good as told Jack Farrar as much the last time he was past here with his wherry, and he is the best chance for a girl round these parts."

"And what else is Adam Day but a broadman, pray? The son of a broadman, an eel-catcher like myself."

"Oh, he is a broadman fast enough, and he'll be a gentleman too, but he won't be Eve's husband for all that, though I know it is the wish of your heart; and you may take my word for it, for in those things a woman sees a mile where a man only sees a yard before him; but here they come. Good morning, Miss Grace; it is like you to come at once to see my old man in his disgrace."

"In his trouble, Mrs. Oldman; it is no disgrace. I am sure Noah no more set that net than I did; but I wish we could find out who has played you such a trick," said Grace, shaking hands with her foster-parents, as she always did, while Eve went into the ark to tie up the flowers for Grace to take back.

"So do I, for Noah will have to pay for it, whether or no, and five pounds is a large sum for us," said Mrs. Oldman. "Though he do take it so quietly, he appears to rather enjoy it than otherwise."

"No, indeed, I don't, wife, but I shan't make a trouble of it; there are worse misfortunes at sea."

"What does Adam Day think about it, Noah?" asked Grace.

"I haven't seen yet him, Miss Grace, but he'll be round here directly after his dinner. It is Saturday afternoon, and we are going to the decoy. Adam will be a great deal angrier about it than I am, I fear, for patient as he is with his old mother and the schoolchildren, this is the sort of things to rouse his indignation, though young as he is he has learnt how to be angry and sin not."

Just then a wherry with its dark brown sail slowly approached, for the wind was light and the sail flapping, and Noah moved away to lower his net, but before the wherry reached the net the sail was taken down, the anchor cast in the shallow water, and the wherryman pulled himself ashore in the gig he was towing at his stern.

Grace Leicester saw it was Jack Farrar, and knowing he was a great admirer of Eve, and would probably stay to dinner in the ark, she left, saying she must go and read to old Mrs. Day before luncheon. The wherryman was a small, dark, handsome man, with curly black hair under his large brimmed hat, fierce black eyes, small well-cut features, and a short pointed black beard; but for his high boots and blue jersey he would have looked more like an Italian brigand than a Norfolk wherryman, for there was a wild expression in the black eyes, and a look of fierce determination in the well-shaped mouth, that seemed to say he would stop at nothing to get what he had set his heart on. He was no particular favourite of Noah's, but he was always courteous and hospitable, and at once gave the invitation to dinner, which Farrar expected and accepted. While they were discussing the eels and bacon, which, with some Norfolk dumplings, formed their meal, Farrar feasted on Eve's beauty, and could scarcely give the attention such a congenial subject as the episode of the police and the eel-net merited, to Noah's account of the doings of the past night. Eve was silent and ill at ease, perhaps because the subject was distasteful to her, perhaps because she guessed the object of Farrar's visit, and dreaded the impending interview with him, which she knew to be inevitable.

The simplicity of the manners of Farrar's class rendered it no difficult matter to be alone with Eve, so when dinner was over he accomplished this by asking her to go for a walk with him, and after a little coyness she put on her hat, and, willing or unwilling, accompanied him.

"Where shall we go?" said Eve, as they left the ark.

"Oh, not that way," said Farrar, as Eve turned towards the broad and Windham.

"The grass is so long here," objected Eve, as she took the way by the river, which Farrar seemed to prefer.

"Come for a sail with me, then. My wherry is here and light, for I am going to take in cargo; the wind, too, is in our favour. I'll take care of you. Will you come?"

"Oh no, thank you. Father would not like it. He never lets me go in boats unless he or Adam is with me."

Farrar frowned an angry frown, but accepted Eve's decision.

"Very well, we'll walk then, and I'll tell you what I came to tell you, though I expect you know it well enough without the telling. Eve, I love you. I would die for you this moment if it would make you happier. You have heard this story often enough, for you have many lovers, I know; but, Eve, you never heard it from one who loves you as I do. One lock of your hair is more to me than the wealth of the Indies; and I'd walk ten miles any day for one of your smiles. Ever since I first saw you that Sunday evening two years ago, as you walked into Martham Church, with your father, looking like a beautiful rose, I have loved you—loved you as you will never be loved again, and now at last I can speak, for the wherry is all mine now, and I can afford a wife as well as any man on the broads. Eve, my darling, will you have me?"

And Farrar seized Eve's hands, and brought his handsome face close to hers, as with bated breath and beating heart he waited for an answer, his black eyes glowing with passion so fierce that Eve dared not look up at him, but let her long lashes droop and veil her own grey eyes.

The May sun was hot and powerful as the passion of the man, but the cold east wind which was blowing was not more cutting than Eve's manner, as she struggled to withdraw her hand, and said proudly: "I do not love you; please let me go."

"Say at once you are too proud to look at a wherryman; a broadman like your father isn't good enough for you, you must have a gentleman; but let me tell you, as true and loving a heart may beat under a jersey as under a coat. I know more than you think, perhaps; oh, you need not be afraid, I am neither going to hurt you nor to tell tales, but this much I'll tell you—you shall be my wife and no other man's; you are mine by right, because no other man loves you as I do; and I'll have you, as sure as my name is Jack Farrar."

"How dare you talk to me in this way! I'll never speak to you again!" said Eve, as, with a final effort, she freed herself from his grasp.

"Oh, yes, you will; speak to me, now, and say you forgive me for my rudeness; I was mad to talk to you like that; but Eve, my love, my love, it was because I love you so madly that I said it. Only forgive me, and I will never be so rough with you again." And he stretched his hands out to her with an imploring gesture, and Eve, turning round, saw the black eyes were filled with tears, and her heart smote her with pity.

"I forgive you," she said, with all the majesty of a young queen, and then turned and walked rapidly back to the ark, leaving Farrar apparently rooted to the spot, gazing after her retreating figure.

THE STORIES OF FAMOUS SONGS.

By ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

"THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH," "EXCELSIOR," "THE OLD CLOCK ON THE STAIRS."

I think there may be some interest in a sketch of a famous man who has passed away in our own time, and in a description of the influences under which he produced the many songs which speedily attained a world-wide popularity. Though our mothers sang them, they still find a place in our repertoire, and though they are no longer "new songs," and yet have scarcely taken full honours as "old songs," they remain favourites, even in the very debatable and trying climate of "old-fashion."

The poet to whom we allude is Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and the songs are those well-known lyrics, "The Village Blacksmith," "Excelsior," and "The Old Clock on the Stairs."

Our poet was born in 1807, at Portland, Maine, U.S.A. He seems from the outset to have been a fortunate individual, nurtured in quiet affluence, favoured with well-conditioned parents and grand-parents "on both sides of the house." He has celebrated the place of his birth in the poem "My Lost Youth."

"I remember the black wharves and the slips,

And the sea tides tossing free,
And Spanish sailors with bearded lips,
And the beauty and mystery of the ships,
And the magic of the sea.

I remember the bulwarks by the shore,
And the fort upon the hill;

The sunrise gun with its hollow roar,
The drum-beat repeated o'er and o'er,
And the bugle wild and shrill.

I can see the breezy dome of groves,
The shadows of Deering's woods;
And the friendships old and the early loves Come back with a Sabbath sound, as of doves

In quiet neighbourhoods.

He seems to have been gifted from the first with a sweet, equable temperament, and an almost morbid shrinking from anything which seemed to him violent or exaggerated. When he was about twelve years old he first discovered the charms and wealth of literature through the fascinations of Washington Irving's Sketch Book.

As a schoolboy, he was evidently exemplary, for several quaint "reports" have been preserved, by which we learn that—

"Master Henry Longfellow is one of the best boys we have in school. His conduct last quarter was very correct and amiable."

And again, "He has during the week distinguished himself by his good deportment."

He first appeared in print when he was thirteen. The "appearance" was "a poem" in the local paper; the authorship was kept a secret between himself and his sister. His first experience of a critic was enjoyed (or suffered) on the same day. For one of his father's friends, all unconscious, asked old Mr. Longfellow, "Did you see the piece in to-day's paper? Very stiff, remarkably stiff; moreover it is all borrowed, every word of it."

From school he went on to college, where his verse-making continued, but was only of the ephemeral sort. He did not find it easy to decide on a career, for we find him writing to his father, "I hardly think nature designed me for the bar, or the pulpit, or the dissecting room; I am altogether in favour of the farmer's life." There must have been something very beautiful in his filial relationship, since he could make the following frank confidence: "The fact is, I most eagerly aspire after future eminence in literature . . . I am almost confident in believing that if I can ever rise in the world, it must be by the exercise of my talent in the wide field of literature." Nor did his father receive this confidence with any ridicule or scorn, though he naturally modified it by the considerations of experience, saying "a literary life, to one who has the means of support, must be very pleasant. But you must adopt a profession which will afford you subsistence as well as reputation." Therefore out of the three professions our young poet chose the law, but always as a means to an end, and not an end itself. He decided, "I can be a lawyer: this will support my real existence; literature, an ideal one."

His dutiful submission secured its own reward. It was his father himself who brought him news that his college was anxious to send him to Europe, that he might qualify himself for a professorship of modern languages about to be founded in his alma mater. Nothing could have more completely squared with his utmost hopes and aspirations.

This was his first visit to Europe. He travelled in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, and then returned to fulfil the duties of his professorship. In the year 1831 he married Mary Potter. In 1835 he resigned his professorship at Bowdoin, in favour of one at Harvard, and revisited Europe, accompanied by his young wife, who sickened and died at Rotterdam.

After going home and fulfilling his duties at Harvard for about six years, he paid another visit to Europe. On his return in 1843 he married again, and though in this instance his domestic life was prolonged to eighteen years, yet it came at last to an untimely and violent end. In the summer of 1863, Mrs. Longfellow's dress caught fire as she was sealing some packets, and she died a few hours after. The remainder of the poet's life was spent quietly occupied in literary labour among his young family and his old friends. He paid yet one more visit to Europe (1868-9), where he spent a long time in England, was received at Windsor Castle, and it is said half-shocked and half-delighted our formal court etiquette by giving the Queen's outstretched hand a hearty grasp instead of a perfunctory kiss! His last years were cheered by much affectionate appreciation, to which he responded by uncounted charities and courtesies. He "departed" in 1882, for over him we may surely use his own words above the grave of Albert Dürer in Nuremberg—“Emigravit—is the inscription on the tombstone where he lies;

Dead he is not—but departed—for the artist never dies.”

The last lines he wrote seem what he would have chosen to write had he known they were his last; for they were these—

“Out of the shadow of night
The world moves into light;
It is daybreak everywhere.”

Longfellow's nature seems to have been saturated with poetic sensibility. His inspiration was true and sweet, rather than powerful and stirring. Wherever he turned his eye, his consciousness was laying in stores for his muse to work upon, perhaps years afterwards. “Out of my childhood,” he wrote “there rises in my memory the recollection of many things rather as poetic impressions than as prosaic facts.”

Probably few poets have a wider circle of admirers, and we feel that we may refer to any of his verses with the assurance that they are already familiar to most of our readers, while the few who do not know them should certainly lose no time in making their acquaintance.

His first widely popular piece was “The Psalm of Life.” It was written on a summer morning in 1838, in the pleasant rooms he occupied in Cambridge. It is to be noted that though from boyhood he had possessed the faculty of versification, and the yearning to express himself, yet his full power did not come upon him till he had been chastened by sorrow. “The Psalm of Life” brought him fame and profit, but it brought him far more—the assurance that he had inspired and cheered many wavering or drooping souls. Some of its verses are very open to criticism. But it was a voice which went straight to the world's heart, and was translated into many tongues, even into Sanscrit! “The Psalm of Life,” said one of the poet's most intimate friends, “was written as an exorcism against all bad spirits and blue devils. It was sung to cheer the unhappy, not to chime in with their wailings.”

When this same friend, Mr. Ward, had lost his wife and their baby, he had written to request Longfellow to translate for him a certain pathetic German song. The right mood would not come at that time, but it came by-and-by, and the result was the well-known “Two Locks of Hair.” It is a singular and interesting coincidence that the original song was written by the German author, not from his own experience, but also as the expression of the pathetic lot of a friend.

It was about this same time that Longfellow produced “The Village Blacksmith.” He alludes to it, slightly, in a letter to his father, “as a kind of ballad on a blacksmith which you may consider, if you please, as a song in praise of your ancestor at Newbury.” For the poet's great grandfather on the paternal side had been himself a blacksmith, and it is a significant fact that “a blacksmith's shop, where the farm horses were shod,” had stood opposite his grandfather's roomy old house at Gorham, a favourite resort of the poet's boyish holidays. But the special village smithy of the poem, “under the spreading chestnut tree,” was an old smithy at Cambridge. In 1879 the children of Cambridge presented the poet with an easy chair made out of the wood of this tree.

But, perhaps of all his poems, the song

“Excelsior” had the widest and swiftest popularity, though possibly it may not enjoy the most enduring favour. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes calls it “a trumpet call to the fiery energies of youth.” Its inspiration came in this wise:

One day Mr. Longfellow's eye fell upon a scrap of newspaper, a part of the heading of one of the New York journals, bearing the seal of the State of New York, a shield with a rising sun, and the motto in heraldic Latin, “Excelsior.” At once there sprang up in his imagination the picture of the youth scaling the Alpine pass, bearing in his hand some slender pennant affixed to his alpenstock, sufficient to bear his chosen motto. This the poet made a symbol of the aspiration and sacrifice of a nobly ideal soul, whose words and aim are “an unknown tongue” to the multitude, and who, refusing to listen to the cautions of experience or prudence, or to the pleadings of home affections, of woman's love, or of formal religion, presses on to a higher goal. That goal he does not perfectly attain in this life, but in dying still presses on to a higher beyond. The Latinity of the motto was questioned by some of the poet's friends at the time, and afterwards by critics, who thought it should be either Excelsius or Ad Excelsiora. The poet explained the word as part of the phrase, “Scopus meus excelsior est,”—my goal is higher. In truth he was not responsible for the borrowed Latin, and evidently the word excelsior was the word the poem needed.

Our readers will do well to bear in mind this story of the poem's origin and significance, as it has lately become the fashion to carp at it, asking in captious spirit, “What does it all mean?”

The form of the poem lends itself easily to parody. At the outset it was unfortunately illustrated. The artist bestowed on the mountaineer, not the alpenstock and pennant which would have been so suitable, but a broad, trailing banner with a heavy staff. The poet himself reported that Hawthorne, the novelist, made great fun of the pictures, saying that “the absurdity of ambition was rendered obvious by seeing this figure carrying a huge log of wood up the Alps, with as much fervour as if the safety of the world depended upon it.”

But the verses had living seed in them, and no blunders could destroy it.

It is said that when a German translation of “Excelsior” appeared, the students of Innsbrück, meeting the translator, embraced him and kissed him with transport.

The original of “The Old Clock on the Stairs” stood in the hall of an old-fashioned country seat, surrounded by poplars, and belonging to some of Mrs. Longfellow's relatives. In November, 1845, the poet records in his journal—

“Began a poem on a clock, with the words, ‘For ever, never,’ as the burden: suggested by the words of Bridaine, the old French missionary, who said of eternity—C'est une pendule dont le balancier dit et redit sans cesse ces deux mots seulement dans le silence des tombeaux—Toujours, jamais! Jamais, toujours! Et pendant ces effroyables révolutions, un réprouvé s'écrie, ‘Quelle heure est-il?’ et la voix d'un autre misérable lui répond, ‘L'Eternité!’”

In the following month he reports that the verses were already a success, and in January, 1846, he recommended them to somebody who asked for words suitable for music.

Dr. Wendell Holmes, in summing up Longfellow's poetic art, says—

“It was in his choice of subjects that one source of the public favour with which his writings were received obviously lay. A poem to be widely popular must deal with thoughts and emotions that belong to common, not exceptional character, conditions, and interests. In ‘The Old Clock on the Stairs,’ we find the history of innumerable households told in relating the history of one, and the solemn burden of the song repeats itself to thousands of listening readers, as if the beat of the pendulum were throbbing at the head of every staircase.”

The poet Longfellow kept a diary singularly free from any morbid introspection. Almost every day he notes the weather, or the aspect of some place he was visiting, with some phrase of wonderful poetic beauty, in which it is often easy to find the germ of a future poem. As we are only writing the story of famous songs, we may but glance at his other productions by noticing that though he was within easy reach of “Acadie,” the scenery of his “Evangeline,” he never visited it, and further that he wrote some prose works, less known than his verses, but two of which, at least, “Hyperion” and “Kavanagh,” are of rare originality and finish, and seldom fail to take a strong grasp on the minds of those who read them.

In person, the poet Longfellow was handsome and attractive. “His voice, countenance and manner conveyed one harmonious impression. . . . His dignified bearing made him appear tall, though he was not above the medium height. . . . One young enthusiast exclaimed, after seeing him, ‘All the vulgar and pretentious people in the world ought to be sent to see Mr. Longfellow, to learn how to behave.’ . . . His simple and beautiful courtesy made every caller think himself a friend.” Alas! this disposition was often abused by mere autograph hunters and similar intruders, and we blush to say that under this head the poet more than once notes in his journal, “What queer women there are in the world.”

On one occasion, he describes how an English gentleman introduced himself without letters, abruptly saying, “In other countries, you know, we go to see ruins and the like, but you have no ruins in your country, and I thought—I thought—I would call and see you!”

We do not think we can close our paper better than by a few extracts from the poet's common-place book, selecting those most likely to be interesting and valuable to our readers.

“The happy should not insist too much upon their happiness in the presence of the unhappy.”

“A great sorrow, like a mariner's quadrant, brings the sun at noon down to the horizon, and we learn where we are on the sea of Life.”

“Each new epoch of life seems an encounter. There is a tussle and a cloud of dust, and we come out of it triumphant or crestfallen according as we have borne ourselves.”

“What discord should we bring into the universe if our prayers were all answered! Then we should govern the world, and not God. And do you think we should govern it better? It gives me only pain when I hear the long, wearisome petitions of men asking for they know not what. As frightened women clutch at the reins when there is danger, so do we grasp at God's government with our prayers. Thanksgiving with a full heart—and the rest, silence and submission to the Divine Will.”

POULTRY KEEPING:

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

PART II.

As by this time I hope that you have received some idea as to your poultry-house and run, I will give you a few directions concerning the selection of your stock.

Let me say at once, however, that I can give you no advice upon showing and show varieties.

I take it for granted that most of you are beginners in this delightful pursuit, and that as such you have little or no experience, but are determined to take it up as a real recreation, with the intention of doing your utmost to make it pay.

Let our motto be "Economy and utility," and certainly if you want profit and peace of mind, keep out of the showing line. As an old gardener remarked to me the other day, "There's naught like good layers. T'other kind! why you breed 'em, and feed 'em, and fash with 'em, but you get naught by 'em!"

The gardener's remark is assuredly correct, as far as beginners are concerned, for even if in after years you become so hen-fever stricken that you cannot refrain from fancy breeding, yet until that day you had better be content with success or failure in some less delicate and expensive stock.

Upon this stock question there are as many different opinions as there are feathers in a hen!

Every poultry fancier whom you consult descants on the excellences of the particular breed in which he is interested; gives you the most astonishing egg-production averages, and after having taken you to see his stock, makes you firmly believe that unless you take his advice your experiment will be a hopeless failure.

The next adviser you go to tells you to get good first-crosses. One advises large birds, another small; one suggests that white fowls look so picturesque, another that black fowls don't show the dirt; and finally your old servant remarks conclusively that there is nothing like a good barndoor fowl, such as she used to help her mother to feed when she was a girl!

All this advice is very perplexing, but a good deal of it can be much simplified by considering three questions—

For what purpose do you want your fowls? Under what conditions do you intend to keep them? What is the length of your purse?

Whether you want fowls for close confinement or for an open grass range, always select good hardy birds, and if your object be to produce eggs, let them be of the best possible laying strain.

A good layer can usually be told by its coarse large comb and wattles, and by its body being generally larger behind than in front, which is the opposite to what you find when choosing for table purposes. The laying qualities of hens depend far more on the laying strain than upon any particular breed, though some breeds are no doubt more generally prolific than others.

Always know where your birds came from and how old they are; or if you are too inexperienced, ask some poultry-keeper to help you.

It is most disappointing to have spent your money and then to find that your purchase consists of either aged birds, which show plenty of appetite but very few eggs, or else of some grand-looking creatures, neither pure-bred nor a good cross, perhaps delicate into the bargain.

Another great secret of success in poultry-keeping is to know when to buy and when to kill.

The best time to start poultry-keeping is in the early spring—say February or March—in order that you may gain your first experience during the summer months.

Have your house all ready, pay everything up, see what money you have left, and only buy as many good birds as you can pay for.

Don't get a cheap lot, whatever you do; far better get six good-laying, young, healthy birds, than ten unguaranteed ones of which you know nothing.

If you do not want to spend much at the beginning, and care little about appearances, you might begin with common "barndoor" fowls.

At that time of year you ought to be able to get good pullets of average laying qualities for from three shillings and sixpence to four shillings each; they should be eight or nine months old, and just beginning to lay.

If you begin with this sort of stock you will, I believe, have very fair results, if fed and managed according to later instructions.

As you have nothing to do with chickens you do not require a cock, so you can save his keep and a good deal of annoyance to your neighbours. Of course the eggs in this case will be of no use for hatching purposes.

If all goes well now, your hens will lay right through the spring and summer months in abundance. They may be rather troublesome about wanting to sit, but if you don't wish them to do so they are easily cured by putting them in a coop with a floor composed of two-inch bars placed at two-inch intervals, raised from the ground by bricks at each corner. The hen cannot then sit, and if she be given plenty of food and water she will soon recover and want to begin to lay again.

Always let a broody hen be in sight of the other birds, and do not try all the cruel operations advised by many, such as dipping in cold water, starving, keeping in the dark, etc. Remember that your object is to keep her in good condition, that she may lay again as soon as possible.

From August to November may be termed the moulting season, and your hens will in no wise escape, and they will begin sooner or later. As they are only common birds, I should advise you to kill them at the first sign of moult. You can then sell them for eating purposes, to the household, for from two shillings to three shillings—according to whether you live in the town or country—and then renew your stock with March-hatched pullets, which should keep you in eggs all through the winter.

This sounds rather a heartless way of doing, and if you are very fond of your hens, and any of them are specially good layers, they may be kept another season, but you must have some early hatched pullets every autumn, or there will be no November or December eggs, and when eggs can be sold at six for a shilling during the winter months this is a consideration, and shows which way the balance-sheet will turn at the end of the year.

If you have rather more money to spend at the beginning of your enterprise, I should advise you to buy instead of barndoor fowls some good first-cross pullets, or pure-bred ones.

I think I shall never forget my intense delight and wild excitement when the L. and N. W. Railway van brought to the door the hamper containing my first seven pullets.

They came from a well-known breeder of good laying stock, and as I had a fancy for nice-looking black birds, they consisted of two Minorca-

WHITE COCHINS.

Langshans, two Minorca-Brahmas, two Houdan-Cochins, and one pure Plymouth Rock; they cost thirty-five shillings.

I of course opened the hamper at once. Naturally after the journey the inmates were rather lively, and flew about wildly, but at last they were prevailed upon to go into an empty stable, for I must confess that I had been in such a hurry to get them that the hen-house was not ready when they did arrive; and even when a day or two afterwards I was able to put them into the proper place, they had neither peace nor comfort, for, being very wet weather, the sides and roof of the house began to leak, owing to not having been properly tarred, so that altogether I had rather a discouraging time, all through want of a little forethought. They arrived the middle of February at twelve o'clock, and by one o'clock I had my first egg!

By March they were in full lay, and gave me 122 eggs, and in April 160; and so on through the summer, except when they wanted to sit.

The Minorca-Langshan, which laid first, and whom on account of her flaming red comb I named "Rosie," laid between eighty and ninety eggs without missing a day, but afterwards she began to "clock," as the North-Country people call being broody.

Another hen laid on during the moult to the end of October, until she hardly had a feather on her; but this is not very advisable, as they are obliged to take such a long rest to get up their strength afterwards.

I hatched some Minorca-Langshan chicks in the end of April, which began to lay in November, but I was very short of eggs during September and October.

I hope you will learn by my mistakes, and manage better in your first year.

Discussions rage in the poultry-books and live-stock journals concerning the relative merits of first-crosses and pure-bred fowls; but no decided conclusion has yet been arrived at, as so much depends more upon the laying strain than upon any peculiarity in the breed.

I would like to give you some idea of the different kinds of fowls, so that all may be able to choose according to their individual surroundings.

As we are considering fowls from the egg-production point of view, I shall enlarge most upon those breeds which have this special quality, and will mention in each case whether most suitable for an open range or close confinement. We will afterwards consider the main first-crosses, which will be easier after we have learnt a few of the characteristics of the pure breeds.

Pure breed fowls may be roughly divided into two classes—sitters and non-sitters.

It does not necessarily follow that a hen belonging to the sitting class will always want to sit at some part of the year, nor vice versa, but nevertheless there are certain varieties that have been so much cultivated and bred by man for laying purposes, that the desire to reproduce the species has almost entirely departed from the hens.

For never think that it is natural for any bird to lay a constant succession of eggs for no reason but the gratification of her owner. It is an acquired developed habit, and if the best laying varieties were allowed to mix and degenerate, they would gradually go back to the natural custom of laying eggs according to the number of broods they wished to rear.

I hope to describe shortly some of the principal breeds at the end of each paper, so this week I will take the Cochins, Brahmas, Plymouth Rocks, and Langshans, all of which are devoted sitters.

Cochins.—There are three chief varieties of this breed—the white, partridge, and buff.

All Cochins have feathered legs, very short tails, evenly serrated upright combs, and very loose fluffy plumage.

The white Cochin should be perfectly white all over. The illustration gives the impression of a black tail, but this is incorrect.

The partridge are, as the name suggests, of a partridge colour, mottled; the cock having a black breast and black leg feathering, with a good deal of red on the neck and back.

The buff are of a shade of buff colour, the cock throwing some very rich feathers in his tail.

Mr. Wright, in his "Book of Poultry," calls the Cochin the "Father of the Poultry Fancy," because when these fowls were first imported into England, in 1843, there arose such a Cochin-fever that people paid enormous prices for a single specimen; and this interest in one breed naturally cultivated the interest in others, and in poultry-keeping generally, which has never since declined.

Brahmas.—These birds can be obtained either in the light or dark variety. The light ones should be white all over, except the hackle feathers, which should be striped; and the tail feathers, which though short are longer than the Cochins, should be black, just edged with white. Both varieties have pea-combs firmly set to the head, and well-feathered legs.

Dark Brahmas are very handsome birds. The cock has a black breast, tail feathers, lower part of the body, and leg feathers. The hackle and saddle feathers are grey or greyish white and black.

The hen's hackle feathers are striped black and white, and the tail feathers are black, and the rest of the feathering is of a greyish hue of alternate shades, which on a well-marked bird looks exceedingly nice.

Plymouth Rocks are a very favourite breed, and are large birds, coloured in two shades of grey—very light and very dark. The marking on each feather should be very even, so that the birds have a regular mottled appearance.

Plymouth Rocks vary very much in shade, and are difficult to breed correctly. All have upright combs, the hen's being rather small; the legs are quite free from feathering, and should be of a decided yellow colour.

Langshans.—This breed of fowls is a comparatively new one, but is making its way by its handsome appearance and useful qualities.

Mr. Cook, in his "Poultry Breeder and Feeder," describes them as follows:—"The Langshan has more tail than the Cochins, and has black legs, slightly feathered down to the outside toe, not the middle one, which should be free from feathers. The thick fluff (vulture hocked) is a fault with them, especially the cocks. These are rather long, should be broad in the chest, and should carry themselves very erect. Their combs should be evenly serrated and erect. They have a beautiful green gloss upon their plumage."

All these four breeds are good average layers, though never, perhaps, quite coming up to some of the non-sitting class.

For hardiness and endurance of cold the breeds may be placed in the following order of merit—Cochins, Brahma, Plymouth Rock, Langshan.

All are very troublesome in the spring and summer, on account of their sitting propensities; the Cochins and Brahmas make the best mothers. All lay brown and tinted eggs, which with some people is an attraction, and where eggs are sold to dealers, brown have an advantage over white ones. The Cochins and Brahmas are the brownest.

Where eggs are required for home use, I think the Plymouth Rocks or Langshans would prove the most satisfactory, especially as they are also the best table birds.

All these breeds do well in confinement, as they are of a quiet and peaceable nature. The Langshans are rather nervous, and they and the Plymouth Rocks fly well, so require higher wire netting to keep them confined than the Brahmas and Cochins.

OUR BESSIE.

CHAPTER V.

THE OATLANDS POSTMARK.

ONE day about three months after her adventure in the Sheen Valley, Bessie was climbing up the steep road that led to the Lamberts' house. It was a lovely spring afternoon, and Bessie was enjoying the fresh breeze that was blowing up from the bay. Cliffe was steeped in sunshine, the air was permeated with the fragrance of lilac blended with the faint odours of the pink and white May blossoms. The flower-sellers' baskets in the town were full of dark red wallflowers and lovely narciss. The birds were singing nursery lullabies over their nests in the Coombe Woods, and even the sleek donkeys, dragging up some invalids from the Parade in their trim little chairs, seemed to toil more willingly in the sweet spring sunshine.

"How happy the world looks to-day," said Bessie to herself; and perhaps this pleasant thought was reflected in her face, for more than one passer-by glanced at her half enviously. Bessie did not notice them; her soft grey eyes were fixed on the blue sky above her, or on the glimpses of water between the houses. Just before she turned into the avenue that led to the house, she stopped to admire the view. She was at the summit of the hill now; below her lay the town; where she stood she could look over the housetops to the shining water of the bay, with its rocky island in the middle. Bessie always called it the bay, but in reality it resembled a lake, it was so land-locked, so closed in by the opposite shore, except in one part; but the smooth expanse of water, shining in the sunlight, lacked the freedom and wild freshness of the open sea, though Bessie would look intently to a distant part, where nothing, as she knew, came between her and the Atlantic. "If we only went far enough, we should reach America; that gives one the idea of freedom and vastness," she thought.

Bessie held the idea that Cliffe-on-Sea was one of the prettiest places in England, and it was certainly not devoid of picturesqueness.

The houses were mostly built of stone, hewn out of the quarry, and were perched up in surprisingly unexpected places—some of them built against the rock, their windows commanding extensive views of the surrounding country. The quarry was near the Lamberts' house, and the Coombe Woods stretched above it for miles. Bessie's favourite walk was the long road that skirted the woods. On one side were the hanging woods, and on the other the bay. Through the trees one could see the gleam of water, and on summer evenings the Lambert girls would often sit on the rocks with their work and books, preferring the peaceful stillness to the Parade crowded with strangers listening to the band. When their mother or Tom was with them, they would often linger until the stars came out or the moon rose. How glorious the water looked then, bathed in silvery radiance, like an enchanted lake. How dark and sombre the woods! What strange shadows used to lurk among the trees! Hatty would creep to Bessie's side as they walked, especially if Tom indulged in one of his ghost stories.

"What is the use of repeating all that rubbish, Tom?" Bessie would say, in her sturdy fashion. "Do you think anyone would hear us if we sang one of our glees? That will be better than talking about headless bogies to scare Hatty. I like singing by moonlight."

Well, they were just healthy, happy young people, who knew how to make the most of small pleasures. "Everyone could have air and sunshine and good spirits," Bessie used to say, "if they ailed nothing and kept their consciences in good order. Laughing cost nothing, and talking was the cheapest amusement she knew."

"That depends," replied her father, craculantly, on overhearing this remark. "Words are dear enough sometimes. You are a wise woman, Bessie, but you have plenty to learn yet. We all have to buy experience ourselves. I don't want you to get your wisdom second-hand; second-hand articles don't last, so laugh away, child, as long as you can."

"I love spring," thought Bessie, as she walked on. "I always did like bright things best. I wonder why I feel so hopeful to-day, just as though I expected something pleasant to happen. Nothing ever does happen, as Chriss says. Just a letter from Tom, telling us his news, or an invitation to tea with a neighbour, or perhaps a drive out into the country with father. Well, they are not big things, but they are pleasant for all that. I do like a long talk with father, when he has no troublesome case on his mind and can give me all his attention. I think there is no treat like it; but I mean Hatty to have the next turn. She has been good lately; but she looks pale and dwindled. I am not half comfortable about her." And here Bessie broke off her cogitations, for at that moment Katie rushed out of the house and began dancing up and down, waving a letter over her head.

"What a time you have been," cried the child, excitedly. "I have been watching for you for half an hour. Here is a letter for your own self, and it is not from Aunt Charlotte nor Uncle Charles, nor any old fogey at all."

"Give it me, please," returned Bessie. "I suppose it is from Tom, though why you should make such a fuss about it, as though no one ever got a letter, passes my comprehension. No, it is from Miss Sefton; I recognise her handwriting," which was true, as Bessie had received a note from Edna a few days after she had left them, conveying her own and her mother's thanks for the kind hospitality she had received.

"Of course it is from Miss Sefton, there is the Oatlands postmark. Ella and I were trying to guess what was in it; we thought that perhaps as Mrs. Sefton is so rich, she might have sent you a present for being so kind to her daughter; that was Ella's idea. Do open it quickly, Bessie; what is the use of looking at the envelope?"

"I am afraid I can't satisfy your curiosity just yet, Kitty. Hatty is waiting for the silks I have been matching, and mother will want to know how old Mrs. Wright is. Duty before pleasure," finished Bessie, with good-humoured peremptoriness, as she marched off in the direction of the morning room.

"Bessie is getting dreadfully old-maidish," observed Katie, in a sulky voice. "She never used to be so proper. I suppose she thinks it is none of my business."

When Bessie had got through her list of commissions she sat down to enjoy her letter quietly, but before she had read many lines her colour rose, and a half-stifled exclamation of surprise came to her lips; but in spite of Hatty's curious questions, she read steadily to the end, and then laid the letter on her mother's lap.

"Oh, mother, do let me hear it," implored Hatty, with the persistence of a spoiled child. "I am sure there is something splendid about Bessie, and I do hate mysteries."

"So do I, Hatty; we think alike there. Shall I read it aloud, my dear?" and as Bessie nodded, Mrs. Lambert read the letter in her quiet, silvery voice.

"My dear Miss Lambert," it began, "I told you that I should not allow you to forget me, so you see I am keeping my promise like a reliable young woman. Mamma says I have made a bad commencement to my letter—that self-praise is no recommendation. I think I remember that profoundly wise saying in copy-book days; but I hold a more worldly view of the subject. I think people are taken at their own value, so, on principle, I never undervalue myself, and the gist of all this is, that I do not intend to be forgotten, by a certain young lady who enacted the part of good Samaritan in the Sheen Valley."

"Now as I must candidly confess to a sincere wish for a better acquaintance with this same young lady, I am writing in my own and mamma's name to beg you to favour us with your company at The Grange for a few weeks."

"You must not think this a very unconventional proceeding on our part, as our parents were old friends. Mamma is writing to Dr. Lambert by the same post, and she means to say all sorts of pretty things to induce him to entrust you to our care."

"I wish I had the power of persuasion. Mamma has such a knack of saying nice things, but indeed you must come. The Grange is such a dear old house, and we know such pleasant people, and I want you to see our Kentish lanes, and indeed mamma and I will make you so comfortable. I don't mention Richard, because he is nobody, and he never interferes with our friends."

"Now I am taking it for granted that you will not refuse me, so I will proceed to tell you our arrangements. Mamma and I have been in town the last five weeks, and we are both of us tired to death of Vanity Fair, so we mean to go back to Oatlands next week. You may come to us as soon after that as you like, fix your own day and your train, and I will be at the station to meet you."

"I remain, yours most sincerely,

"EDNA SEFTON."

"Oh, Bessie, how delightful! But I don't like to spare you again so soon."

"Now, Hatty, don't be selfish. You must not grudge Bessie the first real treat she has ever had offered to her. We have none of us had such a chance before. Fancy staying at a place like The Grange, and seeing lots of nice people."

"I wish you could go in my place, Chrissy, dear. I am not quite sure how I should like staying with strange people; we have got into homely ways, never going anywhere except to Aunt Charlotte's or Uncle Charles's, and I don't know how I should get on with rich people like the Seftons; besides, father and mother may not wish me to accept the invitation," glancing at her mother's thoughtful face.

"We must see what your father says about it," returned Mrs. Lambert, rousing herself with difficulty from her abstraction. "I would not talk about it any more, girls, until we know his wishes. It will only disappoint Bessie if she makes up her mind that she would like to accept the invitation, and father thinks it wiser to refuse. Let us put it out of our heads until he comes home, and he and I will have a talk about it."

"Yes, that will be best," returned Bessie, putting the letter in the envelope. "Father will not be home until late, but that does not matter; to-morrow will do quite well." And, to her sister's surprise and disappointment, she refused to say any more on the subject.

"Mother is quite right," she observed, as Hatty fussed and grumbled at her silence. "If we talk about it, I shall just long to go, and shall be vexed and disappointed if father wishes me to refuse."

"But you might coax him to change his mind. Father never likes disappointing us when we set our hearts on anything," urged Hatty.

"No, indeed, I never like arguing things with father. He is not one to make up his mind in a hurry, like some people; he thinks over a thing thoroughly, and then he gives his opinion. If he does not wish me to go he will have a good reason for saying so. I never found either father or mother wrong yet, and I am not going to find fault with them now. Don't let us talk any more about it, Hatty. I want to think of something else." But in spite of this wise resolution, Bessie did think a good deal about the letter, and in her heart she hoped that her father would allow her to accept Miss Sefton's tempting invitation.

Dr. Lambert did not return home that night until long after his girls had retired to rest, and to Bessie's surprise he said nothing to her at breakfast; but just as she was leaving the room to give out the stores, as usual, he called her back.

"Oh, by the bye, Bessie," he observed, "I have to drive out as far as Castleton this afternoon. I will take you with me if you care to go."

"I always care to go with you, father, dear," replied Bessie, and then she hesitated, as she remembered Hatty's pale cheeks; "but I think you ought to take Hatty instead, it would do her so much good, and she does so love a drive."

"No, I think you shall be my companion this afternoon; I will take Hatty to-morrow," replied the doctor, as he took up his paper again.

"Good child, she always thinks of poor Hatty," he said to himself, and his eyes glistened. "They are all good girls, but not one of them is so unselfish as my little Betty; she takes after her mother in that. Dora never thinks of herself."

Bessie went about her household tasks with a light heart, for she had the prospect of a pleasant afternoon before her. The drive to Castleton would be lovely, and she would hear what her father had to say about the letter. So she was ready and waiting by the time the pretty little victoria came round to the door, and as Dr. Lambert stood in the porch, he thought the happy sunshiny face looked very attractive under the new grey hat.

"You look very smart, Bessie," he said, smiling; "have I seen that very becoming hat before?"

"Only last Sunday," returned Bessie, brightly, "but I always put on my best things when I drive with you, that your daughter may do you credit," for Bessie in her heart thought her father the handsomest man in Cliffe; and indeed many people admired the doctor's clever, refined face and quiet, genial manners.

The sturdy little roan trotted briskly down the lower road, as it was called, and Bessie leant back and looked dreamily at the golden ripples that lay on the water, while the branches overhead threw flickering shadows on the road before them, until her father's voice roused her.

"You and I are to have some talk together, I believe; would you like to see Mrs. Sefton's letter, Bessie? Your mother showed me the one you received from her daughter." And as Bessie eagerly assented, he handed it to her.

"It is a very nice letter," she observed, as soon as she had finished it; "it could not be more kindly expressed."

"No, Mrs. Sefton is a lady-like woman, and she knows exactly what to say; it is a grand thing to have tact." And then he paused for a moment, and continued, in an amused voice, "The world is a very small place after all. I have lived long enough in it not to be surprised at running against all sorts of odd people in all sorts of odd places, but I must own I was a little taken aback when you brought Miss Sefton into my house that night."

"You knew Mrs. Sefton when you were a young man, father?"

"I suppose I knew her family well, for I was engaged to her for six months." And, as Bessie started, "Well, you will think that an odd speech for a father to make to his daughter, but you see I know our Bessie is a reliable little woman, who can keep her tongue silent. I have my reasons for telling you this; you have always been your mother's companion, as well as my right hand, and I would not let you go to The Grange in ignorance of the character of its inhabitants."

"Oh, father, do you really mean me to go?"

"We will come to that presently; let me finish what I was saying. I was fool enough to engage myself to a beautiful girl, knowing her to be unsuitable in every way for a poor man's wife, and I daresay I should have persisted in my blindness to the bitter end, if I had not been jilted by the young lady."

"My dear father!"

"My dear little Betty, please don't speak in that pitying tone; it was the best thing that could have happened to me. I daresay I had a bad time of it, young men are such fools, but I soon met your mother, and she healed all wounds; but if Eleanor Sartoris treated me badly she met with her punishment. The man she married was a worthless sort of fellow; he is dead, so I need not mind saying so now; he was handsome enough, and had all the accomplishments that please women, but he could not speak the truth. I never knew a man who could lie so freely, and in other respects he was equally faulty, but Eleanor was infatuated, and she would marry him against the advice of her friends, and the first thing she found out was that he had deceived her on one point. She knew that he had married when almost a boy, and his wife had been long dead, but he kept from her that he had a son living. His excuse was, that he had heard her say that nothing would induce her to undertake the duties of a stepmother, and that he feared a refusal on account of Richard. In this he had overreached himself; she never forgave the deception, and she barely tolerated the poor boy. I am afraid, from what I heard, that their short married life was not a happy one. Eleanor had a proud, jealous temper, but she was truthful by nature, and nothing was so odious in her eyes as falsehood and deceit. I can feel sorry for her, for no woman could respect a character like Sefton's, but I have always blamed her for her hardness to her stepson. His father doated on him, and Richard was the chief subject of their dissension on his death-bed. He begged his wife to be kinder to the boy, but I do not know if this appeal softened her. The property belongs of course to her stepson, and in a sense she and her daughter are dependent on him, but it is not a united household. I know very little about the young man, except that he is industrious and fond of out-of-door pursuits, and farms his own estate, but I hear he is a little clownish in appearance. Now, we are stopping because I have a patient to see here, but I shall not be ten minutes, and we will resume our conversation presently."

The party originated under the auspices of one Robert Owen, who thought to reorganise society by abolishing religion, in any of its special forms, and establishing society on a basis of co-operation and community of goods. His book, entitled "New Views of Society," appeared in 1816. 2. We do not recommend anyone to select literature as a means of living, unless gifted with any special talent for it, in some particular branch.

HOUSEKEEPING.

TWO BUSY WORKERS.—The jacket was intended to be worn in bed at night.

DORA McCARR.—We think you might live as you describe on £120 per annum, and you might lighten your burden of housework by having a good charwoman to do the washing and heavy cleaning, once a fortnight. £70, in these days of stained or painted floors and rugs, ought to be more than enough to furnish your five-roomed house.

DOROTHY TUP'S PHANTOM.—The subject of serviette-folding is too large for these correspondence columns. We hope, however, to give some articles on the subject shortly. Wedding rings were introduced by the Jews. Formerly the ring was used as a signet, and its delivery was a sign that the giver intended to endow the person who received it with all the authority he himself possessed. We have an example of this when Pharaoh took off his ring and put it on the hand of Joseph, and set him over all the land of Egypt. Thus by the gift of the ring to a woman, her husband gave her the same power as himself, to issue orders, and to act as his representative. Thus, there would be no reason for a woman, unless she possessed all the worldly wealth, to give a wedding ring to a man. There was, however, anciently, an exchange of rings at the betrothal ceremony, and this is, probably, the origin of the wedding ring worn by men on the Continent of Europe. They are not usual in England, because not accorded a place in the marriage ceremony here.

C. A. F. We were much interested in your pleasant letter, and your efforts to live the best of lives. You should rub the fender with sweet oil, let it stand for forty-eight hours, and then rub with unslaked lime, reduced to a fine powder. This will clean and take out the spots made by rust.

MUSIC.

ONE TRYING TO BE PATIENT.—Novello's or Cramer's instruction books would suit you.

ROSE LANACH.—It would be impossible for us to say whether your voice be worth cultivating without having heard it. The only thing we can recommend you is, that you should get some singing-master in your own town to try your voice and give you an opinion.

AN ORGANIST AND WILD ROSE.—The organ at the Albert Hall, by Willis, is the largest organ in the world. It has 111 sounding stops; the total number of pipes nearly 8,000, and they range from the size of a straw, to 32 feet (C). The next in size is the St. George's Hall organ, Liverpool, which contains exactly 100 sounding stops, disposed between four claviers, and pedal. The pedal range is two octaves and a half, and the total number of pipes is 5,739. The Crystal Palace organ has 65 stops, and the total number of pipes in it is 4,508. We regret that we cannot help you with regard to your other query.

LOTTIE MOSELEY.—We think Beethoven's Sonatas would not be too advanced for you.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AGNES.—Iphigenia was a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, who was decreed to be sacrificed to Diana at the time of the Trojan war, to expiate her father's offence in killing her favourite stag; but the goddess took compassion on her. The story is too long to repeat here. Dryden wrote a drama called "Cymon and Iphigenia."

DRAPER.—We cannot say anything about the holidays, unless they were mentioned in your indentures. You had better consult your father.

IVY.—We see no difficulty in understanding the statement in the quotation you give about the hereditary privilege, said to have been granted to the De Courcy family, of keeping the head covered in the presence of the sovereign. It is stated in plain, unequivocal language. We do not undertake to return answers within any specified time.

DEPRESSED ONE.—You ask, "What are the signs whereby we may know when God's Holy Spirit is with us?" Your next remark gives you the answer you need: "I do earnestly pray for forgiveness, and that He may be with me." It is the Holy Spirit that inspires you with a desire that He should be with you, and thus He must be with you. He instils into our hearts good desires, and He does not incline you to try to deny your petitions! Nor cause you to "hunger and thirst after righteousness," to leave you starving. He must be "with you," beyond all doubt, if evil thoughts "make you truly most unhappy." Wicked thoughts are put into your mind by the Evil One. Repudiate, and pray against them, and you will find that "greater is he that is for us, than he that is against us. Ye are complete in Him." Let thanksgivings for thus leading you be as hearty as your prayers.

NETTLERASH.—At one time the holder of the "freedom of the borough" gives the privilege of exercising certain trades. The holding of that distinction at present only has the right to vote for the mayor, sheriffs, and aldermen. The longest word in the Welsh or ancient British language is, "salmanyrelwysenyramalwch," signifying, "psalms of the church in the desert." We have several times given a reply respecting the English language; and it is uninteresting to our readers in general to continue repeating ourselves.

SARA.—1. If you suffer from headaches, we think that sea bathing would be a risky experiment for you. The complaint may result from more than one cause, however, and you should obtain an opinion upon the question from a doctor who has personal acquaintance with you. 2. The initials employed in the "Church Catechism," in lieu of the Christian name or names, are singular and plural. "N" stands for "name," a singular name; "m" is a contraction of two "ns," otherwise standing for two "names." "MS." stands for "manuscript," and when the "s" is doubled they stand for the plural, "scripts."

MAB does not comply with our directions, and thus she may expect her letters to be set aside. We are always telling our readers that we (as Editor) have nothing to do with the Publishing Department. If you need books or magazines from our publishing office, you should write to our Publisher (Mr. Tarn). Your writing is legible, but you use too hard a pen.

PHILLIS PENELOPE.—Certainly, there is an Irish language, and a very beautiful one too. But since the country belonged to England, conferred by one of the Popes of Rome, and never withdrawn, and peopled by the English-speaking gentry and farmers, the aboriginal language is known only to certain scholars, and spoken by a small portion of the peasantry. We thank you for your nice grateful letter.

A GRATEFUL NEW ZEALAND GIRL (Dunedin).—We appreciate your kind approval of our paper, and that of your fellow colonists, in your beautiful adopted country. We are unable to offer our pages to contributors in general: we are well supplied by regular members of our staff, who are experienced writers. Your writing is very good. We do not send private answers to our correspondents.

JOSEPHINE.—We recommend you to get a good hairdresser to singe the ends of your hair, the small as well as great. Although the gipsies are popularly supposed to be of Egyptian origin, Sir H. Rawlinson once gave an account of their migration at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, tracing them very distinctly from the Indies, through Persia, Syria, and Asia Minor, to the Bosphorus. Their dialect corresponds with Hindustani.

LILLIE J.—We can only suggest, as excellent winter residences, the Channel Islands or the Isle of Wight. House-rent is sufficiently moderate at both places. Jersey would be, perhaps, the best. Other expenses would not differ much from those in England. It would be well to visit both localities, and see for yourselves. The climate of the Isle of Wight is a very good one for a semi-invalid, especially Shanklin.

FLORRIE.—We regret that we cannot help you. The meaning and history of the local monuments and tablets in the English churches can usually be found out by applying to either the vicar or else to the sexton, if he be accustomed to act as cicerone to it.

RAIN PICTURES.

RAIN from a blackened cloud; Down in a drenching rush, whilst the gusty wind blows loud,
And the muffled thunder breaks and ranges in dull deep roar,
As the plunge of the pouring flood grows awfully more and more.

Rain from the cottage eaves;
Dripping so gentle and soft thro' the budding of green spring leaves,
Whilst the birds cower close in their nests and watch it with bright quick eyes, Then prune their breasts with their bills and twitter a glad surprise.

Rain on an ocean cape;
Where the surge strikes its caverns and crag, and mists wrap its terrible shape,
And a lonely ship is seen a-shudder on ocean bare,
As the wind slacks out of her sails into leaden motionless air.

Rain on a field of corn;
Rustling its yellow breadth in the clear white light of morn,
And the gracious drops fall fast on the dust-dried ear and blade,
Then trickles adown the stems where the scarlet poppies are laid.

Rain on a factory town;
Pressing the shroud of smoke closer and closer down,
Till the furnaces glare aghast and the engines shriek as they strain,
And the toilers by anvil or loom are faint with a new-found pain.

Rain on the old churchyard;
Where the quiet flowers bloom in the depths of the soft thick sward,
And the rich and the poor lie down in a common unbroken rest,
And the passion has ebbed away from each now tranquil breast.

Rain past a rainbow high;
Arched o'er this little earth, spanning the whole vast sky,
Teaching that trouble must come, and torrents of tears must fall,
But a throne has been set up in heaven:
a Promise is over all.

CHAPTER VI.

LITTLE MISS MUCH-AFRAID.

ESSIE had plenty of food for meditation while Dr. Lambert paid his visit to his patient, and he found her apparently absorbed in a brown study when he returned to the carriage.

"Father dear," she said, rousing herself, as he placed himself beside her, "I have been thinking over all you have told me, and I cannot help wondering why you wish me to visit Mrs. Sefton, when she treated you so badly."

Dr. Lambert was silent for a minute; the question was not an easy one to answer. His wife had said the very same thing to him the previous evening—

"I wonder that you care to let Bessie visit at The Grange, when Eleanor Sartoris treated you so badly." And then she added, "I think she is very much to blame, too, for her behaviour to her stepson. Margaret Tillotson tells me that he is an honest, good-hearted fellow, though not very clever, but that want of appreciation has made him shy and awkward."

But he had been able to satisfy his wife without much difficulty; all their married life there had never been a shadow of a doubt between them; her calm, reasonable judgment had wholly approved her husband's conduct on all occasions; whatever he did or said had been right in her eyes, and she had brought up her daughters to think the same.

"Well, do you know, Bessie," he said, playfully, "I have more reasons than one for wishing you to go to The Grange. I have taken a fancy to Miss Sefton, and I want her mother to be acquainted with my daughter; and I think it will be good for you to extend your knowledge of the world; you girls are tied too much to your mother's apron-strings, and you must learn to do without her sometimes."

This was all very well, but though Bessie smilingly accepted this explanation of her father's motives in permitting her to go to Oatlands, she was clever enough to know that more lay behind.

Dr. Lambert had long ago forgiven the injury that had been done to him. His nature was a generous one; good had come out of evil, and he was tolerant enough to feel a kindly interest in Mrs. Sefton as an old friend. It is true she had created her own troubles, but in spite of that he could be sorry for her.

Like a foolish woman, she had built her life's hopes upon a shifting, sandy foundation; she had looked on the outward appearance, and a fair exterior had blinded her to the hollowness beneath. The result was bitterness and disappointment.

"I should like her to see our Bessie," he had said to his wife. "Bessie is just like a sunbeam; she will do her good, and even if things are different from what she sees at home, it will do her no harm to know how other people live. Our girls are good girls, but I do not want them to live like nuns behind a grating; let them go out into the world a little, and enlarge their minds. If it were Christine, I might hesitate before such an experiment, but I have perfect confidence in Bessie." And his wife's answer to this had been—

"I am quite sure you are right, Herbert, and I am perfectly willing to let Bessie visit your old friend." And so the matter ended. The doctor got his way as usual, simply by wishing for it.

The drive was a long one, but it seemed short to Bessie, and she was quite sorry when it was over.

"Thank you, father dear; it has been such a treat," she said, with a loving little squeeze of his arm; and then she ran in to find her mother. Mrs. Lambert looked up inquiringly, as Bessie took off her hat and gloves.

"Well, my dear, have father and you settled it?"

"Yes, indeed, mother; and I am really to go. Father seems to like the idea. He has evidently fallen in love with Miss Sefton. I am afraid I am a great deal too much excited about it at present, but Hatty will soon damp me."

"Poor child! she never likes you to go away. She does not mean to be selfish, and I know she struggles hard to control her feelings, but she will have a good cry when she hears you are going to Oatlands."

"We must not let her mope, mother. If I thought it were good for Hatty I would stay at home, to prevent her feeling so miserable, but it would be false kindness to give in to her; she would hate herself for her selfishness, and she would not be a bit happy if she knew she had prevented my visit. I would rather see her fret before I go, and bear it as well as I can, and then I know she will cheer up soon, and be looking forward to my return."

"You are quite right, Bessie, and neither your father nor I would allow you to sacrifice yourself for Hatty. Too much indulgence on your part would only feed the poor child's nervous fancies. I know she feels her parting with you for a week or two as a serious trial, and I daresay it is a trial to her, but she must take it as one, and not selfishly spoil your pleasure. Now we will forget Hatty for a few minutes; there is something else troubling me. How are you to be fitted out for your visit, when I dare not ask your father for any more money?"

"Well, I have thought about that, too," returned Bessie, briskly. "I was reviewing my wardrobe all the time father was at Castleton House. He was quite half an hour away, so I had plenty of time. I was a little worried at first, thinking how I should manage, but somehow I made it all straight. Listen to me, mother dear," as Mrs. Lambert sighed and shook her head, "Miss Sefton has been here, so she knows we are not rich people, and she will not expect to see many smart dresses. I don't want to pretend to be what I am not. We cannot afford to dress grandly, nor to have many new frocks, but I am sure we are just as happy without them."

"Yes, but you have never stayed with rich people before, Bessie," returned her mother, sadly. "You do not know how shabby your old things will look beside other people's silks and satins. Father does not think about these things, and I do not like to remind him; but you ought to have a new jacket, though we did say the old one must do this year."

"Now, mother, will you be quiet, please, and listen to me, for I am brimful of ideas, and I won't have you worry. The jacket must do, for I do not mean to ask father for a new one. I have my grey dress and hat; and father thinks they are very becoming; and there is my Indian muslin Uncle Charles gave me for best occasions, and if you will let me buy a few yards of white nun's cloth, Chrissy and I will contrive a pretty dinner dress. I like white best, because one can wear different flowers, and so make a change. Perhaps I must have a pair of new gloves, and some shoes; but those won't cost much."

"You are easily satisfied, darling," replied Mrs. Lambert, fondly. "Yes, you shall have the nun's cloth, and I will give you some of my lace to trim it. And there are the pearls that I wore on my wedding day. Your father is so fond of them, but I always told him they were put aside for you. Wait a moment, they are in my escritoire, and you may as well have them now." And Mrs. Lambert unlocked the drawer, and opening a little box, placed the necklace in Bessie's hand. It consisted of three rows of tiny pearls, and was very simple and pretty.

"Oh, mother, how lovely!" exclaimed the girl. "Is it really for me? That is just what I wanted; my gold chain is so thin that I hardly ever dare to wear it. It has been broken twice. But this is far prettier." And Bessie clasped the little necklace round her neck, and then went off proudly to show her treasure to Christine and Hatty, while Mrs. Lambert shed a few tears at the thought how little she had to give her girls. The next moment she dashed them away indignantly.

"I ought to be ashamed of myself," she thought. "What would Herbert say if he found me crying in this childish way? What do our girls want with ornaments and pretty dresses? They have youth and good looks and good manners. My Bessie is a perfect gentlewoman, in spite of her shabby frocks. No one could help being pleased with her gentle, modest ways. I expect it is my pride. I did not want Mrs. Sefton to think we are not rich. But I am wrong: my girls are rich. They are rich in having such a father, and in their own happy natures." And then Mrs. Lambert thought of those other ornaments that she desired for them—the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit; the priceless jewels of innocence and purity, which are the fairest adornments of a young girl.

"These will not be lacking," she said to herself. "My Bessie's unobtrusive goodness will soon make itself felt."

Bessie had made up her mind not to trouble about her scanty wardrobe, and she was quite happy planning the nun's cloth dress with Christine.

But though Dr. Lambert said nothing, he thought a great deal, and the result of his cogitations was a five-pound note was slipped into Bessie's hand the next evening.

"Go and buy yourself some finery with that," he observed, quietly.

Bessie could hardly sleep that night, she was so busy spending the money in anticipation; and the very next day she was the delighted purchaser of a new spring jacket, and had laid out the remainder of the five-pound note in a useful black-and-white tweed for daily use, and a pretty lilac cotton, and she had even eked out a pair of gloves.

Three dresses to be made; no wonder they were busy; even Mrs. Lambert was pressed into the service to sew over seams and make buttonholes.

Hatty never complained her back ached when she worked for Bessie; her thin little hands executed marvellous feats of fine workmanship; all the finer parts were entrusted to Hatty.

"I feel almost as though I were going to be married," observed Bessie, as she surveyed the fresh, dainty dresses. "I never had more than one new gown at a time. Now they are finished, and you are tired, Hatty, and you must just go and lie down, like a good child."

"I am not tired, not a bit," returned Hatty, touchily; "and I am going out with Ella."

Bessie held her peace. Hatty's temper had been very trying the last ten days; she had slaved for Bessie, to the detriment of her health, but had worn an injured manner all the time.

She would not join in the conversation, nor understand a joking remark. When Christine laughed at her in a good-humoured way, Hatty pursed up her lips, and drew herself up in a huffy manner, and would not condescend to speak a word. She even rejected Bessie's caresses and little attempts at petting. "Don't, Bessie. I must go on with my work. I wish you would leave me alone," she would say pettishly.

Bessie did leave her alone, but it made her heart ache to see the lines under Hatty's eyes, that showed she had cried herself to sleep. She knew it was unhappiness and not temper that was the cause of her irritability.

"She is ashamed of letting me know that she cannot bear me to go away," she thought. "She is trying to get the better of her selfishness, but it conquers her. I will leave her alone for a little, and then I will have it all out. I could not go away and leave her like that." For Bessie's warm, affectionate nature could not endure the thought of Hatty's pain.

"I have so much, and she has so little," she said to herself, and her pity blunted all Hatty's sharp sarcastic little speeches and took the sting out of them. "Poor little thing, she does not mean half she says," she remarked, as a sort of apology to Christine, when Hatty had marched off with Ella.

"I don't know how you put up with her as you do," observed Christine, whose patience had been sorely exercised that morning by Hatty's tempers. "She is treating you as badly as possible. I would rather have been without her help, if I had been you; we might have had Miss Markham in for two days, that would have shamed Hatty nicely."

"I don't want to shame her, Chrissy dear; poor little Hatty, when she has been working so beautifully, too. She is worrying herself about my going away, and that makes her cross."

"As though no one else would miss you," returned Christine, stormily, for she was not quite devoid of jealousy. "But there, it is no use my talking, you will all treat Hatty as though she were a baby, and so she behaves like a spoiled child. I should like to give her a bit of my mind." And Christine tossed her pretty head, and swept off the last dress, while Bessie cleared the table.

Bessie's visit was fixed for the following Tuesday, so on Sunday evening she made up her mind that the time was come for speaking to Hatty. As it happened they were keeping house together, for the rest of the family, the servants included, had gone to church. Hatty had just settled herself in a corner of the couch, with a book in her hand, expecting that Bessie would follow her example (for the Lambert girls were all fond of reading), when a hand was suddenly interposed between her eyes and the page.

"This is our last quiet evening, Hatty, and I am going to talk instead of read, so you may as well shut up that big book."

"It takes two to talk," observed Hatty, rather crossly, "and I am not in the mood for conversation, so you had better let me get on with 'Bishop Selwyn's Life.'"

"You are not in the mood for reading either," persisted Bessie, and there was a gleam of fun in her eyes. "When you pucker up your forehead like that I know your thoughts are not on your book; let us have a comfortable talk instead. You have not been like yourself the last week, not a bit like my Hatty, so tell me all about it, dear, and see if I cannot make you feel better."

"No, Bessie, don't try, it is not any use, unless I jump into somebody else's body and mind. I can't make myself different. I am just Hatty, a tiresome, disagreeable, selfish little thing."

"What a lot of adjectives! I wonder they don't smother you. You are not big enough to carry so many. I think I could word that sentence better. I should just say, 'Hatty is a poor weak little body to whom molehills are mountains, and the grasshopper a burthen.' Does not that sound nicer?"

"Yes, if it were true," returned Hatty, sorrowfully, and then her ill-humour vanished. "No, don't pet me, Bessie, I don't deserve it," as Bessie stroked her hand in a petting sort of way. "I have been cross and ill-tempered all the week; just unbearable, as Christine said; but oh, Bessie, it seemed as though I could not help it. I was so miserable every night to think you were going away, that I could not sleep for ever so long, and then my head ached, and I felt as though I were strung on wires when I came down the next morning, and every time people laughed and said pleasant things I felt just mad, and the only relief was to show everyone how disagreeable I could be."

Hatty's description of her overwrought feelings was so droll that Bessie, with some difficulty, refrained from laughing outright, but she knew how very real all this was to Hatty, so she exercised self-control, and said quite gravely—

"And so you wanted to make us all miserable, too. That was hardly kind, was it, when we were all so sorry for you? I do think you have a great deal to bear, Hatty. I don't mean because you are so weak in health; that could be easily borne; but it must be so sad always to look on the dark side of things. Of course, in some sense, we all project our own shadows; but you are not content with your own proper shadow, you go poking and peering about for imaginary ones, and so you are dark all round."

"But your going away to Oatlands is not imaginary," returned Hatty, piteously.

"No, you foolish child. But I hope you do not grudge me a pleasant visit. That would be a great piece of substantial selfishness on your part, of which, I trust, my Hatty would not be capable. Supposing I gave in to this ridiculous fancy and said, 'Hatty hates me to go away, and so I will just stop at home, and Miss Sefton shall be disappointed.' I wonder how you would like that."

"That would not please me either. I am not so selfish as that. Oh, Bessie, do tell me how I am to conquer this nervous dread of losing you? It is not selfishness, for I do love you to have treats; but when you go away, I don't seem to take any pleasure in anything; it is all so flat and disagreeable. Sometimes I lie awake and cry when I think what I should do if you were to die. I know how silly and morbid it is, but how am I to help it!" And here Hatty broke down, and hid her face on Bessie's shoulder.

A GIRLS' TOUR IN BRITTANY.

CHAPTER II.

DINAN is a delightful place for artists. Besides the steep Rue de Jersual, with its ancient porte, there are many interesting subjects in the town. The fronts of the houses are often supported on columns, forming a covered footway. The shelter thus afforded is chosen by market women, whose light caps and bright coloured wares light up the dark recesses.

Needless to say, the market once a week spreads all over the place, and one is in constant danger of stumbling over a pile of coarse, well-shaped pottery or into the midst of other merchandise, alive or dead.

There are two interesting churches. From the Place Anglaise, just behind the church of St. Sauveur, a splendid view is obtained from the old town walls. The Rance flows in a narrow and romantic valley at the foot of a precipitous descent of 250 feet. By moonlight, or in the early morning, its windings may be traced amid its wooded walls by a delicate line of mist.

We took a boat on the river one evening, and a man, walking on the path, towed us as far as Lehon. This little village, with its bridge, and its groups of women washing in the stream, is a favourite resort of artists. The abbey was undergoing restoration, so we could not visit it.

The neighbourhood abounds in interesting excursions. We went to St. Esprit, where there is a graceful granite crucifix, and to the Hospice des Aliénés, where the 600 lunatics are, if fit, employed in gardening and farming.

Having read the "Lady of la Garraye" by the Hon. Mrs. Norton, we were interested in visiting the ruined château. This lady, while in the bloom of youth and beauty, and with every advantage that a happy marriage and great wealth could bestow, was thrown from her horse, and incurably injured, disfigured, and crippled. After spending some time in a state of great despondency, her thoughts were diverted by her father confessor to the unalleviated sufferings of the poor. With her husband's full sympathy and consent their château was turned into a hospital, and their lives were devoted to the study of medicine and the care of the sick. The lady is said to have become an excellent oculist, and the marquis received marks of distinction from the king for his discoveries. The noble pair happily did not live to see the hospital they had endowed destroyed by the Revolution in 1793.

The caps at Dinan would be very plain and flat but that their long side-flaps are turned up and pinned across the top of the head, thus producing a much more piquant effect. The dress is generally dark blue linen, with a narrow stripe.

After a week's stay we left Dinan with many regrets, and took the train to Guingamp, a journey of five hours. Guingamp is an ordinary old-fashioned French town, with old timber and stone houses, with curious angle turrets. It has the usual open squares with trees, a river with water-mills, and a fine church (Notre Dame de Bon Secours), containing recent stained glass, commemorative of the Franco-Prussian war. Here, as in all Breton towns, we were struck with the devoutness of the people. A little chapel outside the church, divided from the street by a fine iron grating, was crowded at all hours.

We were told that the first umbrella was made at Guingamp, also that gingham takes its name from this place. It occurred to us to wonder whether Mrs. Gamp derived her name, as well as her umbrella, from this source. Unless as a starting point for Paimpol and Tréguier, I should not advise a traveller to stay there. It is better to go on to Morlaix, which is a much prettier place, and serves as headquarters for St. Pol de Léon, Carhaix, and the Montagnes Noires. We purposely left this corner and the town of Brest unexplored, preferring to see them properly another time than just to "glance and nod and bustle by."

So from Guingamp we went to Quimper, stopping for two hours at Landerneau in passing. The whole journey to Quimper occupied about eight hours. The route was very picturesque, the railway line lying so high that we often looked down into deep ravines, as in Cornwall.

In passing Morlaix we seemed to be as high as the church spire, the river with its wide quays and tall-masted vessels lying far beneath. Sometimes we travelled through miles of moorland, bright with bell-heather and furze, and caught glimpses of the sea when an arm ran inland; or through forests of fir trees, or acres of brushwood. Now and then we came on a small village or considerable town like Morlaix or Landerneau, but there seemed few scattered houses to connect them.

We thought ourselves in the midst of moorland solitudes, when we suddenly caught sight of elaborate carpet-bedding of clumps of Pampas grass and other signs of horticulture, and found that the train was running into Quimper station. The town was a great surprise to us. After Guingamp it had quite a Parisian air, with its two rivers running through the principal streets, its endless bridges, its boulevards, cafés, gay shops, and the delicate spires of its cathedral.

It is cleaner, too, than many Brittany towns, for let us not attempt to disguise the dirty and undrained state of some of them. We heard many groans on this subject from our countrymen, more from our countrywomen, who perhaps in their secret hearts place cleanliness above godliness. They really believe in cleanliness, because they "live by it" (the literal meaning of believe). A lovely engraving of Quimper appeared in the October number (1886) of the "Portfolio." The view is of a "narrow street of over-hanging houses, timber-framed and gabled, with the bright fleches of the cathedral of St. Corentin to close the vista. These fleches are of quite recent date, having been added to the fifteenth-century towers in 1854. The money was raised by a public subscription called the 'Sou de St. Corentin.'

We went to high mass on Sunday morning. No sooner had we stepped inside the building than all the sensations a cathedral gives came over us—a sense of vastness, and of one's soul being drawn up with one's eyes. Far off in the Lady Chapel, through the apse, which bent slightly to the left, the stained glass gleamed like jewels. I first noticed a similar bend in one of the old churches in Coventry. Many ingenious theories have been suggested to account for the peculiarity, the favourite one being that it is emblematic of the droop of Our Saviour's head upon the cross. Others say that the east end of churches are so placed as to greet the rising sun on the festival of the saint to whom the building is dedicated. Perhaps it has been merely a fanciful device to break the uniformity of line, and to give more variety of light and shade, or it may have been a purely accidental circumstance, brought about by the dovetailing of new work on old. This last idea seems confirmed by the fact that the bend is never found, in any noticeable degree, in new cathedrals, or in those which have been built (comparatively speaking) all at one time. The nave was filled almost entirely with peasant women and school children, presided over by Sisters of Mercy in long cloaks and dresses of soft creamy white and dead white hoods. The eye rested upon them with a sense of relief; they were saintly characters, far removed from our hurrying, fractious, irritable world. Suddenly up jumped one of them, whose back we had contemplated with emotion, and seized one of the children, pulling it this way and pushing it that in such a manner as quite to break the spell of our enchantment. The aisles were filled with several hundred soldiers in long blue surtouts; they were returning from the autumn manoeuvres, and were there of their own accord, not on parade. The day before we noticed soldiers just returned from Tonquin, praying in the church. It is said that France draws almost all her priests and her bravest soldiers and sailors from Brittany. The Bretons have a manly gravity and a devout seriousness very much more suggestive of their Welsh and Cornish kinsfolk than of the typical Frenchman. Their language is not unlike Welsh, as is shown by such a name as "Rhuys."

The women's costume at Quimper is very pretty. The cap is peaked, being indeed raised on cardboard. The front is plain white linen, the back beautiful lace, through which gleams the colour known as the Virgin's blue. The dress is of a dark thick cloth, with an incredible number of plaits round the waist, a small over-bodice very much cut out at the armholes and trimmed with black velvet. The bodice is cut square at the throat, displaying a white chemisette and low ruff. The children are dressed in the same way, except that their headdress is a pretty coloured skull cap.

The men's costume has something Spanish about it, and also reminds one of ancient worthies of the Stuart period. A wide-brimmed felt hat, with ribbon ends, a long blue vest, with a very short waistcoat over, profusely ornamented with buttons; generally blue trousers. On fête days beautiful gold or silver embroidery is worn by both men and women.

In the country districts the old men wear long hair and bragou brass—i.e., white cotton trunk hose, very fully plaited, gaiters and sabots.

As the vast congregation streamed out of the cathedral into the sunlight of the open "Place" an auction was going on, and women seated at stalls were eagerly proffering their wares.

In the afternoon we crossed the river and walked through a lovely wood to the top of a steep hill, whence a view is obtained of the windings of the Odet as its stream widens on approaching the sea.

Next day we rose before the sun and took the 6.30 a.m. train to Douarnenez, there took a carriage to Audierne (two and a half hours), and thence to the Pointe de Raz (one and a half hours), the Land's End of France, one of the extreme points of the Old World, spoken of by Ptolemy of Alexandria as Gobœnum Promontorium. We enjoyed the long drive immensely, as the day was exquisitely fine.

The scenery in the parts of Brittany we visited is not imposing nor wildly romantic, but it is well wooded and very pleasing. In September the face of the country glows with the rich colours of furze and heather, while the red stalk of the buckwheat makes a ruddy sheaf in the harvest field.

Perhaps one does less justice to the landscape from the charming scenes in peasant life which every turn of the road reveals.

It is always market day somewhere, and to our unaccustomed eyes every group on the roadside was a picture; even the cows are different from English cows, being smaller and generally black, or black-and-white, and allowing their white-capped mistresses to drive them along by a long cord attached to their horns. If the women share in the hard outdoor work, they also seem to take a leading part in the responsibilities of buying and selling, and have by no means a down-trodden look. On Sundays and holidays the men walk out with their wives, and generally carry the baby.

Occasionally on returning from market some of these "lords of creation" dismount from their ancient steeds, and deliberately seek out some shady place in which to sleep off the effect of too copious pour boire. But even in this respect we English are not in a position to reproach them.

At the little village of Confort we saw a rather modern "Calvary," and a church containing a remarkable arrangement of bells. A number of small bells are fixed round a wheel, called the wheel of fortune. At certain intervals in the service a statue called "Sautiear-Rod" causes the wheel to turn. Our driver always slackened speed and raised his cap on passing the wayside crucifixes.

Audierne is a tiny seaport, with sardine and oyster fisheries. The heads of the sardines are used for tillage, and the tin shavings from the boxes glisten in all sorts of unexpected places, and form inexhaustible playthings for children.

After our own Land's End, the extreme point of Finisterre is rather disappointing. Not that it is a place to despise in a storm, far from it; but in ordinary weather there is nothing to rival the mighty billows which daily expend their force against our Cornish coast.

The awful "Baie des Trépassés" looked so exquisitely calm and blue, that it was difficult to recall the weird legends of the place; how the Druids were supposed to embark after death from that shore for interment in the "Ile des Seins;" how lost souls are said to wander about lamenting, while the bones of sailors shipwrecked on this dangerous coast knock at the doors of fishermen until they receive Christian burial.

Towards the Point of Brest there was such a lovely effect of pale blue sea contrasting with the deep nearer blue, such a hazy and mysterious mingling of sea and sky and land, that it was easy to picture King

Arthur sailing from this coast (as the legend describes)—

"To the island-valley of Avilion,
Where falls not hail, or rain, or snow,
Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies Deep-meadow'd, happy, fair with orchard lawns
And bowery hollows crowned with summer sea."

(The French Cornouaille and the English Cornwall claim in common the legends of the Round Table.)

From the Pointe de Raz we also overlooked the site of the submerged city of Is, from which Paris takes its name, the word suggesting a humble attempt on its part to rival the glories of this ancient place. According to the legend old King Gradlon was weakly blind and indulgent to his beautiful, wicked daughter Dahut. She stole his keys, and by design or accident opened the sluice gate, which protected the city, thus admitting the intruding tide. Gradlon mounted his horse in flight, taking Dahut behind him, in spite of the advice of St. Corentin. The waters gained on them until the saint dragged her off, when they ceased to pursue the king, who reached Quimper safely. He made that place his seat of government, and his equestrian statue may be seen over the west front of the cathedral.

The "Ile des Seins" is inhabited chiefly by the widows of seamen; it is very barren, and contains not a single tree. The passage to the mainland is so dangerous that there is a saying, "Jamais homme n'a traversé le Raz sans avoir peur ou mal." There is also a touching Breton prayer, "Mon Dieu secourez moi pour traverser le Raz, car mon navire est petite, et la mer est grande."

On our return to Douarnenez in the evening, we saw the sardines lying out to dry in the sun, while girls and women from the "Usine," in small Quaker-like caps, sat about in groups laughing and chatting, and eating their supper out of tin cans.

We hope never to forget the first sight of Douarnenez Bay. The sun was setting in rosy colours on one side, while on the other was an effect of pale light, like the tender, pure silver of moonlight. The Isle of Tristram lay in the centre of the apparently land-locked bay; the red or white sails of fishing boats, dotted in every direction, caught the dying sunlight, while delicate sardine nets, hung out to dry near the shore, draped from the masts like finest lace. A windmill and a church tower stood out black against the sky, to be reflected like the rosy clouds, silver light, and ruddy sail in the calm waters.

Owing to a very wet day we were unable to make the excursion to Pont l'Abbé and Penmarch. We finally left our comfortable quarters at the Hotel de l'Epée, Quimper, at six o'clock one morning, and started in heavy rain by train for Concarneau.

We were getting quite accustomed to start in the dark, and to see the sunrise from the train. Concarneau is a very ancient town, built on an island surrounded by strongly fortified walls, and connected with the mainland by a drawbridge. Only the roofs of the houses and the church spire are visible from the modern village which has grown up on the seashore. We longed to stay there a month, but a couple of hours having sufficed for a cursory glance, we inquired for a carriage to take us to Pont Aven.

After some difficulty we discovered the sole proprietor of such luxuries, and found ranged in a half open shed a number of vehicles, which, from their venerable antiquity, might have been constructed by Noah's family on landing. One specially commended to our notice by its owner was more on the model of the original ark than the rest, and was of such ponderous size that we felt it would be cruelty to animals to take it out with less than a pair. So we chose a more humble vehicle, a kind of high, square waggonette with a covering like the canopy of a four-post bed, possessed of American leather curtains to be drawn at will. A bon cheval being promised, we left, fixing the hour of ten, and the price of ten francs.

We thought the equipage long in coming, until it was explained to us that at Concarneau the hour of day is twenty minutes later than the railway time. In due course it arrived, driven by a small boy, and drawn by an animal, a contemplation of whose body was an involuntary lesson in anatomy. However, his mettle was in inverse proportion to his flesh, and he took us along at an alarming speed. The iron rods of our canopy creaked and swayed, and we rolled about, while he tore down one hill in order to gain impetus to carry us up the next.

We were almost pitched out by an abrupt stop at the celebrated "Pierre Tremblante," and shocked our young driver by declining to alight and move it. We next turned aside to see a Menhir, and found it a much more beautiful object than we expected. It is an immense upright stone, roughly conical in shape, surmounted by a small stone cross, doubtless the attempt of some good Christian to neutralise the enchantments of a bygone age. On such a day there was nothing menacing or forbidding about this prehistoric relic; its colour was delicate grey, embroidered with white, yellow, and orange lichen. It stood surrounded by gorse and bell-heather in a veritable "Field of the Cloth of Gold." A clump of trees stood near, and in the distance stretched line after line of tree-covered hills.

The good roads in France make driving pleasant. It is true they are generally very straight, but in Brittany they seem never to be bordered with poplars, but generally with hedges, in which the richest and ripest blackberries hang in tantalizing profusion. The natives seldom consider them fit for food. We arrived at Pont Aven about twelve o'clock, and took up our quarters in the Hotel des Voyageurs, kept by Mademoiselle Julie Guillon. A great disappointment awaited us. A "pardon," which we would have given a good deal to see, was just over. For obvious reasons landlords in other places do not tell strangers when these village gatherings are likely to take place, and so we had understood that all of them were over. I afterwards ascertained the approximate date of one or two.

The Pardon of St. Barbe and Faut—last Sunday in June.

The Pardon des Oiseaux, Quimperlé—White Monday.

The Pardon de Notre Dame de l'Henriot, on the seacoast—8th September.

The Pardon Pont Aven—Sunday and Monday near 21st and 22nd September.

The Pardon des Fleurs—1st May.

Some of these pardons have a religious character, while others are evidently a survival of ancient heathen rites. The day ends with dancing and merrymaking. It is the best time to see the endless variety of Breton costumes, many of which have been handed down for generations.

BEFORE AND -BEHIND THE COUNTER.

BY MEDICUS.

ONE day last summer my Newfoundland dog and I were on the beach at Eastbourne doing nothing, and doing it well, when two young ladies passed near us. They were both faultlessly dressed, and both were good-looking. But as well-dressed beautiful girls are by no means rare aves at this delightful watering-place, neither Bob nor I would have thought twice about them, had it not been for a certain remark we heard one make. Now Bob is one of the most polite dogs that ever swam—and so am I; so it is almost needless to say we were not listening to the young ladies' conversation. The words were borne along towards us, borne along on a zephyr, let us say.

"Poor dear aunt! she has such droll ways, and so many funny fads!"

"'Fads' is slang, isn't it, master?" said Bob.

"Yes, Bob," I replied, "'fads' is slang."

The honest dog and I now sat down among the shingle to consider the derivation of the word "fad."

"It is not English you know, Bob," I said; "although there is an obsolete old verb 'to fadde,' meaning 'to trifle.'"

"No," assented Bob, shaking his wise, black head. "It is not English, and it is not Newfoundlandese. At all events, I have never heard the fisher folks of St. John's make use of any such expression. I fear we'll have to fall back upon French, master."

"Good idea, Bob," I cried. "Let us fall back upon French. Now there is 'fadaise,' for instance."

"'Fadaise!' The very word, master. 'Fadaise' means 'foolery,' and most fads are foolery. And now, master, I'm off for a swim. That's my fad. Won't you come?"

I did not accept the dog's invitation, but continued sitting on the stones—thinking.

Some of the thoughts I thought while sitting on the stones I embody in this paper.

I did not stop and wonder what particular form of fad or fadaise the young lady's dear aunt was fond of faddling with. You see there are so many sorts that are highly popular. Some are called—satirically—manias. There are, for instance, the china-cupboard mania, the stamp mania, the album mania, the plaque-painting mania, the autographs-of-great-people mania, and a host of others. Some fads are styled hobbies, and many of these are really very useful, combining health, pleasure, and recreation all in one, and therefore tending to keep the possessors of such hobbies young, by banishing care, ennui, and wrinkles. When hobbies do actual good to others, without trespassing on their liberties of thought or action, they are much to be recommended.

As a medical man, I cannot even deny that so apparently silly a hobby as that of collecting samples of the postage stamps of various countries and kingdoms may not possess advantages of a hygienic nature, though gardening ranks high above it, and it is very unlikely indeed that a stamp maniac will ever become president of a republic.

But there are some funny fads in fashion nowadays that are extremely selfish, not to say sinful. I know some ladies whose great delight is to haunt sale rooms. They take a special delight even in reading the catalogue a day or two before, and are usually to be found well to the front in the auction room. They are not bargain hunters. They seldom buy anything except the merest trifle, but they are always there. Well, such a fad as this may be innocent enough. But what is to be said of ladies who make a hobby of house-hunting or apartment-seeking at any town or village where they may happen to reside for a time? It gives them pleasure—pleasure of the Paul Pry order—but it is pleasure at the expense of others.

The most selfish form of "fad" of all, however, is the shopping fad. It is also, unfortunately, the most common. If there be anything that it is possible to say in behalf of people guilty of this sin, it lies in the fact that, like cruelty to animals, the

"Evil is wrought

For want of thought."

At least, I am glad to think it is mostly so. This shopping hobby is a frailty which is peculiar to the female sex, and especially to that large section of it that has nothing to do and too much time to do it in.

I happened to be in a shop the other day where many ladies were being served. Though rather in a hurry—being a busy man—politeness made me wait, while curiosity bade me watch. A writer, you know, must study human nature in every phase and form. One lady who sat not far off had such piles of silks and velvets and books of patterns before her, that I naturally came to the conclusion her bill would presently amount to forty pounds at least. I should not have cared to wager which moved the faster, her tongue or her fingers.

"I don't think," she said at last, "I shall make up my mind to-day."

She then expressed a desire to purchase a yard or two of ribbon, to match the shade of a morsel she produced from her porte-monnaie. A tall, sedate-looking, and severely-genteel individual—I think they call him a shoplifter, or shopwalker, or something—then escorted her to another counter; and I may as well say here at once that half-an-hour after this I saw the lady languidly gathering herself away from that counter, which was heaped with drawers and boxes, having failed to match her morsel of ribbon. She no doubt went away to another shop, and had another pale-faced lassie to pull the shelves and piles to pieces in order to amuse her.

It was a downright relief to my feelings to notice the dispatch with which a farmer's wife—at least she looked so—did her business not far off. She was buying blankets, rugs, sheeting, and flannels. There was no inanity and no vanity about this honest lady, and I do not believe she asked the shopman one single silly question, nor spoke at all for speaking's sake.

Having business in the carpet department, I noticed the same sort of cruel trifling going on here. Two ladies were seated at their ease, while a young Scotchman, as tall and strong as a brewer's drayman, but perspiring nevertheless, was tossing about huge drums of carpet, and displaying them in a most artistic way for their delectation. Did they buy anything? Oh, yes; at last they did—to wit, three yards of linoleum, and during the time they took to make up their minds about this, a man of ordinary taste could have selected carpets for every saloon in the steamship City of York.

It is really no exaggeration to say that this shopping hobby has of recent years become a very serious evil in this country, and ladies who adopt it are not only obstructionists from a business point of view, but are guilty of doing immeasurable mischief to thousands upon thousands of their sisters who have to slave behind counters to serve them.

It may be said that my sympathies are with the shopgirls. This would be true enough, although, on the other hand, I pity from my very soul those who can find no better way of passing their time than pretending to shop.

Many ladies, no doubt, find that to enter a large shop, and have young men and women to dance attendance on them while they leisurely examine "pieces," is somewhat of a relief to the irksomeness of their lives. But surely if they chose they could find a hundred better ways of passing the time than this. No? Well, I have no desire to pose as a society reformer, but as a medical man, I am bound to say that no more unhealthy hobby could be found than that in question. A lady, unless she happens to belong to the wealthier circles, has to walk around while engaged during a forenoon's shopping. Now ordinary brisk walking is one of the most useful forms of exercise there is; it strengthens every muscle of the body, including the heart, it influences the secretions of every vital organ, and secures for the fair pedestrian good appetite and refreshing sleep at night. It does more; it banishes ennui by relieving the brain of over-abundant blood. The vital fluid is withdrawn from the head towards the moving muscles, hence congestion is quite done away with, and aches of all kinds, and even weariness of mind as well as body, become things of the past. On the other hand, the shopping-walk is nothing better than a wearisome, stagnating, unwholesome saunter. The blood at no time flows briskly on; it depends towards the extremities from the mere force of gravity, causing a tendency to varicose veins, and trouble of a far more dangerous character. It is dammed up in the brain, so that headache is aggravated, instead of being relieved, and in consequence the lady returns home, as a rule, languid and over-fatigued, and usually as cross as a baby cutting a tooth. It is not the sauntering round the streets, or the dawdling by shop windows, that has caused all this fatigue of limbs and brain, but the breathing of air impregnated with poisons of all kinds, while bending over goods in shops. Indeed, there is no sort of emporium which I can at present call to mind half so much laden with—to give it a plain name—bad air as a draper's shop. It may be lofty and spacious and well-ventilated, but it is, nevertheless, filled from floor to ceiling with an obnoxious though microscopic dust of animal and vegetable fibre. To spend hours in such a place, as some ladies do, is to expose health and nerves to far greater danger and strain than most people have any conception of. It would be very easy for me to bring both chemistry and physiology to bear me out in what I say, but if I did I should have to state the case in language so plainly graphic that I might well be put down as an alarmist.

I hope as it is I have said enough to cause some people to consider whether there may not be better and more healthful ways of spending a forenoon than in shopping so-called. At all events after reading this they need be at no loss to account for the general lassitude, loss of appetite, nervousness, insomnia, and probably dull, stupid headache from which they are apt to suffer after a day spent in the pleasant indulgence of their favourite "fad."

But if hours spent in shops has a degenerating effect upon those before the counter, what about those behind it? Well, simply this: there are few occupations in life more enervating than that of the shop assistant. The lady before the counter can sit all the time, and she has a certain amount of pleasurable excitement, which makes the time seem short. The girl behind the counter has all the weary heart-dragging strain. Comparatively speaking, the exercise she must take in moving about in reaching and stretching and putting her body into unnatural positions is more tiring to her than is the treadmill to the convict, and rest she has none, unless standing on one leg to relieve the other means rest. Nor is her mental condition while serving one to be envied; she must smile and look pleasant whether she feels so or not; she must assume an interest she does not possess; she must lay herself out to please not only the probable customer, but the proprietor of the shop or store. His hawk-eye is ever on her or her doings, and on his favourable impression depends her little all of present comfort and happiness in life. It is just a question, by the way, whether it might not be for the interests of masters of such establishments to be a little less exacting and tyrannical in their bearing towards their shop assistants than they generally are. Luckily for themselves the latter are for the most part young, and therefore can bear a deal of hardship. But though young they are not invariably constitutionally strong, and very many of them break down just at the time when their prospects are of the brightest. Although the position of shop assistant is one which offers a semi-genteel career for the daughters of thousands of the poorer middle class, still parents would do well to note whether their girls are strong enough to bear the continued strain of such a business before permitting them to enter thereon. If a girl has any weakness of the chest or any internal organ, whether inherited or acquired, it is almost certain to develop itself behind a draper's counter. The telegraph office would give her a far greater chance of life and health, or a clerkship of almost any kind, while a situation which would necessitate her being much in the open air would give her the best chance of all.

A girl who means to go behind a counter must have a good supply of pure blood to begin with, for depend upon it she will soon need it all. She should have blood enough to well tinge both her lips and gums and mantle in her cheeks; she should be of good firm flesh, and in habit a hearty breakfast eater. To place a young girl who does not feel fresh and buoyant first thing in the morning, or who has to dawdle over her breakfast, behind the draper's counter, is quite as great a sin as to throw a person into deep water who had never learned to swim. The latter has quite as good a chance of life as the former.

But for many girls who shall read this paper of mine the die is already cast, their lines in life are already laid, and they must walk thereby. Well, I do not wish to make such discontented with their situations; but I should be doing less than my duty did I not warn them against being careless of their general health.

Recreation is what they need above all things, and their lives should be regulated by the laws of health. They may think they get enough exercise all day, but it is not life-giving exercise. The tiredness which it creates is not natural, nor does it conduce to healthful sleep. A good brisk walk will tend to banish this shop-weariness and restore the proper circulation through the brain. A cold sponge bath in the morning and an occasional warm bath at night, if taken regularly, often acts like a charm in restoring and toning all the vital functions. Good, wholesome diet taken at regular hours day after day is the mainstay of the mental and bodily system.

Medicine should be avoided unless specially ordered by a properly qualified medical man.

Let me tell shopgirls then, in conclusion, that if they suffer at all from nervousness, backache, headache, and weariness, or are too easily fatigued, they should not lose a day in adopting a better system of living. They must not do this half-heartedly, but determinedly. Good habits soon become second nature, and if they conduce to entire health and happiness, surely they bring a great reward.

To ladies who take delight in shopping, I can say little more than I have done. But very much happier, indeed, would the lives of shop assistants be, if lady customers only did their business in a more business-like way, while on the other hand the ladies themselves would be the gainers in time and health.

SUNSHINE AFTER RAIN.

By LADY WILLIAM LENNOX.

CHAPTER II.

OF all the girls who became, from the causes mentioned in the last chapter, friends as well as pupils of Bessie McBain, there was not one, perhaps, with whom a closer bond of intimacy had been formed than Kitty McGowan. Possibly the great contrast in their natures had something to do with this, for although a certain amount of similarity in tastes and dispositions is generally supposed to be essential to the happiness of any two persons who are thrown much together, yet there is no doubt but that people with characters the most opposed do take a great liking for each other, a liking, too, which does not pass off, but is abiding; and therefore we must conclude that there is an attraction to us in qualities seen in others, but in which we ourselves are deficient, that draw us to them instead of having the contrary effect. However this may be, the fact is certain that the minister's daughter, just and equal though she was as to all outward appearance, never favouring one of the girls more than another, did nevertheless feel a stronger affection for Kitty McGowan than for any other member of what she jokingly called her "family." On Kitty's side this affection was returned with full measure, and taking its colour, as must always be, from her own individual character, it was more demonstrative, and in a sense violent, than Bessie's calm, placid nature admitted of in her own case. The two girls were as great contrasts in their looks as in their minds. The one, tall, slight, and very fair, with a colour like a wild rose, and large soft grey eyes, seemed always more fragile when she stood beside Kitty, no taller than she, but cast in a much firmer mould and looking nearly the same age, though Bessie was senior by about six years. Kitty's eyes were grey, too, but considerably darker than her friend's, and her brown hair fell short and curly round her neck till she was seventeen, when her grandmother insisted on its being done up and made tidy; so it was fastened in a knot at the back of her head. But no amount of combing and brushing would prevent a sort of halo of curling hair, which refused to "go smooth," and, in fact, looked pretty in the sunshine, but decidedly unruly by the side of the long coils, like pale silkworms' silk, which adorned the head of "Miss Bessie."

"Awel, awel," said Mrs. McGowan, sometimes, "I ken ye canna mak some folk like ither folk; it's just like the trees and the flowers; and so I must e'en put up wi' Kitty's locks, though they're no to my mind exactly."

The girl's "tempestuous hair," as she called it herself, was of a piece with her tempestuous character, as was the mobile and sensitive mouth, and also the nose, with nostrils which dilated under any strong emotion, so that Bessie used to say she had only to look at Kitty's nose to see whether she were pleased at anything agreeable, or furious about anything disagreeable. Quick-tempered and impulsive, she had the faults and virtues which so often go with that class of character, as well as the advantages and disadvantages which as a rule go with it also; among the first being a keenness of feeling which enables the possessor to enjoy anything to the utmost, and among the latter the natural consequence—namely, being able or rather compelled to suffer pain to the utmost.

"I don't know how it is, Miss Bessie," said Kitty, one day, "but you always seem so much the same; always so kind, and never cross or miserable, as I am sometimes. All the years I have known you you have hardly ever changed, and I know the other girls think the same."

"Well," said Bessie, "I can't explain it—unless it is my nature. That is really the reason. You know I am not a person to imagine things, or even wish much for anything I have not got. I think I am of what people call a happy disposition, and enjoy just what comes."

"Yes, I suppose that is it," said Kitty, thoughtfully. "Of course people can't help their natures, can they? I know what you are going to say," she went on, as Bessie was about to speak. "You mean that if we look for help in the right direction, we shall get it, and be made less stormy and disagreeable."

"You need not say disagreeable, dear," and Bessie laid her hand on Kitty's arm, "for that you never are, to me at least. But perhaps sometimes your grandmother may wish that you were more quiet and happy in your life as it is, and for your own sake I should like to throw a little oil upon your disposition," and she laughed. "Just as, very likely, you would like to put a little more fire into mine."

"No, no, dearest Miss Bessie. I could not bear you to alter at all. When I come up here and see you and have a talk, as I am doing now, I feel ever so much better for it after. I am like a rough sea, I think, and you do throw oil upon the waves. I often go and sit close to the Dee—you know how near it runs just at the bottom of our garden—and there are stones there like a beach, and the sound of the waves as I sit there—I don't know how it is, but I seem to dream, and fancy things, all sorts of things, till I get quite in a maze, but happy then; and after, when I have to get up and go through the garden to have tea—well, it's very wicked, I'm afraid, but it all seems so dull, and the same every day. I wish grandmother would let me go to Edinburgh."

"To Edinburgh. Why?"

"Only just for a little while," said Kitty. "I might go into a shop or something and see people. You see, Miss Bessie, except you there is nobody ever to see here. Grannie has two old women and one old man who come sometimes, and of course I know the girls at the school, but lots of them go away to places; not that I should like service, perhaps; but at any rate they go, and two of them who left last winter are married now."

"Are they?" asked Bessie; "which two? But of course I know. I had a letter from Maggie, telling me, and from what she said I should think both she and Jean had been sensible, and found really good husbands."

"They are well-to-do," said Kitty, "and steady, I believe, and the girls are much happier now than they were when they lived here."

Bessie smiled.

"Well, it's early days yet, you know; not but what I hope and believe they will go on being happy; but though I have never been out in the world at all myself, I always have a feeling that any circumstances, however bright they look outside, are sure to have some sort of drawback. One reason why I fancy this is because it seems to me that if we were allowed perfect happiness in this world we should never think about another."

These sorts of conversations took place time after time, Bessie's patience never seeming to tire, and Kitty's ideas being ventilated in a way that was good for her. She used to say it "took the cobwebs out of her brain" to have a chat with her friend; and so things went on, both girls leading lives of more or less routine, and having but little pleasure or excitements, except what they drew from their own resources. When Kitty was eighteen, however, and Bessie close upon twenty-four, a change happened of great importance to at least one of them, as it was the marriage of the latter to a young minister who often helped her father with his duties.

Robert Forbes was his name, and he was so perfectly suited to Bessie that the young couple started in life with that good prospect of happiness which comes from a sympathetic understanding of another's character. As for money, they had not a great deal certainly, but Mr. Forbes possessed a small private fortune, left him by his father; and Bessie, being an only child, must eventually come into whatever her father and mother had to leave. For the present it was settled for them to live in the Manse, chiefly because of Mrs. McBain's health, which made it almost essential that she should not lose her daughter's care and companionship; and the girl herself was so devoted to both her parents that she was well pleased at the arrangement, especially as Robert had no objection whatever to it, and only thought it a reasonable and proper one, all circumstances considered. The engagement between him and Bessie was not a long one, for there was nothing to wait for; and one fine morning they stood in the little church, in the sunshine, and were married; Bessie looking very pretty in her simple white dress and bonnet, with her pale golden hair showing below the brim, and her grey eyes softer than ever from happiness, which also deepened the rose-flush on her cheek. Then there was a quiet luncheon at the Manse, and Mr. and Mrs. Forbes started on a fortnight's honeymoon, Bessie wearing as her travelling-dress a light grey cashmere, and straw bonnet of the same shade, with a trail of pink roses. Nobody cried, for were they not coming back in a short two weeks' time, to take up their abode in the old Manse again? and meanwhile Kitty had promised to do all in her power to supply her friend's place, so far as reading to or waiting upon Mrs. McBain went.

Consequently, as soon as the wedding party had left she set to work to make things look straight and comfortable again, pushing back the chairs and tables into their usual places—for the servants had plenty to do clearing away the luncheon, and so on—and making herself generally useful.

Mrs. McBain thanked her over and over again, and said what a comfort it was to have her about now Bessie was gone; and she found, as days went on and she got accustomed to the ways at the Manse, that her work there grew more pleasant, or perhaps it ought to be said less burdensome, for Kitty was not by nature fitted for any office requiring much patience and a constant looking out for signs which would tell her what was wanted.

She was capable of great usefulness and self-denial about large things, but "The daily round, the common task," from its very smallness and absence of excitement, tried her powers of endurance, whether in the cottage, where her grandmother, though not exactly ailing, was certainly fidgety, or in the Manse, where poor Mrs. McBain perpetually wanted a book brought, or her needle threaded, or scissors picked up from the floor, or a new bit of ribbon to make a collar for the cat; or, in fact, a thousand-and-one things which Bessie had always done for her, and from natural affection and evenness of temper had never felt to be a trouble.

Kitty was the exact converse of all this, but nevertheless she did her duty, as she had made it one, by her promise to Bessie, and by degrees it became easier; and she realised the satisfaction, moreover, of feeling she was of use and a comfort to someone. Her grandmother was of a rather hard, self-contained nature. It was very seldom that she expressed any pleasure in Kitty's society, so that the outspoken thanks by which her efforts to please Mrs. McBain were rewarded, were as new to her as they were welcome, and often quite repaid her for her unwonted care and patience.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER VI.

EVE's tears were very near the surface that day, and no sooner was she safely at home than she sank on to the first chair, and throwing off her hat burst out crying, much to the distress of Noah, who had been sleeping in his chair by the fire, while his wife was engaged in a ceremony daily performed by her about this time of day, and characterised as "cleaning herself."

"My dear child! what's the matter now?" exclaimed Mrs. Oldman, appearing in the doorway, while Noah rose and stood over his daughter, stroking her pretty wreaths of red-brown hair.

"I wish they'd leave me alone, they are all so silly. I wish there were no men except father," sobbed Eve.

"Well, if that is all you have to cry for, pray keep your tears for a better sorrow; we all know the men are idiots, though it is the women that make them so, but they aren't worth crying over, that is very certain. I suppose Jack Farrar has been making love to you, that is about the truth of it, and his love-making didn't please your ladyship," suggested Mrs. Oldman, who was intensely curious to know what had happened.

"They none of them please me with their nonsense, except Adam Day, and he never----" began Eve, through her sobs, but her sentence was never finished, for as she spoke Adam, by one of those inexplicable but oft-occurring coincidences, stood in the doorway.

"Come in, Adam; we don't mind an old friend like you, and you have heard of our trouble about the net, no doubt," said Noah, as Adam hesitated to come in. Eve didn't choose Adam to see her tear-stained face, so she retreated into her own little room, leaving Noah to explain her tears as he saw fit; but Adam had seen Jack Farrar outside, looking as black as thunder as he was returning to his wherry, and he drew his own conclusions, which were very near the truth, and turned the conversation on to the eel-net.

"It is a bad business, I am afraid, and the worst of it is I don't see what is to be done," said Adam, when he had heard the story.

"There is nothing to be done, except for me to pay the fine, and there is an end of it," said Noah, cheerfully.

"I fear not; I am very much afraid it is only the beginning; but let us be off to the decoy, and we'll go on to the club; perhaps we may learn something there."

The club that Adam spoke of was a working men's reading-room and institute at Fordham, a little town the other side of Windham Broad, about three miles from Noah's ark; it was frequented by most of the broadmen living in the adjacent villages; wherry-men and eel-men and a few tradesmen also visited it.

Noah was perhaps the most popular, as he certainly was the best respected member of this club, and Adam, though a rare, was a very welcome attendant, for the broadmen were all very proud of their rising young friend, who had already risen above their level; and if their prophecies were to be realised, would live to be a gentleman by position and education, if not by birth. Until the arrival of Noah and Adam, a lively conversation had been going on among the dozen men who were present about the net which had been found on Noah's eel-set, and its seizure by the police, an account of which had been given them by Jack Farrar, who was present. But no sooner did Noah and Adam enter than a sudden silence fell upon the room, and everyone seemed to be absorbed in his paper, except Farrar, who sat sulkily smoking and drinking more beer than was good for him, to drown his disappointment.

"Good evening, my friends," said Noah, as usual, but to his amazement no one answered, and Adam's careless "Good-evening" only met with a cold reply.

In a moment Noah grasped the situation; the news of his trouble had evidently reached the club, and the men had decided he was guilty; and in the face of such circumstantial evidence Noah could not blame them, although, as he had been a trusted friend of many for the last forty years, he was hurt, and inwardly thought they might have waited till they had heard his defence before they judged him. The silence was an awkward one, but Noah was not outwardly one whit disconcerted by it; he took up a paper, and moving to his usual seat called for some tea, and began to read, looking so calm and dignified that any stranger would have once declined to believe that that grand-looking man, with his clear, truthful, blue eyes, his long white beard, which gave him a patriarchal appearance, and the undefinable air of holiness which surrounded him, could have been guilty of any dishonourable action.

By degrees the conversation was resumed, at first in under-tones, but neither Noah nor Adam attempted to take any part in it, and after about an hour Noah rose to go home.

"I'll follow you in a few minutes. I want to have a few words with our friends here, first," said Adam.

Noah smiled, a warning smile, which seemed to say, "Be moderate, for after all what does it matter?" and then filling his pipe he went out, looking a great deal more dignified than his self-appointed judges.

"And now, my friends," said Adam, "you have seen fit to decide that Mr. Oldman is guilty of using the prohibited net found on his set last night. Allow me to tell you I know for a positive fact he is innocent. That net must have been set at low water, or it never would have been so full as it was at midnight, though only a one-inch mesh; and I can prove that Noah was with me, first at our decoy, and then at my house from six till nearly ten last evening. More than that I am not at liberty to tell you, nor is it necessary, for if you can suspect him it is not likely you'll believe me; but until an apology is offered to Mr. Oldman for your conduct this evening, I shall not enter this room again, and I am quite sure of this, Mr. Leicester will not either."

And with this Adam left the room, for the men were too much taken aback to make any reply, and he walked quickly after Noah, whom he soon overtook.

"We may thank Jack Farrar for this. He and Eve had had some words to-day, I expect, and seeing me come to the ark didn't improve his jealous temper, so he came down here, and no doubt gave a garbled version of the whole affair; and is probably telling those stupid fellows at this moment that I was in league with you," said Adam.

"Never mind, Adam, my lad. I must just live it down; it is a trial the Lord has sent me, and I must be patient.

Look there, who can think of such a trifle as this in the face of a grand sight like that?" said Noah, pointing to the sunset.

Norfolk, like most flat countries, is noted for its sunsets, and that particular three-cornered portion which forms the district of the broads is specially famous in this respect. In autumn the finest sunsets are seen, but the one to which Noah drew Adam's attention on this May evening was a grand sight. The whole western sky was a blaze of crimson and gold, streaked with bands of purple cloud, and underneath lay the shallow waters of the broad, reflecting the colours of the sky as the soul of a man gives back the thought of his friend. As far as eye could reach over silver broad and shining river, green pastures and watery marsh, the warm glow of the setting sun was spread, as though he were loth to leave them, and this was his parting embrace. The village of Windham on the other side of the broad, with its little church and spire; the marshmen's cottages; the rectory-house in its grove of poplars, with their delicate new blue-green leaves; the little white windmills which were dotted about the marshlands—all were glorified by the golden light of the setting sun.

"There is many a lesson to be learnt from Nature, Adam, isn't there? The sunlight now is like the love of God—it shines alike on all; but whereas all Nature is grateful and reflects back his light, human nature is cold and ungrateful, and does not respond to the love of God, or if it does, only feebly," said Noah, as he stood gazing at the scene before him, apparently quite forgetful of the unkindness he had just met with.

"Yes, I often think what a lesson in cheerfulness and contentment Nature teaches us. Look at the dumb animals now—how happy they always seem; and the birds seem as if they could not contain themselves for joy; it is only man who gets depressed and miserable, and yet our worst troubles pass away almost as quickly as the sunset glow fades from the sky," said Adam.

"Ah, but we are all given to look at our troubles through the microscope, so to speak; we exaggerate the things of time, and our poor little finite minds are not big enough to grasp the things of eternity. I often think that 'the secret of the Lord' is to look at things from His standpoint, as far as we can, and not from our own; they look so different then."

They had reached the borders of the broad by now, and hastened to get across so that Adam might help Noah to set his net before the tide turned; and as it was nearly high water, they walked quickly on landing, and had nearly reached the ark when they met Mr. Arthur Clifford, now a handsome young fellow a year or two younger than Adam. He was in a great hurry and did not stop to speak; in fact, he appeared anxious to avoid Noah and Adam, and put out at meeting them.

"What can Mr. Arthur be doing down here at this time, I wonder? He seemed to come from our place," said Noah.

"No good, I am afraid," said Adam, gravely; but if he knew more of Arthur Clifford's movements than his companion he did not say so.

On the following Monday morning a very unusual visitor came to the ark—the postman, and what was still more unusual, he brought a registered letter for Noah—the first he had ever received in his life.

"A registered letter for your father! It has something to do with this here eel-net business, you may be sure then," said Mrs. Oldman to Eve, who looked pale and nervous.

But when Noah came in and opened the envelope, it was found to contain nothing but a five-pound note; not a line, not a word accompanied it, and where it came from Noah no more knew than a new-born babe, as his wife remarked. The post-mark was Norwich, but that was no clue, as Noah knew no one in Norwich in the least likely to send him a five-pound note.

"Do you think, now, Noah, it was Miss Grace sent it to pay your fine with?" suggested Mrs. Oldman.

"No, I don't. If Miss Grace had wished to pay the fine she'd have given me the money straight away, but she knows well enough I would not have taken it from her; it ain't Mr. Leicester either, for he does not believe they'll fine me; however, we shall never know who it was, I suppose, but it'll save me drawing any out of the savings bank to pay the fine to-morrow."

Eve took no part in the discussion about the money, and seemed glad when it was dropped; she was not herself either that day or the next, and cried and clung to Noah when he started for Fordham, where the magistrates were sitting, and could settle to nothing while he was gone, but wandered about like a restless spirit, and yet would not take her mother's advice, and go and meet him when he might be expected to return.

"I can't make the child out lately; 'tain't all her father's net that is worrying her, and it ain't Jack Farrar either, and I am certain it ain't Adam; there is no more between her and him than there is between him and me, or between that white drake and the little bantam," said Mrs. Oldman to herself, as she gave her fowls their supper.

"It struck me too she knew something about that five-pound note this morning by her manner, but if I was to say so to Noah he'd scold me for harsh judging; there never was such an unsuspicious man as he is, and lucky for me he is, for if ever he were to guess—but there, he'll never know that, so what's the use of thinking about it? It would be a bad day for me indeed if he did, that's certain; but here he comes, so I'll go and hear what has happened," she said to herself, as Noah was seen approaching the ark.

Noah was tired and hungry, for he had missed his dinner, but he was in very good spirits, for though he had been fined, the bench had told him they were sure he was innocent, though the fact that the net was his own, and was found on his eel-set, gave them no alternative but to fine him, and they hoped the author of so costly a joke would be discovered.

PIANOFORTE DUETS AND PIANOFORTE DUET PLAYING.

SONATAS.

IN my first article I referred generally to the duets left us by the old masters; it will now be my duty to give some account of the modern sonata duets. I shall also make a few remarks on some duets by old masters that were simply touched upon in my last article.

To commence with the earlier, Clementi is undoubtedly entitled to great consideration, for he wrote no less than seven sonata duets. Exceedingly melodious, with highly interesting counterpoint, they present, with a very small degree of difficulty, a great amount of musical genius. The number of chord passages is very limited, but, nevertheless, the sonority produced is marvellous, especially considering the comparative weakness of the instrument he had to write for.

In an interesting account of a dinner given to him at the Albion Hotel, on December 17th, 1827 (when he played in public, absolutely, I believe, for the last time), I read that a sonata duet of his (op. 14, in E flat) (No. 5 of the complete edition, published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel) was played by Moscheles and J. B. Cramer.

Four of these duets are published in the popular Peters edition; but I should advise anyone desirous of playing these charming compositions, to get the complete edition published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel in the "People's Edition," at a cost of 1s. 6d. or thereabouts.

I referred to Onslow in my first article. He wrote two most characteristic and charming sonatas in duet form.

The first, in E minor, contains a romance and finale that cannot be surpassed for graceful melody and bright contrapuntal writing. Here again the degree of difficulty is very slight considering the effect produced.

This is a point on which great stress should be made, and I cannot help making a slight digression in order to emphasise the fact.

Naturally, the beginner wishes to obtain some pleasure from the art he is pursuing, and which he cannot obtain by his own unaided efforts; but let him get someone to play a duet of the simplest kind with him, and at once the effect is doubled by the mere commonsense fact that there are four hands on the piano instead of two.

To resume—Onslow's second duet (in F minor) is in a deeper and more original vein than the first. He works in the style of Mozart as far as the construction of his music, yet the style of melody is different; just as there is a difference of style of melody between Sterndale Bennett and Mendelssohn, while their construction is very nearly identical.

A greater degree of skill is required for the interpretation of this work.

These two sonatas are published in the Peters edition at a very low cost.

The Lachners—Franz, Ignazio, and Vincenzo—have contributed to art in this form, but I have only a sonata duet of Franz Lachner, op. 20, which is distinguished by a knowledge of the sonority of the piano and a skill in construction.

Friedrich Kiel has written two charming sonatas, which are also published in the Peters edition.

I come now to one of the greatest pianoforte sonata duets that has ever been written—a posthumous work by the much-lamented Hermann Goetz. It is numbered op. 17 and is in G minor. It is in three movements and an introduction.

This introduction is constructed upon a theme fugally treated, of a passionate nature, and is worked at some length in a dignified, sorrowing manner, running without pause into the first movement proper, the principal subject of which is constructed out of the first six or eight notes of the introductory theme.

The whole movement is conceived in a nobly dignified manner, and throughout the whole of the sonata there is not a bar which even borders on the commonplace. The second subject is of a melancholy, plaintive nature, commencing with a figure in the bass, which is imitated canonically (although not in strict canon) for some time.

The slow movement has a theme used alternatively, as subject and accompaniment, combined with a counter subject of a melodic nature.

The last movement has an introduction of the nature of a chorale, and is also of a plaintive character. Space forbids a most detailed criticism; but this work (scarcely known in England) has only to be played at the Popular Concerts in order to take a high rank.

Coming now to living writers, it may be supposed that there is not much material to work upon. Mr. E. Aguilar, the well known writer and teacher, has written one or two sonata duets, but I have not had the pleasure of hearing them.

Rubinstein has written one gigantic (I use the word advisedly) duet sonata. It lies before me now, and casually turning its leaves I find that it is sixty-three pages long—over thirty for each player.

I cannot, of course, go into details, but there is a scherzo which would tax the powers of great players, and altogether the work bristles with difficulties. It is not altogether inspired, but there are a good many moments of inspiration in it, and it is well worth the while of pianists to practise. It is published by Senff, of Leipzig.

In the same manner that a little boy reserves as a bonne bouche the piece of bread which has the most jam on it, I reserve for notice till last the sonata duets of Theodore Gouvy.

They are three in number—op. 36 in D minor, op. 49 in C minor, and op. 51 in F major (published by Reichault, of Paris). They are works that would tempt me to dilate upon at considerable length. I know of no composition in this form more charming. They are conceived in the most graceful melody, lucid construction, and resonant sonority. Not of great difficulty, they are, nevertheless, works requiring careful practice, and must be well studied and rehearsed before performance. They have afforded me the most unmitigated delight, and the first one I played was a charming surprise that I shall long remember. He has written also other duets of which I shall make mention in due course; but these sonatas form a group that would entitle any man to the rank of an original composer had he never written a note before or after. To most amateurs (and, indeed, to most professors in England) the name is a blank, but they will be richly repaid by investigating his compositions.

I must not omit to mention the grand sonata duet in E flat of Moscheles, a composition in his most melodious and original style.

I hope to continue in my next with "Duets (not sonatas) in Classic Form."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MARY S., and OTHERS.—At the present time a number of institutes in various parts of London connected with the Young Women's Christian Association are joining in a united movement for the promotion of evening educational classes. An endeavour is also being made to extend the movement to the provinces. The teaching provided will be thoroughly efficient. The classes will be open to all young women, and the fees will be extremely moderate, to bring them within reach of the largest number. Among the subjects to be taught will be included reading, writing, arithmetic, book-keeping, shorthand, French, music, dress-cutting, cookery, ambulance, nursing, etc. Already classes have been held at some institutes, with results that encourage the London council of the association to look forward hopefully to the success of this new forward movement. A list of London institutes where the classes are held will be furnished on application to the secretary, 16a, Old Cavendish Street, W., endorsed "Educational Classes."

C. J. A.—"Call us not weeds, we are flowers of the sea," was written by Eliza Cook, and will be found in her poems.

CURIOUS MEG.—Protestant Christians are far outnumbered, and so are the Roman Catholics and the Orthodox Greek Church, by the Buddhists and other Asiatic religions and Pagans. Of Buddhists there are more than of any other faith, for they number 360,000,000, the Protestants only 100,000,000.

BEL AIR.—California is very dear for both house-rent and living. Land is comparatively cheap; and an intending settler had better purchase a site and build a frame house for himself. If he should build it large enough to take in boarders, he might make a good deal of money. But we are not disposed to recommend emigration, excepting under specially advantageous circumstances.

M. F.—The announcement of what we call "Banns of Marriage" dates back to the times of the Primitive Christian Church; for this we have the authority of Tertullian. The practice was introduced into France in the ninth century. The earliest enactment in the English Church was promulgated A.D. 1200, and is to be found in the eleventh canon of the Synod of Westminster, which enjoins their being called three times. The 62nd canon of the Synod of London is still more explicit (A.D. 1603-4).

LOUISE.—Consult our indexes for the making of pot-pourri.

D. A.—To any ladies and respectable young women desiring to emigrate to Australia or New Zealand, we recommend an application to the Hon. Mrs. Toynce, head of the Girls' Friendly Society, for information and advice. Those who go out under Mrs. Toynce's auspices are placed under the charge of a chaperon provided by the Christian Knowledge Society, one who has had due experience of colonial life. Arrangements are made for their reception on arrival. Letters of introduction and testimonials are very desirable, in addition to any which the society may provide.

ONE WHO WANTS TO BE LOVED AND DIOGENES.—Put soup plates, or rather basins, containing beer, in the kitchen, and slips of card or laths of wood leading up to the brim as ladders. The beetles will walk up these and thus drown themselves in trying to reach the beer. In addition to this plan use Keating's insect powder very freely about the openings in skirting boards and grate, and you will get rid of the nuisance.

IDA.—We should advise you to take anything which you can get, for which your poor appetite has any inclination. You seem to be in a critical state, and were you able to take cod-liver oil, a teaspoonful at a time, it might be of service. Some can take it in very hot coffee, some in sardines at breakfast.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

TENNIS.—Miss Dod is at present our lawn tennis championess. You should not depend on a stray answer from us or any other editor as to the terms employed or the rules of the game. Procure, through any librarian, the latest manual issued, as both are multiplied, as a general rule, according to the popularity of the game. Such books are usually to be had for about a shilling.

EXCURSIONIST.—The gigantic equestrian figure cut in the turf, overlooking Weymouth, is that of George III. There are ten, if not more, remarkable monuments of this kind in England. The Wilmington Giant (Sussex Downs) is said to have been cut by Julius Caesar. The White Horse of Berkshire is attributed to King Arthur; the White Horse of Westbury, Wiltshire, commemorates a victory of King Alfred over the Danes, and was cut by him; and the White Cross of Whiteleaf, Bucks, was cut by his son, in memory of a victory gained by Edward the elder. The Red Horse on the Cotswolds commemorates the gallantry of the Earl of Warwick at Towton Heath, who slew his horse to share the same dangers as his soldiers. There are White Horses of Cherhill and of Alton Barnes, Wilts; and also of Kilburn, near Thirsk, of no historical nor antiquarian interest; and there is the Trendle Hill Giant, Dorset, of great antiquity, said to represent the Saxon god "Hiel." A famous book by Mr. Tom Hughes is called the "Scouring of the White Horse," relating to the revival and cleansing of that in Berkshire. Much pains are usually taken by the people near to keep the various figures distinct. The Wilmington giant has been outlined with either white tiles or white bricks to preserve it.

CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.—There are, doubtless, philanthropic institutions in all civilised countries, but we may confidently state that benevolence, as exhibited in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, is carried out on a far larger scale than in any country on the globe. The income of the parochial charities of the City of London alone is estimated at from £110,000 to £115,000 per annum; and the total yearly income of the 1,028 trusts of the City guilds or companies, over and above the parochial charities, amounts to about £185,820.

ARCHIE'S DARLING.—If you call a man by his Christian name, you might address him by it in writing. But how is it that you correspond with any man not a member of your own immediate family, to whom you are not engaged? It is an indiscreet proceeding.

"A MISSIONARY."—We do not think that any good result would follow from sending texts of the Bible to an Atheist. They would not meet his difficulties, as he does not admit their inspiration. Had you given your private address we might have sent you a book for him. The less you converse with such persons the better, you not being well instructed in the arguments to refute their statements.

HILDA M. M.—1. We read your letter with interest, and are gratified by your appreciation of our paper. We regret that there should be little or no demand for translations, as our magazines are over-stocked with original unpublished contributions; and unless scientific works, or those of research, our publishers are not very ready to accept them. 2. Your handwriting would be improved if a little rounder; it is too angular to be pretty and artistic, and you should make a decided difference between the "n" and the "u."

ANTIQUARY should make a solution of cyanide of potassium, half an ounce, in a wineglassful of water, and immerse the old sword or dagger in it for a few minutes. Then take it out and clean it with a paste composed of cyanide of potassium, Castile soap, whitening and water, mixed to the consistency of thick cream. This will move the rust effectually. To prevent any return of rust, brush the articles over with fine white varnish.

HOUSEKEEPER.—If you obtain some hay, sprinkle it with chloride of lime, and leave it in the room where the smell of paint is bad, and place a few basins of water there, the smell will be gone in a few hours.

HOPE.—We regret that we have no satisfactory recipe to give you respecting the excessive growth of hair on your arms. Wear tulle or lace sleeves to your evening dresses; or elbow sleeves with a deep fall of lace to the wrists, and bracelets or long gloves.

IVANHOE.—We do not, as a general rule, approve of cold baths. Sponge baths of cold water are usually preferable. You would require a still for manufacturing rose-water.

FREDERICK CROWDER.—Many thanks for your correction. The lines, "Now is the constant syllable clicking," are from "Of Today," in the "Proverbial Philosophy" of Martin F. Tupper, not by Dr. Parr.

SIX YORKSHIRE GIRLS.—Accept our very warm thanks for so kind a letter of acknowledgment of what trouble we may take for the benefit and pleasure of our girls. We hope our magazine may continue to earn your grateful appreciation. Accept our best wishes for your happiness and well-being.

SIXTEEN.—Any vow taken by a girl under age, and living in her father's house, we are distinctly told in the Old Testament (under the Law of Moses), is not binding unless taken with the perfect knowledge and consent of her father. It is wrong, in any case, to bind a young child of ten years old under any vow (indeed, there is no question of an infant in the case), as it has not come to years of discretion, and cannot estimate the difficulties that may try its steadfastness of purpose in mature life. Besides, the adult may see reason for deprecating a hard and fast rule of such a nature, and even regard it as unscriptural; and the exercise of the "right of private judgment" is a birthright with which those who take (and with equal right) a different view have no authority to interfere. So be at peace, and pray for Divine guidance now you are approaching an age to form an independent opinion. At five-and-twenty you will know better.

BRIGHTSIDE.—The origin of the "Dunmow Flitch of Bacon" is to be traced to the year 1111 A.D., when founded by a noble lady named Jurga. It fell into disuse, and was restored by Robert de Fitz Walter, A.D. 1241. The man claiming such a prize and distinction had to kneel on two stones at the church door, and swear that for twelve months and a day he had never had a quarrel with his wife, nor wished himself unmarried. Alas! between the years 1244 and 1772 there were only eight claimants!

PERSEAN'S MISTRESS has made a great mistake in letting her cat be so much out of doors. Perhaps sulphur powder might be of service. Better wash the cat well with soap and water, drying it very carefully, and rolling it in flannel. The presence of insects generally shows that the cat's health is affected.

S. E. R.—Chloride of lime with water is used to bleach flowers with, and would also answer for small bones of birds. If you have such a very strong taste for natural history, it would be better to get your parents to allow you to study it thoroughly and regularly. Women are at the present time making a profession of natural history, and their researches are most valuable, Miss Ormerod being a very celebrated authority on our insect plagues. Such studies and researches are not cruel; but everything can be conducted in an evil as well as in a good way. The taste for these particular studies is born in one; it is not acquired.

A WELSH GIRL.—Milk is called a perfect food, containing all the needful elements of nutrition. Bread, if all the wheat be ground up together, is also a perfect food; hence it is called the "staff of life." Meat, butter, sugar, and eggs are heat-giving elements. Salt is one of the mineral salts found in the blood. We are only able to give you a very general answer on a very large subject.

AYLESBURY.—We thank you for the description of your interesting ring you have given us; but it came too late to be named in our articles on "The Days of Chivalry." Only a few mottoes were given as specimens amongst a large collection. Your own, i.e., "God's Providence is our Inheritance" (engraved inside a massive plain gold ring, ploughed up in a field at Quainton Bucks thirty years ago), is a very nice one, and bears out the statement of the writer, that much religious feeling was evidenced in such mottoes.

SUSAN.—1. Your cow, if a fairly good one, and carefully attended to, ought to yield sufficient milk to make about six pounds of butter a week at least during the summer, and half that in the winter. Thus you may reckon on obtaining, on an average, above 200 pounds in the year. This allows between six weeks and two months of being dry before calving. 2. It is a vulgar habit to abbreviate words, and should be carefully avoided in writing to a stranger, or to anyone of superior position or more advanced age than yourself.

UNE PENSEE.—We regret that we are unable to give you any advice, as we fully approve of your mode of life in all respects save one, viz., you ought not to sleep with an invalid (we mean in the same bed). Your own health will become deteriorated and your nerve-power enfeebled.

ONE WHO WISHES TO HELP HERSELF does not appear to be one of those entitled to emigrate. She has her own sphere of duty here, it seems to us. She had better try to extend her dressmaking business, and take an apprentice or assistant. Emigration in the present day is not to be recommended where people have employment and duties in England.

GINGE had better write to the publisher, "G.O.P.," 56, Paternoster Row, E.C., and inquire about the volumes she needs. Some volumes are out of print, and can be got secondhand only. 2. You had better get the tulips in the bulbs for your window garden.

D. C. may, we think, follow the rules of his office, which are the laws of his country in this matter. Our Lord seems to have considered that necessary work must be performed.

VERA, DAISY JENKINS.—If you will take our advice you will draw up no law papers for yourself, nor for anyone else. Experience shows us that some of our first lawyers have failed in being lawyers to themselves; and you would find the same thing in your own case, and perhaps do the opposite of what you had intended.

JANEY.—The specimens of ferns and grasses which you have collected for decorating a screen should be carefully spread out and pressed between sheets of blotting paper, under a weight. Then cut a little strap, by means of two delicate incisions in the cardboard, on which the specimens are to be affixed; insert the thick end of the stems if too large for gumming; and employ a cement for the rest of gum tragacanth. To prepare this for use put a small piece into a wide-necked bottle filled with cold water, and it will swell very considerably, and absorb the water in a few hours. Then place the bottle in boiling water, and when it liquefies it will be ready for use.

MEMORY.—We see an announcement in the papers to the effect that the whole system of memorising, which has been taught in England by various masters, is about to be explained in a book published in Boston. A very excellent series has been recently given on the subject in the Exchange and Mart, office, 170, Strand, W.C. To ourselves personally, the value of such aids to memory seems to consist in your having enough memory to remember them. But we may be mistaken. Lack of attention and interest in your surroundings is a fruitful source of bad memories. This should be checked, and an alert, quick, bright manner acquired. These and thoughtfulness, and unselfishness for others, are great aids to a good memory.

CARLO.—We never encourage anyone to think of secretarships. They are extremely difficult to obtain, and need exceptional abilities also. Perhaps your failure to succeed in teaching meant that you had never learnt how to teach. If you studied book-keeping you might take a business situation in a shop; or perhaps you might like to go into a bookseller's or stationer's business, as being more quiet and suitable to your wants.

DAUGHTER OF ERIN.—The name "Ireland," or "Taren-land," signifies "Land of the West." The country, having been known to the ancients, has had many names at several periods. The Greeks called it Iuverna two centuries before Christ. Caesar called it Hibernia, the name given it by the Phenicians, meaning the "utmost or last habitation." Iris and Erin, as well as Hibernia, are derived from the same Celtic root. It began to be called Scotia towards the decline of the Roman Empire, and employed by the monastic writers until, in the 11th century, the ancient designation, Hibernia, returned to use. The ancient Celtic bard, Ossian, supposed to have been the son of Fingal, gives the original name as Iunisiail.

NELLO.—We are not acquainted with any Homes of Rest for girls in business in the localities you name. Perhaps one of those recently named in our answers to other correspondents may suit you.

"HALLOA, FARRAR! IT IS YOU, IS IT?"

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc.

DAY or two after Noah had been fined he received a visit from two men, one an eel-man like himself, the other a wherryman from the Broadmen's Club at Fordham. They came to apologise to Noah for the manner he had been treated on Saturday evening in the name of the club, and to beg he would think no more of it, but come as usual to the club. They had seen the report of the case in the local paper, and had almost unanimously come to the same conclusion as the magistrates, namely, that Noah was innocent; the only dissentient voice had been Jack Farrar's, and it was he who had in the first instance insinuated that he knew Noah to be guilty. A meeting had been held to discuss the matter on the previous evening, and the result was the visit of these two representatives, a visit Noah received most cordially, and promised to look in that night or the next on his way back from the decoy, and assured the delegates he fully forgave the unkindness which had been shown him.

He did not go that evening, because there was service at the church and a choir practice afterwards, which he had forgotten at the time; but the next evening he and Adam left the decoy earlier than usual to have more time in the reading-room. The room was as full as it had been on the previous Saturday evening, except Jack Farrar was absent, and Noah's reception this week was as cordial as it had been cold the week before; but the matter of the eel-net was not alluded to in his hearing, though Adam had learnt all that had passed in the club from one of the wherry-men present.

"They have had a row with Farrar; it seems he was very angry when he heard an apology had been sent to you, and after a good many high words, they told him he had better not show his face there again till he had made his peace with you, and was prepared to withdraw his accusation," said Adam, as he went home with Noah, having previously seen that his mother was settled off for the night.

"The truth is poor Farrar is so cut up because Eve has refused him, that he does not quite know what he is doing, I expect, though to go about slandering me is hardly the way to gain her affections. Don't mention it to her, Adam; the child hasn't seemed quite herself lately, and it would worry her."

"I shan't see her to-night; look, there is a light in her little room; she has gone to bed," said Adam, in a tone of annoyance.

"Well, we'll set the net and then go in and have some supper. This'll be almost the last time I shall set it till the autumn. I shall begin bobbing and spearing next week, and tickling for trout and tench."

The net was duly set, and then, as Mrs. Oldman was gone to bed as well as Eve, Noah fried some tench he had caught that day for supper, made a kettleful of tea, and the two friends sat down to their repast. They were very quiet in all their movements, and talked in undertones, because of the fish, for the net was set close to the ark, the door of which stood open, and Noah's keen ears were on the alert for the warning whistle of an approaching wherry all the time.

"Do you ever feel lonely as you are sitting up at night here listening for wherries?" asked Adam.

"No, my lad, never; for the simple reason that I never am alone; the Lord is always with me, and I am listening to His voice; for listening for wherries is such a mechanical thing with me, it never disturbs my thoughts. I should hear their whistle in my sleep. The Lord never seems nearer to me than in these night-watches of mine, unless it be when I kneel in church to receive the Holy Communion, and then I feel so united with Him, that to say I am in Him and He in me hardly expresses the closeness of that union."

"Father Noah, I have heard you speak of hearing the Lord, and of feeling His presence. Tell me, do you ever see Him?"

Noah hesitated a moment, and then he said, very reverently—

"My son, for you are a son to me, I suppose when we pray we all of us make a sort of picture in our mind of the Lord Jesus, and at times that picture is more vivid than at others. I think as I grow older it gets brighter and more distinct, but I can remember the time when it was only a faint outline, and now there are seasons when He seems to have enveloped Himself in a cloud which I cannot pierce; but faint as that vision, if I may call it so, may be, it is as real a presence to me as you are sitting there; and more real, for your spirit may be wandering as your body remains there, and it is the Spirit of the Lord which is with me."

"Why, Noah, you are a Platonist without knowing it. You have got hold of his doctrine of ideas, which is the centre of all his philosophy."

"Then it is the Lord who taught it me, not Plato, for I know nothing of his philosophy except what I have heard you say about it. But however that may be, my Saviour is a much more real person to me than you or any one else, though my idea of His person may be only a faint one; how can it be more when we are so weighed down with sin and the cares of this life? Besides, are we not told it is only the pure in heart who shall see God? Adam, I often think what a bribe this is to us men to be pure, even if the vision is not to be granted in this world, as of course it cannot be in all its fulness; but I believe if we were only pure enough to behold it, it would be granted us to a much greater extent than we have any idea of even in this world; and I believe it is granted us here in proportion to the purity of our hearts. There are people of whom one feels as sure they have caught a glimpse of the Lord's face as one feels of the purity of their lives. Look at Miss Grace, or her father; one feels sure they have been with the Lord and seen His face, for it is reflected in their own countenances."

And as Adam glanced at the noble face of his companion, with his clear blue eyes, and the serene calmness which was his most characteristic expression, he thought there could be little doubt the vision of the King in His beauty had already faintly dawned on him.

"The Lord is very near us, Adam; we are so apt to think of Him as far off in some other world which we call heaven, and which, I suppose, we picture to ourselves as a place up among the stars. I say up, but of course I know there is no up or down about it. Now my belief is, heaven is a state; it may be a place, too, I don't know, and I don't suppose the wisest man living can tell me, whether it is or not; but something which I can't doubt tells me that where the Lord is there is heaven, and when He is with me, as he is sometimes, I am in heaven, though my body may be sitting here watching my net, or kneeling in yonder church. I never think of the Lord as away in another world; I think of Him as near me, with me, as close to me as my carnal nature will allow Him to come, and that is a thousand times closer than you, my most intimate friend, can ever come to me. There is no union that can compare in closeness to the union of the soul with its God, its Maker, its Saviour, its Heavenly Guide. How rarely one man's spirit ever really touches his dearest friend's; how dreadfully few of our deepest thoughts can we ever share with our nearest and dearest; but to Him it is as easy as it is delightful to lay bare our inmost thoughts, thoughts often too deep for words. When I was a young man, Adam, I dreamt as you dream, and as most men and women have dreamt in their youth, that one day I should find a being with whom I could share my every thought, and so I have; but that Being is my Saviour, not the wife of my bosom, who was also the love of my life. The most intimate friends, the fondest lovers, can never make even a tithe of their thoughts known to each other. Our immortal spirits can never find that rest and sympathy, that intimate communing for which they crave, except in God; but I don't think we realise this in its fulness till love's young dream has been dreamt, and we wake to find ourselves face to face with the realities of our position. We crave for happiness, and we think or act as if we thought happiness was the end for which we were created. It isn't; God is the end for which we were created, and He brings happiness with Him, but we must find Him first."

Noah spoke slowly, and paused between his sentences, as he had a fashion of doing. Adam sometimes thought he was waiting for the words to be given him, and now he did not interrupt him, but sat thinking over what he had heard and perhaps questioning the truth of part of it, for he was young and had his dream of love like other men, and if he thought there was a young, pure spirit, an innocent girlish heart not a hundred miles off, with whom he could share all his thoughts, and in whom he could find the love and sympathy his soul craved for, who shall blame him?

"Tu-whit, tu-whoo, tu-whoo-oo," suddenly cried an owl, breaking the solemn stillness of the night outside and the sacred silence which had fallen on the two friends. The weird cry roused Noah from his meditation, and to Adam's surprise he rose quickly from his seat and went to the door, listening intently.

"It's only an owl," said Adam, surprised that such a practised ear as Noah's should not at once have recognised the cry to which he was well accustomed.

"I know, but it is a wherry as well, though it has not warned me," said Noah, anxiously, as he hurried out, followed by Adam, who seized the bull's-eye which stood lighted ready for an emergency.

They reached the water's edge just as a wherry sailed almost noiselessly past before they had time to lower the eel-net, which it plunged bodily through, tearing away five or six yards with it.

"Holloa, there! what are you about? Why didn't you whistle and warn me of your approach? Who are you? Are you asleep, or what do you mean tearing my net to pieces in this way?" exclaimed Noah, as he heard the net give way, before he had time to slacken it, for the wind was fresh, and the wherry sailed quickly.

No answer came from the wherry, but as Adam suddenly turned his bull's-eye on it, he distinctly saw Jack Farrar at the tiller of his cumbersome craft.

"Holloa, Farrar! it is you, is it? I see you plain enough to swear to you when Mr. Oldman summons you for malignantly and wilfully destroying his property," shouted Adam, angrily.

But the wherry sailed silently and majestically away, the owner not deigning to take any notice of either Adam or Noah, though had he played the same trick on any other eelman on the broads, the storm of oaths and curses which would have greeted him would have been returned with interest.

"It was Jack Farrar, the scoundrel! I should like to horsewhip him," said Adam, turning to Noah, who was hauling the end of his broken net out of the water, anxious to see what damage was done, and perhaps also anxious to let off some of the wrath he felt in action before he trusted himself to speak, for he had also recognised Farrar by the light of the lantern Adam turned on him.

"Did you see the graceless scamp, Father Noah?" continued Adam, bending over Noah, and holding the lantern for him.

"Yes, my boy, I saw him; I wish I hadn't, for I should have thought it was some wherryman who had been napping, but Farrar was wide awake enough, and I fear there is no doubt he did it on purpose. This is a bad night's work, indeed, worse than that of the one inch mesh. If Eve had refused Farrar before that happened, I should have thought now he had had something to do with that," said Noah, as, having hauled up one end of the net, he turned to his boat, which always stood moored close by, and pulled himself and Adam across the river to haul up the other end.

There were of course no eels caught that night, all having escaped when the net was broken, and this in itself was a loss of one or two pounds, for on a good night as many as twenty stone of fish are sometimes taken, but this is in the autumn when the catches are heavy, because the eels then move towards the mouth of the river. The catch on this night would probably have been much less than that, but the damage to the net was a much more serious matter, for when the men returned with the other end they found one-third of the net had been torn quite away, and it was not at all probable they would ever recover it.

"I could not get this net repaired under five or six pounds if I were to put it out, and even doing it myself it will cost me several pounds, to say nothing of the time it will take. I shan't do much more than have it ready by next October, working all my leisure hours at it," said Noah, as he and Adam threw the dripping, broken net ashore till daylight.

"I hope you'll prosecute Farrar," said Adam.

"No, my lad, no; I'll just forgive him. Poor fellow, he has done himself more harm by his spite than he has me."

"I expect he has; there is more than one wherryman will give him a thrashing for disgracing them by his conduct when they hear of it," said Adam.

Noah knew this to be true, for such a serious breach of the etiquette of the broads—for it was a point of honour among the wherryman to warn the eel-catchers of their approach—was not likely to go unpunished.

"But they need not hear of it, and it is far better that they should not. I shan't mention it at the club, and I would rather you did not, Adam. Of course the fact that the net was broken by a passing wherry must come out; my wife will tell that to everyone she sees, but neither she nor anyone else need know that the wherry was Jack Farrar's, and that he did it on purpose; you and I can keep that secret, can't we?"

"Yes, if you wish I will, certainly," said Adam, rather reluctantly, though he admired Noah for his clemency, and shortly after he went home to bed.

Adam Day's was not a happy home; his poor old mother, for whom he had willingly sacrificed some of the best years of his life, and counted it only his duty to do so, was cross and cantankerous and by no means grateful for the sacrifice. She would far rather Adam had remained an eelman, like his father, and was always reproaching him for not having done so. She did not hold with book-teaching, being no scholar herself, as she was wont to say, and though the school-house in which she lived with her son was a far more comfortable home than he could ever have given her had he remained an eel-catcher, she was always grumbling and complaining that the noise of the children coming in and out of the adjoining schools crazed her. Adam bore it all very patiently, knowing that as long as his mother lived here he must stay, although he was far too good a man for the post, and qualified for much higher work than teaching village boys. He had a real genius for teaching, and the dream of his life was to go to college and take his degree, which would qualify him for teaching in either private or public schools for boys of the middle and upper classes; but this was impossible in his mother's life-time; he could not leave her to keep his terms, nor would she ever allow him to throw up his certain work there for an uncertainty; still less could he take her with him to either Oxford or Cambridge. It was a great trial to Adam to be forced to go on with this drudgery, knowing his capacity for better work, especially as Mr. Leicester had more than once offered to advance him the money for his college expenses, feeling sure, as he did, Adam would have no difficulty in getting an assistant mastership in some school when once he had taken his degree, probably with honours; but there was no help for it; he could do nothing in his mother's lifetime; and Mr. Leicester, though regretting it almost more than Adam did, acknowledged he was right.

Mr. Leicester had been an excellent friend to Adam. Finding what an exceedingly clever boy he was, he had taught him Latin, Greek, and mathematics, but the boy soon outstripped his tutor, and though Adam constantly went to the rectory to read Greek with the rector, the latter had long ceased to be able to give him any help in his mathematical studies, in which Adam specially delighted. During these Greek readings Grace Leicester was always present, for her father liked to have her with him, and though he had such a high opinion of Adam's talents, it never occurred to him that Grace would ever look upon Adam as anything but the village school-master, who lived and moved and had his being in quite another sphere than that in which the Leicesters were born. And, indeed, Grace was as well aware of the difference in their positions as her father, or as Adam himself, who looked up to her as the most perfect type of womanhood he had ever seen; though that is not saying enough, for his acquaintance among the gentler sex was limited almost entirely to Eve and Grace. Suffice it to say, Adam worshipped Grace afar off, as Dante worshipped Beatrice; in her was realised his ideal of perfect maidenhood. The exquisite purity which seemed to cling to her as the dazzling robe of an angel; the gentleness which surrounded her and seemed to emanate from her as moonlight from the moon—a soft and subtle influence; the holiness which crowned her fair golden head with a gentle dignity, all placed her, in Adam's opinion, far above the rest of her sex. Eve Oldman was no doubt more beautiful, and, though only an eelman's daughter, attracted more attention from the gentlemen who visited the broads in their yachts, or who came on fishing excursions every year, than Grace Leicester, as Adam well knew. And it was to Eve Oldman that Adam was commonly supposed to be secretly engaged, for they were often together, though Noah was generally with them, and Eve persistently rejected all other suitors, though fortunately they usually managed to console themselves with another wife, instead of seeking revenge, like Jack Farrar.

As Noah had foreseen, Mrs. Oldman stopped the very first wherry that passed the next morning and told the owner of the accident to Noah's net the previous night, laying great stress on the fact that no whistle had been sounded; he told the next wherry he passed, and the event became a nine days' wonder in the neighbourhood, and it was soon known that all the wherrymen were of the opinion there had been foul play, and their suspicions rested on Jack Farrar, who received several broad hints to take care what he was about or he might find himself ducked in the Muck Fleet one fine day, not only for destroying Noah's net, but for setting the small mesh; for the general opinion now was that Farrar set that also; but this opinion neither Noah nor Adam shared.

Noah didn't believe it, because it occurred before Eve refused Farrar, and though it was well known the latter hated Adam, and looked on him as a most dangerous rival, and was also very angry with Noah for encouraging him, still it was incredible that he should play such a trick on Eve's father a few hours before he asked her to marry him.

Adam didn't believe that Farrar did it, for the simple reason that he knew quite another person was the culprit; but to explain who this was we must go back a little and begin a new chapter.

USEFUL HINTS.

KEEPING JAM.

For many years my jams never kept well; they either fermented or turned mouldy. My cooks in turn blamed the fruit, the place they were stored in, the sugar, etc., but did not for a moment imagine they could be in fault.

At last, wearied out, I determined to try myself, and see if I could not make jams and jellies that would at least keep a reasonable time.

I believe I have succeeded well in this rainy summer, and with delicate fruits such as strawberries, raspberries, etc.

The secret is never to leave the preserving-pan for one moment from the commencement of the proceedings, and not to skim the fruit.

I put as a rule one pound of sugar to each pound of fruit, and stir the mass well from the time it is put on the fire; as the scum rises, and when boiling has begun, I stir more vigorously. After a time the scum begins to boil itself clear. When quite clear, the jam thickens, and I then take the pan off the fire and put the jam into warmed jars.

All the jams I have made this way are bright and clear, and some of the fruit has been gathered on a damp day.

Red currant and raspberry jellies I have managed in the same way, and with the same satisfactory result. I never skim the jelly as the scum rises, but let it boil itself clear. I find fifty minutes or an hour ample time for preserving ten pounds of fruit; allowing twenty minutes for brisk boiling.

I have adopted this plan with an oil stove as well as an open fire. I need hardly say that by this method waste of any kind is avoided.

TO KEEP TARTS OR MEAT PIES HOT.

The present suggestion offered may not have occurred to some of our young cooks. Suppose you have another dish of the same size as that in which your tart or pie is made, take it and fill it about one-third full of water—I need hardly say hot water—and let your tart or pie rest over this until it is wanted, either on the top of the oven or inside. If mince, of course it must be watched to see that the crust does not take any hurt, but this will keep your fruit or meat quite hot without hurting your crust. It is much the same as the "bain marie" that is used on the top of the stove or hot plate to keep the various contents of the saucepans hot.

A USEFUL AND KINDLY WORD OF ADVICE TO GIRLS.

It is not generally known that a threading of cotton or silk elastic in the back of stays in place of the cord that is usually sold in them, is a great comfort and no little contribution to health. Ease of movement is what most people desire, yet few, perhaps, go the right way to secure it. I have worn elastic in my stays for many years and have found great advantage arise therefrom. I remember when first I bought it for the purpose, and mentioned it to the girl who served me, she laughed at the very idea. "Why, whenever you move," she said, "up and down, you will have your stays gaping open." "Exactly what I want," I said; and so my stays have gaped open for many years and will do so I trust to the end of my life. I have found comfort and ease therefrom, and advise others to try the same.

I should add, you may still have your dress moderately tight—the elastic will still do its work and make your figure the better.

RECIPE FOR REMOVING INK-STAINS FROM LINEN, &c.

If at hand, take a lemon, cut, and squeeze its juice at once upon the place stained; then rub with yellow soap, and rinse in cold water. The effect is almost magical, but the application should be instantaneous, for which purpose a lemon should be always kept in the house.

TYPES OF VIRTUE ; OR, IDEAL HEROINES OF ENGLISH WRITERS.

FILIAL OBEDIENCE.

FILIAL Obedience is in many respects quite a different kind of virtue from Patience. We might almost say it is natural to be dutiful to our parents, and unnatural to be patient. Don't be frightened, my readers, I have not said anything terrible; but we must consider this matter a little, and in order to do so will take an example—call her Lucy—and will give her an opportunity of exercising the virtues of Filial Obedience and Patience.

Lucy is a so-called good girl; I say "so-called," because outwardly she is quite a model to other girls; there is no naughtiness about her, her conduct is perfectly steady, and undoubtedly, in many ways, she is an uncommonly good girl. Her impulses are good, and she has had a careful training; that higher life, however, that taking to heart the truths of the Gospel which gives to those who wish and try to obtain it a magnificent motive for right, she knows little of.

Now, my readers, temptation assails the best of us, and how will Lucy withstand it? She is tempted to filial disobedience; her mother asks her to do something which is intensely disagreeable to her; it is not anything wrong, of course, but it rebels against her little pet fancies, puts a stop to her pet pleasures. It is a strong temptation; why should she not indulge in those pet fancies and pleasures? why not? Because her mother forbids her. Lucy thoroughly understands the upshot, and without thinking for a moment of her duty to God or the fifth commandment, overcomes the temptation and obeys; not because it is her duty to obey, but because the love she has for her mother is very great. In other words, it was natural for her to disobey, because her inclination would so lead her; but at the same time it was natural for her to love her mother, and thus a bad but natural impulse was overcome by a good but natural impulse.

Such a girl neither could nor would practise patience, at all events not a high form of it. Suppose, for instance, she was stricken down with illness; she might force herself to be calm because the doctor tells her she will not get well if she is not; but this is no virtue. Patience is essentially a virtue of the mind, and an extremely subtle one: so much so that though it does not do so, it occasionally appears to control a noble passion.

Filial obedience is a thoroughly natural virtue, and can be and sometimes is practised by people who are otherwise almost wholly bad. It springs at first from a feeling of weakness and reliance on those who are older and more experienced than ourselves, and afterwards it is kept alive by love, to which is added reverence and a strong feeling of indebtedness. All this is purely natural, and is as true of the Atheist as of the Christian. Religion adds little to our obligations to our parents, but it makes neglect of those obligations doubly culpable, for I need hardly remind girls that their parents stand to them in the position of God.

Though, as I have said, the mere emotion of love is often sufficient to make us do our duty to our parents and resist all temptation against the fifth commandment, it must not be forgotten that this love, like all other emotions, may not be forthcoming, and it is then that we must call upon our higher nature to sustain us in temptation. We may not love our parents, it may be quite impossible that we can respect them; the feeling of indebtedness, however, ought always to remain, and certain duties to them must always be performed. Filial obedience, like all the other virtues, has its heroines, and these are they who have been badly treated, wrongly used by their parents, but who never forget their side of the obligation, however much the obligation on the other side may have been neglected. Of such heroines Shakespeare's Cordelia is a splendid example.

The paternal duties are more necessary to the well-being of society than the filial ones, but are of a less spiritual order. In the brute creation, note how strongly developed are the instincts of love and protection of offspring, and how comparatively poorly they are reciprocated. The cub whines when its mother is taken from it, because it has looked to her for protection; but the mother is enraged and torn with grief at the loss of the cub, because of her almost human-like love.

Filial duty being so natural, so usual, and generally so instinctive, its opposing vice is branded with infamy by the world. Men care little whether we are dutiful to God, still less whether we are dutiful to ourselves; but they fiercely condemn the undutiful to parents. The world sneers at the girl who is a regular church-goer and speaks harshly to her mother. The world reverses the order of Christ's two great commandments, and places duty to our neighbour first, and cares little if the other is kept at all, unless the second is forgotten; and then it ridicules religion, and makes prayer and church-going almost a fault. The world is wise in its generation, and provided natural virtues are practised, does not inquire the motive. If we are loved for our goodness, it is because we practise worldly, that is to say, natural virtue.

There is an underlying of truth in the world's judgments. If you neglect your duty to your parents, my readers, you neglect your duty to God. Natural virtues become supernatural if the motive is to do God's law. We cannot keep the first great commandment without the second, but—and this is a reservation all Christians must take to heart and ponder on—we can keep the second and not the first, and as Christians we know that if we do so we are guilty of fearful sins of omission.

Cordelia is the heroine of the magnificent tragedy of King Lear, and though she is famous even amongst Shakespeare's women, yet she is, in comparison to many of them, a mere sketch, and is absent during the greater part of the play.

In the first scene, Lear, the aged King of Britain, weary of the cares and business of the State, calls together his three daughters, Goneril, Regan, and Cordelia, and the Dukes of Albany and Cornwall, husbands of the two older. Cordelia is unmarried, but has for suitors the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy, who are in Britain, rivals for her hand. Lear states his purpose to divide the kingdom into three parts, and confer them on his daughters; but asks them first to say which of them loves him best, thereby deserving the largest portion. Goneril, the eldest, speaks first, and describes her love as more than speech can utter, dearer than eyesight, space, and liberty—

"A love that makes breath poor, and speech unable; Beyond all manner of so much I love you."

A third of Britain is conferred on her, and Regan, wife of Cornwall, is asked to speak. She tells of a love like to Goneril's, only greater: no other joys she knows but happiness in her father's love. Cordelia, meanwhile, is surprised and shocked at her sisters' professions of a love which would be evil if true, seeing that they are married; but which she knows to be mere cunning statements to draw a prize. After Goneril's speech she communes with herself—

"What shall Cordelia do? Love, and be silent;"

and after Regan's still more exaggerated statements:—

"Then poor Cordelia!
And yet not so; since I am sure, my love's
More richer than my tongue."

Lear gives a portion to Regan which equals that of Goneril, and then asks Cordelia what she can say to draw a third and richer inheritance than her sisters. Cordelia is therefore asked to surpass Goneril's and Regan's exaggerated statements, which she could not do with honesty, for her heart loved more than her eloquence could attest.

To Lear's question she answers "Nothing." Lear tells her that nothing will come of nothing, and bids her speak again, to which she answers:—

"Unhappy that I am, I cannot heave
My heart unto my mouth: I love your majesty
According to my bond; nor more nor less."

At first sight this appears perhaps ungracious; the impression is, however, partly corrected in her next speech, and when we find how great her love really is, proved so splendidly in deeds in the after-scenes of the play, we may consider this as a protest against her father's foolish desire and her sisters' dishonest statements. Lear again asks her to mend her speech, and she replies:—

"Good, my Lord,
You have begot me, bred me, loved me: I Return those duties back as are right fit,
Obey you, love you, and most honour you.
Why have my sisters husbands, if they say
They love you all? Haply, when I shall wed,
That lord whose hand must take my plight shall carry
Half my love with him, half my care and duty;
Sure, I shall never marry like my sisters,
To love my father all."

The foolish king, deceived and flattered by Goneril's and Regan's professions of love, liked not his youngest daughter's straightforward honesty; and blinded to all sense of justice, divides Cordelia's portion between the other two, and silences the good courtier Kent, who protests against his folly and wickedness.

The King of France and the Duke of Burgundy now arrive on the scene, and Lear informs them that Cordelia is dowered only with a curse. Burgundy thereupon throws up his quest, but France asks the reason of the curse, and Cordelia, who is a thorough woman, conscious of right, speaks thus:—

"I yet beseech your majesty—
If for I want that glib and oily art,
To speak and purpose not; since what I well intend,
I'll do't before I speak—that you make known
It is no vicious plot, murder, or foulness,
No unchaste action or dishonour'd step,
That hath deprived me of your grace and favour;
But even for want of that for which I am richer,
A still-soliciting eye, and such a tongue
As I am glad I have not, though not to have it
Hath lost me in your liking."

The King of France now sees Lear's folly, and prizing Cordelia more than ever, takes her for his wife, and asks her to bid them all farewell.

Cordelia's farewell to her sisters shows how well she knew their characters, and, woman-like, she is not loath to speak her mind:—

"The jewels of our father, with wash'd eyes
Cordelia leaves you: I know you what you are;
And like a sister, am most loath to call Your faults as they are named. Use well our father;
To your professed bosoms I commit him;
But yet, alas! stood I within his grace,
I would prefer him to a better place;
So, farewell to you both."

The sisters Goneril and Regan reply in mocking tones, and Cordelia leaves them with the following sentence:—

"Time shall unfold what plaited cunning hides:
Who cover faults, at last shame them
derides.
Well may you prosper!"

With this Cordelia disappears from the play until the last scene in the fourth act, and as it is not my purpose to trace the plot except where our heroine appears, I will only briefly allude to those events which led up to Cordelia's splendid acts of devotion to save her aged father.

Lear soon reaps the result of his folly, and finds that Goneril's and Regan's professions of love were mere words. He first seeks the hospitality of Goneril and the Duke of Albany, with an escort of one hundred followers. Goneril communes with Regan, and they agree that their father is a worry in their State, his followers riotous, and himself an old and unwise fool. Goneril complains to Lear, through a steward, and bids him dismiss one-half his train. Lear, mad with anger and disappointment, seeks his daughter, only to find her steadfast in her purpose, which she states in unkind words. The aged king curses Goneril's ingratitude, and seeks his second daughter Regan, who bids him make peace with his eldest daughter, and obey her orders.

Lear, on finding Regan in league with her sister, and equally ungrateful, leaves his unnatural daughters and goes raving mad. Attended by his fool and a faithful follower, he rides to a lonely heath in a raging tempest, and seeks shelter in a cave.

Meanwhile the King of France, hearing of divisions in the kingdom of Britain and the hateful conduct of the sisters, lands an army at Dover, which Cordelia accompanies. We hear from a messenger how great was Cordelia's grief at the wicked treatment of her father.

"Faith, once or twice she heaved the name of 'father'

Pantingly forth, as if it press'd her heart!
Cried, 'Sisters! sisters! Shame of ladies!
sisters!

Kent! father! sisters! 'What, i' the storm? i' the night?

Let pity not be believed!' Then she shook

The holy water from her heavenly eyes,
And clamour moisten'd; then away she started

To deal with grief alone."

The King of France is called to his country by State affairs, but Cordelia remains with the army at Dover, and on being told of the approach of the British force, resolves to give battle for her father's sake.

" * * * O dear father,

It is thy business that I go about;

Therefore great France

My mourning and important tears hath pitied.

No blown ambition doth our arms incite,
But love, dear love, and our aged father's right;

Soon may I hear and see him!"

The mad Lear is brought to Cordelia, and her sorrow at his state is exquisitely portrayed. No thought of former wrongs is with her; she strives with loving care to restore the lost mind and give comfort to the aged frame. Lear recognises his daughter, and deeply repents of his injustice.

"You must bear with me;

Pray you now, forget and forgive; I am old and foolish."

The battle is fought, the British are victorious, and Lear and Cordelia taken prisoners. Thus had the noble daughter risked and lost all for a father who had so cruelly wronged her. The play is a terrible tragedy. Cordelia is hanged in prison, and Lear, who tried to save her and killed her murderer, dies. Goneril and Regan do not, however, prosper. Lying to their father, one deceives her husband, and both fall in love with the base-born Edmund. In jealousy Goneril poisons her sister and then slays herself. Thus Cordelia perishes for her filial love, and her sisters of jealousy and for a guilty love.

In the commencement of the article I treated of filial duty largely from its moral side, because Cordelia and her self-sacrifice illustrate so grandly the beautiful sentiment which surrounds the virtue.

The affection which we bear for our parents ought to be of quite a different kind from any other, and most like that which we give to our Maker: the love of an inferior to a superior, of one who owes to another a debt so great that it can never be repaid. Except in matters of faith and morals, when our conscience is the supreme arbiter, we must allow our parents to exercise a power over our wills and actions until we are of age; and even after we have attained manhood and womanhood we must hearken to their advice, and only disregard it when our reason or conscience have quite decided that it is bad. Their wish ought to weigh with us before our caprice, but not before our reason and conscience, which, when not warped and deadened by error, are direct inspirations from God.

I have heard girls say, "Oh, my parents and I get on capitally together; we are like brothers and sisters or intimate friends; there is no constraint whatever." To which other girls reply, "How delightful! My parents are quite different, unfortunately." Probably the girls who answer in this fashion have better parents, or certainly parents who exercise their duties in a more proper fashion. There must not be the same form of intimacy between parents and children as exists between intimate friends, because such friendship is founded upon a feeling of absolute equality, which ought not to exist in filial love. Then what makes conversation so delightful with intimate friends is the knowledge that if we disagree we can say so openly, without fear of a rupture, and the more intimate we are the more open and candid we may be. With our parents this is not the case; differences of opinion on unimportant matters are often better not expressed, or if they are, should be put more in the form of suggestions, as is the case when a premier addresses his sovereign.

Be careful, you older girls, to greatly value your parents and to make their lives comfortable and happy, for you will probably outlive them many years, when nothing in the world will console you for a knowledge of neglect and careless treatment of their wishes. A terrible reckoning comes to the ungrateful child. Matured intellect and experience of the world to those who are not base, bring back much of the childish love of parents, grown dim during the passionate period of youth. There comes a time when pride of life brooks no authority, when intellect and passions are strong, but unused to their strength and unrefined by experience—a time of impatience and a longing for power, often misdirected when it is obtained, and making us discontented when it is not; a period of neglect of former ties, and a striving for new. Then is it that love of parents gets diminished and duty is forgotten. But there comes another time, when experience has guided the intellect and restrained the passions within their rightful bounds, when former bounties are remembered, and also their miserable return; when early love comes back again, fortified by knowledge; when we realise that nothing we can do, no sacrifice that we can make, is sufficient return to our parents.

Remember also, you older girls, that Time affects us all, but in opposite ways. It strengthens your body, clears your intellect, and prepares you for the battle of life; it is, in fact, kind to you; but it is not so to your mother or father. That which it gave it comes to take away; time is not a donor, but a lender; the body which it matured it now comes to wither, not quickly—slow and sure are its methods. It works with care and by degrees, stone by stone it builds, and stone by stone it demolishes. But the picture is, for a Christian, not altogether a gloomy one; this Time, this all-powerful agent is controlled by a good God—is in one sense God Himself. His ways are inscrutable, but something has been revealed. Man was not built with such exceeding care merely to be destroyed; bounties turned to good account bear fruit in eternal reward.

But, you older girls, remember also that this time of decay, though it leads to a new birth, brings trials, sickness, and disappointed hopes. You cannot restrain the work of destruction, but you can somewhat allay its terrors. You can comfort the aged mind and support the aged body. You may succeed in making the final stage in life's journey more pleasant. Linger by your parents' side during the long months and years of decline; let their bent frames rest on your strong arm; let the dimmed eyes and feeble minds know that you are at your duty and thankful; and be present when God takes the souls to their haven of eternal rest.

SUNSHINE AFTER RAIN.

By LADY WILLIAM LENNOX.

CHAPTER III.

FORTNIGHT soon slipped away, and Mr. and Mrs. Forbes came back, amidst general rejoicings, to the old Manse, which was to be their home. How happy everybody was, and what a cheerful party sat down to dinner that day, Mr. McBain bringing out a bottle of champagne to celebrate the event, as he said, and his wife looking really almost well with the flush which seeing Bessie again had brought to her cheek; while Kitty, who had asked if she might stay and wait at table, hovered about, pleased to be near them all, especially her friend and counsellor, and listen to the description of the place, far up in the Highlands, where the married pair had been for their honeymoon. By the end of the week everything seemed to have resumed its usual aspect, except that Robert Forbes lived in the Manse instead of only coming there now and then for the day; but otherwise there was no change. Bessie waited on her mother, as before, and looked after the flowers, and the ducks and chickens, in the old way; and so the daily life flowed on evenly and without interruption for about a year.

To Kitty, however, it did not prove an uneventful twelve months, as she made the acquaintance of a young man who worked for a large firm of builders in Aberdeen, and who came occasionally to see an uncle living in a cottage some little distance from Mrs. McGowan's. This uncle was on the point of leaving his native land for New York, in order to spend the remainder of his life with a son married and settled out there, and his nephew's company was not only agreeable but useful, helping him, as he did, in many ways, with regard to the arrangements for the voyage. During one of these visits the younger man happened to meet Kitty McGowan walking, and was so much struck with her looks that he soon managed to get acquainted with her, and then the time given hitherto to his uncle was somewhat curtailed in favour of hours passed at Deeside Cottage, sauntering with Kitty on the banks of the river, and weaving plans for the future which looked so bright to both, sure as they were of each other's affection, and confident of getting on if only health and strength were continued to them. The first thing Kitty did after James Ferguson asked her to marry him, and had told her grandmother his wishes, and received her consent and blessing in reply, was to go up to the Manse to see her friend.

"Well, Kitty," said the former, looking up from her occupation of weeding a flower-bed, and shading her eyes from the sun by tilting her sun-bonnet over them, "isn't it a lovely day! Have you anything particular to ask me?" she went on, observing something unusual in the girl's face and manner.

Kitty blushed, and played with the strings of her apron, but spoke out, nevertheless.

"Yes, Miss Bessie," she said, quite forgetting in her excitement that it was no longer Miss Bessie, but Mrs. Forbes she was speaking to. "Yes, I have indeed. Jamie Ferguson has asked me to marry him, only last evening, but I felt I must come and tell you as soon as I could after."

"Jamie Ferguson! Oh, yes, that's the young man you told me of who comes from Aberdeen. I did wonder a little sometimes, whether there was anything between you and him, but you kept your own counsel this time, Kitty," she smiled, and added, "I am very glad, dear, and you have my very best wishes for your happiness, as I'm sure you know. Is it quite settled? I mean, does your grandmother approve?"

"Oh, yes, she does, quite, and I think she is pleased too. Jamie is very steady, and has plenty of work always. It is a large firm, and they employ a great many men. He can only come here when there is half a day's work instead of a whole one, of course."

"No, of course not," said Bessie; "so you can't see him very often, I suppose; but when you are married it will be different. I'm afraid I shall lose you then. Won't you have to live in Aberdeen?"

"Not yet," said Kitty; "they say lodgings are so dear there, and grannie wants me to stay, so I shall still live at the cottage, and Jamie will come backwards and forwards every day by train. There is a very early one which he can go by in the morning, and it's not far, you know, to the station." She paused, and then said rather timidly, "I can hardly believe I am so happy as I am now; it seems to me as if the dreams I used to have when I sat by the river have come true. I don't mean that I was thinking of Jamie; I couldn't, for I didn't know him then, but somehow my life feels so different since he came; it's not dull now ever."

"Now look here, Kitty," said Mrs. Forbes, with a smile, but speaking rather gravely; "don't think for one moment that I want to spoil your happiness, or take the gloss off your prospects. I think you know your old friend too well for that; but I know you, too, very well indeed, and you are such an excitable, impulsive creature that it's generally too much up or too much down with you. Do you understand me?"

"Yes," said Kitty; "I know I'm not equal, like you. That is what I always used to say, but I can't make myself different, though perhaps it would be better if I could."

"All I mean, dear," said Bessie, "is this: you enjoy things so keenly that even a little disappointment comes with greater force upon you than a heavier one would most likely on another person, and I really do not believe that any lot in life is quite free from some little drawback." Kitty looked up as if about to speak, but looked away again.

"I know what is in your mind," said Bessie; "you are wondering what I have to complain of in my lot. Well, I have nothing to complain of; on the contrary, I have a very happy life; but even in this there may be some things I should like to have which God has not seen fit to give me. I am very fond of babies," she added, in a lower tone; "and sometimes when I see the cottagers with theirs, I feel a little envious. There's a confession for you. But after all we don't know, and perhaps some day—— But you see that there is often some little thing which is not just what we like in everybody's life."

"I see," said Kitty. "I daresay everybody does have something to bother them one way or another, so it's no use expecting too much. That's what you mean, isn't it?"

"That is what I mean, dear, and if you make up your mind to it, then I think any annoyance which may happen is less likely to have a bad effect and get exaggerated in one's ideas. I suppose you have not thought when the great event is to come off, have you?"

"Well," said Kitty, "grannie was saying just now that she didn't see why we couldn't be married next month. Jamie is as well off now as he is likely to be for a year or two, at any rate, and I shall just tidy up my things, and buy myself a new bonnet and gown, and perhaps two or three pairs of stockings. There won't be any furniture to get or house to see to, as we shall live at the cottage still."

"You must let me give you the wedding-gown and bonnet, Kitty dear; it will be a real pleasure to me. What colour do you like best?"

"Oh, thank you," said Kitty, warmly. "I shall be pleased to be married in a dress you gave me. I think a nice blue is a good colour; green is jealous, they say, and red is too bright."

"Very well, dear, blue it shall be, and a pretty straw bonnet trimmed with white."

It was July when all this was settled, and the weather was beautiful, and warmer than it often is in Scotland. Kitty trod on air—her heart was so light that she seemed to, at least, for when the heart is light the step follows suit; and it is curious how much may be gleaned as to the mental condition of anybody by observing their walk. She flitted about the cottage perpetually, as busy as a bee, and though the neatness and tidiness of everything could really not be improved upon, yet there were little touches of brightness, such as new flowered chintz covers for a chair or cushion, or a fresh bit of red stuff for the centre table, which gave an additional smartness to the place, and harmonised well with the radiant look of the girl as she went joyfully about her work.

At length, in the beginning of August, Kitty's wedding-day arrived, and, with a sort of romance very characteristic of her, and an entire forgetfulness of all "Miss Bessie's" prudent warnings, she went out early that morning to her favourite nook close to the Dee, and, sitting down, she dipped her hands in the stream, letting the water run through her fingers as she held them up afterwards to dry, and apostrophised the Dee thus—

"Oh, beautiful river; how often I have come and sat here close to you and you have talked to me, and how often I have come because I was unhappy and dull; but now, dear Dee, I am not going to be dull or unhappy any more; Jamie is so good to me, and we shall be always happy." Then she got up and waved her hand, as she moved away saying, "Good-bye to Kitty McGowan, dear river, you will have Kitty Ferguson to come and talk to you very soon."

James Ferguson, his wife, and her grandmother got on very well together, and wished for nothing better than the Deeside cottage, which, in fact, was as comfortable as anything could be, and quite roomy enough to take them all in easily. So they lived on there in peace and happiness, and Jamie went early each morning by train to his work in Aberdeen, and occasionally to some other place where a building job was to be done. His uncle had gone long since to America, and his cottage was let to strangers, who were not very desirable acquaintances, as they were always dirty and untidy. The family then consisted of an oldish man and his two sons, all labouring men, who got their living by working in the fields or breaking stones on the road, or in any way they could, and spent, so people said, more than they could afford, or was good for them either, in drink. The old man was quiet enough himself, but the sons were noisy and apt to be quarrelsome; and sometimes when Kitty was walking and chanced to meet either of them, there was a rudeness in their manner which made her always avoid them if possible. They never became friends with her husband in the true meaning of the word; the men were too different ever to fraternise very well; but if they met they had a chat about the subjects of local interest, and Jamie, who was well informed for a man of his position, would tell them what was going on in the world according to the newspapers, rather pleased at being able to impart knowledge, and be looked up to in a measure as a consequence. He also found that by degrees the two young men seemed to take a liking to him, and rather made opportunities for meeting him. By degrees, therefore, it came about that James Ferguson and the two Grants, Andrew and Sandy, were pretty often together if their work lay in the same direction, which happened occasionally, though not often; or perhaps when Jamie had to go to Aberdeen, as he did most days, they would meet him on his return and walk to Deeside Cottage with him, being invited once in a way by Mrs. McGowan to come in and have a cup of tea—an invitation which was never seconded by Kitty, who disliked them cordially, and rather showed it by her manner. However, they had smartened themselves up a little since their first visit to the cottage, and were scrupulously civil, so that the old grandmother was not averse to their company now and then, and rather liked to see them at the tea-table.

WAITING FOR CHURCH.

By SARAH DOUDNEY.

LIGHTS and shadows, shifting—blending
On the level sward below,
Graceful branches, swaying, bending
O'er the river's quiet flow;
All the faint delicious murmur
Of the summer in the air,
And the church-bells chiming—calling
To the Father's house of prayer.

Drifting softly, floating slowly
Through the stir of leaves and flowers,
Comes that message clear and holy,
Speaking to this earth of ours;
Speaking to the little children
In the dawn of life's fair day, Saying, "Seek Me, seek Me early,
In mine own appointed way.

"Seek Me while the dew remaineth
On the blossoms of the heart,
Ere the world's pollution staineth,
Or the virgin blooms depart:
Soon the freshness will be over,
Soon the petals fade and pale;
Come to Me—and I will bless thee
With a joy that cannot fail."

Father, show me how to praise Thee
When I seek Thy courts to-day;
Guide me by Thy love, and raise me—
Let me feel the words I say.
Bless me on this hallowed morning,
Bid my soul to Thee draw near;
Teach me, and my heart shall listen—
Speak, Lord, and Thy child shall hear.

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCKOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK MAKES SAUCES AND GRAVIES.

NE cannot say of French sauces, as of many French soups, that they are very simple; they are very numerous, and most of them require very careful making. They are not necessarily extravagant if the cook manages well. For instance, in many recipes mushrooms are an important ingredient. For chopping, if properly washed, the skins and stalks are quite as good as the mushrooms themselves; also, if only used for flavouring, to be strained out before the sauce is served. These are what many French cooks use, reserving the mushrooms for dishes where they are required whole. Readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER will find, if they compare the recipes of various French writers on cookery, that sauces with the same name are very differently made. I have given two recipes for Tartare sauce which will show this. Many others vary quite as much, so that those who try French cooking must not be disappointed if they make a sauce from a recipe and find it is not like one they have tasted somewhere else; but remember, that as a Tartare sauce made with gherkins would be very unlike one made without, so they will find differences in other dishes. Some of the following gravies and sauces are served as here given, or are used as a base for more elaborate preparations. One of the most important is:—

you have from meat, game, or poultry, add some pieces of bacon and 2 lbs. of veal (knuckle of veal does very well), one large onion, one carrot cut in pieces, a bunch of thyme, savory, basil, parsley, a bayleaf, a shalot, a small clove of garlic, and a lump of sugar, put in a stewpan over the fire with half a pint of broth or water; let it boil two hours, stirring and looking from time to time to see that it does not stick to the bottom of the stewpan. If the moisture dries up too soon, a little more broth or water must be added; when the vegetables are cooked and begin to adhere to the stewpan and take a brown colour, draw quite to the side of the stove, pour in another half a pint of broth or water and let it stand to soak off what has dried up, stir well; then add about one quart of water or broth, depending on the quantity of trimmings, etc., you have put in; salt very moderately, and place over a quick fire; boil for two hours, skim, strain through a cloth, and put aside for use.

Thick Gravy.—Mix a tablespoonful of flour with cold water, and add to the gravy one hour before it is done. If not thick enough more can be added, but flour in gravies and sauces must be well cooked; it is not sufficient to add the flour a few minutes before the gravy is served, as many English cooks do. This gravy is served as sauce brune (brown sauce). A gravy which is the base of the cookery in most restaurants is made thus—put two ounces of butter in a saucepan with two sliced carrots, two onions, and some chopped mushroom stalks and skins, a bunch of herbs, parsley, bayleaf, four cloves, an old fowl and some veal (both cut in small pieces), part of a ham bone or some bacon bones (necks and feet of chicken are sometimes added), turn about in the stewpan for a few minutes, sift in a little flour, then add water or broth enough to rather more than cover the contents twice; that is to say, if the stewpan is nearly one-third full, let the broth or water make it two-thirds full; boil up and skim, then put the lid on and keep it boiling two hours, add some lumps of butter kneaded with flour, let it stew until the meat all falls from the bones, strain through a hair sieve, and set aside for use.

Sauce Espagnole (Spanish or brown sauce).—Put two tablespoonfuls of oil, or a piece of butter, in a stewpan, with the trimmings of lean meat and any remains of ham or poultry (some add game), a chopped onion, a sliced carrot, two or three mushrooms or mushroom trimmings, a little thyme, a clove, a small quantity of nutmeg, salt and pepper; when the meat is a light brown add a little flour, stir, then moisten with sufficient broth or water, add a bunch of parsley, let it simmer three or four hours, skim and take the fat off, strain through a sieve. This sauce is often used to add to other sauces.

Sauce au Velouté or Blonde.—Melt one ounce of butter in a stewpan, add some button mushrooms or trimmings, two ounces of ham, and about half a pound of uncooked veal (cut small); put the stewpan over a slow fire, and turn the ingredients about until all are of a pale gold colour, then add one pint of white (preferably veal) broth or water, and let all simmer one hour, then take out the meat and add two or three tablespoonfuls of cream, let it simmer for a quarter of an hour, stirring all the time; when it shall have attained a proper consistence strain it, and employ with any meat, but not with game.

Bechamel.—Melt two ounces of butter in a stewpan, stir in about two ounces of flour, cook for seven minutes, or until the flour leaves the sides of the stewpan; stir all the time; then remove from the fire, moisten with one quart of boiling milk, stirring as you add the milk, put back on the fire, and stir until it boils; then draw to the side of the stove, and add two ounces of raw ham and a small bunch of herbs and parsley, salt to taste, simmer twenty-five minutes, strain, and it is ready for use. This sauce is also made with half white stock and half cream.

Sauce Allemande.—Put half a pint of velouté sauce in a stewpan, add three tablespoonfuls of water in which mushroom trimmings have been boiled, and the same quantity of veal or chicken broth; boil eight minutes, stirring all the time. Mix the yolk of an egg with a little raw cream, take the sauce from the fire and add the egg and cream to thicken it, put back on the stove for a minute or two, but do not let it boil again. Serve.

Sauce Hollandaise.—Put four tablespoonfuls of good vinegar in a little stewpan, reduce it by boiling to half the quantity, take it off the stove for two minutes, then mix with it three yolks of raw eggs, a pinch of pepper and salt, stir two minutes over a gentle fire, then add slowly, dropping one little piece in after another, two ounces of butter; continue to stir the sauce over a very slow fire until it thickens, then stand the stewpan in the bain-marie, or in a saucepan of boiling water, and add another two ounces of butter, slowly, in the same way as the first two ounces; continue to stir; at the end of ten minutes the sauce ought to be of a proper consistence and creamy; serve at once. This sauce must be made slowly, stirred the whole time, and always in the same direction.

A Simpler Sauce is made thus—Put one ounce of butter in a stewpan, work into it one tablespoonful of flour and a pinch of salt, add a little cold water, put over a slow fire, stir always the same way, let it boil five minutes, take from the fire and add the yolk of an egg, mixed with a little cold water, let it get hot again but not boil; just as it is to be served stir in quickly another ounce of butter and a little lemon juice or a few drops of vinegar.

Sauce à la Hollandaise, to serve with asparagus.—Make sufficient butter for the quantity of asparagus hot, skim it, and add some lemon juice and salt; serve in a very hot tureen. Should there be any sediment to the butter, it must be strained through muslin and made hot again.

Sauce Poulette.—Put one ounce of butter in a stewpan, add one and a half ounces of flour, cook thoroughly without letting it brown, moisten with three-quarters of a pint of white broth, stir till it boils, then draw it off one side. Add a bunch of sweet herbs, parsley, some mushrooms or mushroom trimmings, salt and nutmeg; let it simmer a quarter of an hour, then take the fat off and strain the sauce, put it back in the stewpan, thicken with the yolks of two eggs, and finish by stirring in one ounce of butter, a little more nutmeg, chopped parsley, and the juice of a lemon.

Sauce Ravigote.—Cook one ounce of butter and three-quarters of an ounce of flour together without letting them brown, then moisten with sufficient stock; boil. Add one tablespoonful of finely minced shalots, a few crushed peppers and a little parsley, boil for fifteen minutes, skim and strain into a clean saucepan; boil for another ten minutes, draw from the fire, and stir in a teaspoonful of mustard that has been mixed with vinegar and a tablespoonful of good oil; finish with a teaspoonful each of finely chopped parsley, pimpernel, and tarragon. A little spinach green is sometimes added to improve the appearance.

Sauce Raifort (horseradish).—Put in a stewpan one ounce of butter and one ounce of flour; stir and cook the flour without letting it brown, then add a quarter of a pint of white stock or water, and the same quantity of boiled milk; stir until it boils, then let it cook five minutes; have ready two tablespoonfuls of finely grated horseradish, add this with a little salt and a pinch of sugar, make the sauce hot, without boiling, and serve.

Sauce Tomate.—Put an ounce of butter in a stewpan, throw in a minced onion, a bay-leaf, a sprig of parsley, two cloves, a few whole peppers, and a little salt; cook a few minutes, then add one pound of tomatoes cut in quarters, let them cook half an hour, then rub the whole through a sieve; if not thick enough put the purée back in the stewpan and add a little butter and flour, and cook for ten minutes, or if too thick a little stock is added to the purée.

Sauce Verte.—Put in a stewpan over the fire a teacupful of veal broth, with a little lemon juice, pound separately chervil, tarragon, cress, and pimpernel; press the juice into a basin and mix with it the yolks of four raw eggs; take the stock from the fire and mix slowly with the eggs, season with salt, and make the sauce hot, but do not boil it; serve at once.

Sauce Piquante.—Put two tablespoonfuls of minced shalots, with salt, pepper, and a very little grated nutmeg in a stewpan with two tablespoonfuls of vinegar; put over the fire, and reduce, that is to say, let all the vinegar boil away, then add half a pint of good brown stock, simmer twenty minutes, skim, and before serving add about eight pickled gherkins very finely chopped.

Sauce Piquante à l'Eau.—Take six shalots, mix them, chop two or three sprigs of parsley, warm an ounce of butter in a stewpan, put in the parsley and shalots, shake in a good teacupful of flour, stir with a wooden spoon for a few minutes, add rather less than half a pint of water, salt, pepper, and nutmeg, boil half an hour before serving, add a few drops of vinegar or a little lemon juice.

Sauce Poivrade.—Put in a stewpan two tablespoonfuls of vinegar, an onion, and two shalots, chopped small, a bay-leaf, some parsley, thyme, whole black pepper, and two cloves; put on the fire and by boiling reduce the vinegar to half the quantity; add three-quarters of a pint of thick gravy, simmer for a quarter of an hour, skim well, let it simmer for another quarter of an hour, strain through a fine strainer, and serve hot.

Sauce aux Echalotes (shalot sauce).—Put in a stewpan two tablespoonfuls of minced shalots and five tablespoonfuls of vinegar, put over a fire, and let the vinegar evaporate. When the shalots are dry, add half a pint of broth, tie up a bay-leaf and some spices in a piece of muslin and put them in with a sprig of parsley; let the whole simmer twelve minutes; take out the parsley and spice, colour with a little caramel (burnt sugar); mix a teaspoonful of flour with a little butter, add it to the sauce, boil a few minutes to cook the flour, finish with a little pepper; skim, and serve without straining.

Sauce au Pauvre Homme (poor man's sauce).—Chop half a dozen shalots and an onion, cook them in oil or butter without letting them brown, sift in a little flour, stir and cook, then add some broth and one tablespoonful of vinegar, stir and boil for six minutes; draw from the fire, add a tablespoonful of minced capers and two anchovies, boned and chopped, finish with some pepper and chopped parsley.

A simpler sauce, Au Pauvre Homme, is made thus:—Put half a pint of stock in a stewpan; when it boils throw in a handful of chopped chives, two or three slices of lemon, without pips, and a few fine breadcrumbs, let the whole simmer a quarter of an hour, take out the lemon, and serve the sauce.

Sauce Italienne.—Mince two onions or six shalots, cook them in butter, then add double the quantity of chopped mushrooms, stir over the fire for a few minutes, sift in a little flour, cook three minutes, add three-quarters of a pint of stock, boil fast for ten minutes, finish with a little cayenne pepper, and serve.

Sauce aux Champignons (mushroom sauce).—Chop some mushrooms, cook them in a little butter, add some stock, some parsley, and a scallion or an onion, boil gently for half an hour, and pass through a sieve; make hot again and serve.

Sauce Robert.—Chop two large onions, put them in a stewpan with an ounce of butter, turn them about and cook until they are a light brown, add a dessert-spoonful of flour, cook three minutes, then add half a pint (or more, if required) of stock, boil until the onions are done, skim the fat off, and add two teaspoonfuls of mustard mixed with the same quantity of vinegar and some pepper and salt. This sauce is liked with fresh pork.

Sauce à l'Oseille (sorrel sauce).—Take two handfuls of young sorrel, strip the leaves from the stalks so as only to retain the tender parts of the leaves, cook them eight minutes with a teacupful of water, drain them on a sieve. Put in a stewpan a quarter of a pound of clarified butter, boil it until it begins to colour, then mix the sorrel with it, season with pepper, salt, and nutmeg, stir over the fire, make quite hot, and serve.

Sauce Estragon (tarragon sauce).—Put a sprig of fresh tarragon in a stewpan with two tablespoonfuls of vinegar and some black peppers; put over the fire, and evaporate nearly all the vinegar, then add one ounce of butter mixed with a tablespoonful of flour, cook for a few minutes; next stir in nearly half a pint of boiling water, boil ten minutes, take out the peppercorns and sprig of tarragon. Prepare a large tablespoonful of tarragon leaves by cutting them in lozenge-shaped pieces, plunging them in boiling water, and draining them well; add these to the sauce, and serve.

Sauce Maître de Hôtel.—Make some sauce with one ounce of butter, one ounce of flour, and sufficient water to make it a proper consistency; boil five minutes, take another ounce (or if liked richer two ounces) of butter, work into it some lemon juice, salt, cayenne, or white pepper, chopped parsley, and a little grated nutmeg; stir this into the sauce, keep the saucepan at the side of the stove for a few minutes, but do not let the sauce boil again; serve.

Maître d'Hôtel Butter is butter with lemon juice, chopped parsley, pepper, salt, and sometimes nutmeg worked into it. It is very nice for putting on steaks and for many other purposes.

Sauce Béarnaise.—Put in a stewpan four tablespoonfuls of vinegar and one tablespoonful of chopped shalots, some peppercorns, a sprig of tarragon, and a bay-leaf; boil the vinegar down to half the quantity, remove the stewpan from the fire, take out the bay-leaf, tarragon, and peppercorns, put in three yolks of eggs (not beaten), stir with a wooden spoon over a slow fire until the eggs thicken, then take from the stove and stir in one and a half ounces of butter, adding it in little pieces; stir again over a very slow fire until it is thick, then while you stir it quickly add another one and a half ounces of butter, putting it in in little pieces as before; then finish the sauce with a tablespoonful of chopped tarragon, and serve at once.

Sauce au Citron (lemon sauce).—Boil half a pint of water or fish stock, add salt, pepper, chopped parsley, one ounce of butter, and the juice of a lemon; keep hot on stove for five minutes, then serve without boiling.

Sauce au Civet (to serve with leverets, hares, or rabbits).—Take the liver of a hare, leveret, or rabbit, half cook it in any white fat or butter, add half a pint of stock, three or four little onions, two bay-leaves, and two or three mushroom stalks; let all simmer until the flavour is good; rub through a sieve and serve. This sauce is often made with two-thirds stock and one-third red wine.

Beurre Noir (black butter).—Put three ounces of butter in a frying pan over a quick fire. When it is brown skim it and turn it into a basin, and put it aside; then in the same pan put two tablespoonfuls of vinegar and a little salt; reduce the vinegar by boiling it to one tablespoonful, then add the brown butter, stir a minute, and turn the sauce, boiling, over the fish or eggs to be served with it.

Caramel.—When brown sauces are not a good colour, a little caramel is often added; it is made thus:—Put two tablespoonfuls of crushed white sugar into a small saucepan or stewpan that is not tinned (a little copper skillet is nice for the purpose), but that you have wetted with cold water, stir the sugar over a moderate fire until it is a dark brown, then pour in gently about a quarter of a pint of water; keep stirring until all the browned sugar is mixed with the water, then take from the fire, and when cool bottle for use.

French cooks serve more cold sauces than we do; they are frequently very convenient where there are not many servants, as they can be prepared some hours before they are wanted. Some of the following sauces make excellent salad dressings.

COLD SAUCES.

Vinaigrette.—Put a tablespoonful of good mustard into a basin with half a teaspoonful of ground pepper and some salt, moisten gradually with equal quantities of oil and vinegar; chop finely two shalots, a teaspoonful of capers, a pickled gherkin, half a teaspoonful of parsley, a few tarragon leaves, and the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs. If too thick, more oil or vinegar is added, whichever is liked.

Sauce Raifort (horseradish).—Grate a stick of horseradish, put it in a basin with an equal quantity of very fine breadcrumbs, add a pinch of sugar, some salt, and a little vinegar, whip four tablespoonfuls of cream, and incorporate with the other ingredients.

Sauce à l'Huile.—Remove all the peel and the white from two lemons, cut them in thin slices, removing the pips, put them in a basin with three tablespoonfuls of salad oil, one tablespoonful of vinegar, salt, pepper, a teaspoonful of chopped parsley, and six tarragon leaves, chopped with a very little piece of garlic, and a little ground allspice; mix all together. This sauce is useful with grilled fish.

Sauce Verte (green sauce).—Take parsley, chervil, tarragon, marjoram, cress, and borage in equal quantities (a good sprig of each), chop them, then pound in a mortar; when reduced to a paste add the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs; pass the whole through a sieve; add one teaspoonful of mustard, half a teaspoonful of pepper, salt to taste, then mix in by degrees three tablespoonfuls of oil and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Sometimes two or three chives are used instead of borage, and some cooks put more borage. This sauce is often served with boiled beef.

Sauce Mayonnaise.—Put the yolks of two raw fresh eggs into a basin, with a wooden spoon stir into them a little salt, then stir in drop by drop eight tablespoonfuls of good olive oil, adding from time to time a drop or two of lemon juice; when the oil is all absorbed the sauce should be thick and smooth; finish it with a few drops of tarragon vinegar. This sauce is very delicate, and it requires patience to make it; the oil must be added slowly, and the eggs always stirred the same way. Chopped parsley, tarragon, scallions, or gherkins are sometimes added to mayonnaise.

Sauce Tartare.—Put the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs through a sieve into a basin, add two yolks of raw eggs and a saltspoonful each of mustard, pepper, and salt, stir the eggs with a wooden spoon, dropping in oil as for mayonnaise, and now and then a few drops of tarragon vinegar; when the sauce is thick add one or two tablespoonfuls of very finely chopped gherkins.

A Simpler Tartare Sauce is made thus.—Take three shalots and a handful of chervil and tarragon, chop all very finely, add pepper, salt, and one tablespoonful of vinegar, the same of mustard, three tablespoonfuls of oil, taking care to stir all the time you are adding the ingredients; beat up well, and serve; more oil may be added if liked.

Sauce Remoulade.—Bone four anchovies, put them in a mortar with the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs and a dessertspoonful each of chopped onions, capers, parsley, and pickled gherkins, a little salt, and a saltspoonful of dry mustard; pound all together to a paste, then add two yolks of eggs uncooked, stir, and add, drop by drop, as for mayonnaise, a quarter of a pint of salad oil and a small spoonful of vinegar.

Another way of making Remoulade for those who do not like so much oil is to make a paste as above with the hard-boiled eggs, and the addition of a few drops of vinegar, then add slowly nearly half a pint of warm velouté sauce, and two tablespoonfuls of salad oil; beat the whole until cold.

Parsley Sauce.—Chop some parsley, add a tablespoonful of crumb of bread that has been soaked in water and squeezed, put into a mortar with the parsley, and pound, rub through a sieve, add salt, pepper, vinegar, and a little cold broth. This is served with beef.

Sauce Ravigote.—Make a good mayonnaise with eggs, oil, tarragon vinegar, and a little dry mustard added; when the sauce is thick enough, take some parsley, shalots, pimpernel, and tarragon leaves (all very finely chopped), and stir them into the sauce.

Sauce Ayoli à la Provençale or Beurre de Provence.—Take three cloves of garlic, remove the outsides, and pound them; when well-pounded, add a piece of crumb of bread, the size of an egg, that has been soaked in warm water and squeezed; pound with the garlic, then add the yolk of an egg; mix into a smooth paste, then add oil (that is neither warm nor too cold) drop by drop, turning it all the time slowly with the pestle; when it begins to get creamy a few drops of water may be added, and the juice of half a lemon is added, a drop or two at a time; about one-third of a pint of oil is sufficient, and when finished the sauce should be thick and creamy.

Beurre d'Anchois (anchovy butter).—Wash and bone some anchovies, pound them in a mortar, pass them through a sieve, put them back in the mortar, and add an ounce of good fresh butter for every five anchovies; pound together, and put aside for use.

It is very important for most cold sauces that sufficient time should be given for their preparation, and that good oil should be used.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

IN THE KENTISH LANES.

BESSIE did not make any answer for a minute or two, but her eyes were a little dim as she heard Hatty sob.

"I must not break the bruised reed," she said to herself. "Hatty's world is a very little one; she is not strong enough to come out of herself, and take wider views; when she loves people, she loves them somehow in herself; she can't understand the freedom of an affection that can be happy in the absence of its object. I am not like Hatty; but then our natures are different, and I must not judge her. What can I say that will help her?"

"Can't you find anything to say to me, Bessie dear?"

"Plenty, but you must wait for it to come. I was just thinking for you—putting myself in your place, and trying to feel as you do."

"Well!"

"I was getting very low down when you spoke; it was quite creepy among the shadows. 'So this is how Hatty feels,' I said to myself, and did not like it at all."

"You would not like to be me, Bessie."

"What an ungrammatical sentence! Poor little me! I should think not; I could not breathe freely in such a confined atmosphere. Why don't you give it up and let yourself alone? I would not be only a bundle of fears and feelings if I were you."

"Oh, it is easy to talk, but it is not quite so easy to be good."

"I am not asking you to be good. We can't make ourselves good, Hatty; that lies in different hands. But why don't you look on your unhappy nature as your appointed cross, and just bear with yourself as much as you expect others to bear with you? Why not exercise the same patience as you expect to be shown to you?"

"I hardly understand you, Bessie. I ought to hate myself for my ill-temper and selfishness, ought I not?"

"It seems to me that there are two sorts of hatred, and only one of them is right. We all have two natures. Even an apostle could say, 'Oh, wretched man that I am! Who can deliver me from the body of this death?' Even St. Paul felt the two natures warring within him. How can you and I, then, expect to be exempt from this conflict?"

"Don't put yourself in the same category with me, Bessie. You have crushed your lower nature, if you ever had it."

"Oh, hush!" replied her sister, quite shocked at this. "You can't know what you are talking about." And here her voice trembled a little, for no one was more conscious of her faults and shortcomings. Bessie could remember the time when the conflict had been very hard; when her standard of duty had been lower than that she held now; when she had been as careless and indifferent as many girls of her age, until Divine guidance had led her feet into better paths; and knowing this, in her humility she could be tolerant of others.

"You do not know what you are saying, Hatty, or you would not hurt me by such a speech; it is only your love for me that blinds you. What I want to tell you is this—that you must not be so impatient; you waste all your strength in saying hard things about yourself, instead of fighting your faults. Why don't you say to yourself, 'I am a poor, weak, little creature, but my Creator knows that too, and He bears with me. I cannot rid myself of my tiresome nature; it sticks to me like a Nessus shirt'—you know the old mythological story, Hatty—but it is my cross, a horrid spikey one, so I will carry it as patiently as I can. If it is not always light, I will grope my way through the shadows; but my one prayer and my one effort shall be to prevent other people suffering through me?"

"Oh, Bessie, that is beautiful!"

"You will find nothing else will help you to fight your bogies; do try it, darling. Be merciful to your poor little self; 'respect the possible angel in you,' as Mr. Robertson said. You will get rid of all your faults and fancies one day, as your namesake did in the river. You won't always be poor little Hatty, whose back aches, and who is so cross; there is no pain nor crossness in the lovely land where all things are new."

"Oh, if we were only there now, Bessie, you and I, safe and happy!"

"I would rather wait till my time comes. I am young and strong enough to find life beautiful. Don't be cowardly, Hatty; you want to drop behind in the march, before many a grey-haired old veteran. That is because you are weak and tired, and you fear the long journey; but you forget," and here Bessie dropped her voice reverently, "that we don't journey alone, any more than the children of Israel did in the wilderness. We also have our pillar of cloud to lead us by day, and our pillar of fire by night to give us light. Mother always said what a type of the Christian pilgrimage the story of the Israelites is; she made us go through it all with her, and I remember all she told me. Hark! I think I hear footsteps outside the window; the servants are coming in from church."

"Wait a minute, Bessie, before you let them in. You have done me so much good; you always do. I will try not to mope and vex mother and Christine while you are away." And Hatty threw her arms penitently round her sister's neck. Bessie returned her kisses warmly, and left the room with a light heart. Her Sunday evening had not been wasted if she had given the cup of cold water in the form of tender sympathy to one of Christ's suffering little ones.

Bessie felt her words were not thrown away when she saw Hatty's brave efforts to be cheerful the next day, and how she refrained from sharp speeches to Christine; she did not even give way when Bessie bade her good-bye.

"You will remember our Sunday talk, Hatty, dear."

"I do remember it," with a quivering lip; "and I am trying to march, Bessie."

"All right, darling, and I shall soon be back, and we can keep step again. I will write you long letters, and bring you back some ferns and primrose roots." And then Bessie waved her hand to them all, and jumped into the brougham, for her father was going to take her to the station.

It must be confessed that Bessie felt a trifle dull when the train moved off, and she left her father standing on the platform. With the exception of short visits to her relations, that were looked on in the light of duties, she had never left home before. But this feeling soon wore off, and a pleasant sense of exhilaration, not unmingled with excitement, followed, as the wide tracts of country opened before her delighted eyes, green meadows and hedgerows steeped in the pure sunlight. Bessie was to be met at the station by some friend of the Seftons, as the country-bred girl knew little about London, and though a short cab drive would deposit her at Charing Cross, it would be far pleasanter for her to have an escort. Mrs. Sefton had suggested this, and Dr. Lambert had been much relieved by her thoughtfulness.

As the train drew up to the platform Bessie jumped out, and stood eagerly looking about her for the lady whom she expected to see, and she was much surprised when a gentlemanly-looking man approached her, and lifting his hat, said, with a pleasant smile—

"I believe I am addressing Miss Lambert."

"Yes, certainly; that is my name," returned Bessie, in rather an embarrassed manner.

"Ah, that is all right, and I have made no mistake. Miss Lambert, my mother is so seriously indisposed that she was unable to meet you herself, but you must allow me to offer my services instead. Now I will look after your luggage, and then I will find you a cab. Will you come with me, please; the luggage is at the other end."

"I am so sorry to trouble you," returned Bessie. "I have only one box—a black one, with E. L. on the cover." And then she stood aside quietly, while Mr. Sinclair procured a porter and identified the box; and presently she found herself in a cab, with her escort seated opposite to her, questioning her politely about her journey, and pointing out different objects of interest on their way.

Bessie's brief embarrassment had soon worn off, and she chatted to her new companion in her usual cheerful manner. She liked Mr. Sinclair's appearance—he looked clever, and his manners were quiet and well-bred. He did not seem young; Edna had told her that he was thirty, but he looked quite five years older.

"I wonder how you recognised me so quickly!" Bessie observed presently.

"It was not very difficult to identify you," he returned, quietly. "I saw a young lady who seemed rather strange to her surroundings, and who was evidently by her attitude expecting someone. I could tell at once you were not a Londoner."

"I am afraid I must have looked very countrified," returned Bessie, in an amused tone.

"Pardon me, I meant no such invidious comparison. People from the country have an air of greater freshness about them, that is all. You live at Cliffe, do you not? I was never there, but it is rather an interesting place, is it not?"

"I think it a dear place," returned Bessie, enthusiastically; "but then it is my home, so I am not unprejudiced. It is very unlike other places. The streets are so steep, and some of the houses are built in such high, out-of-the-way nooks; you look up and see steps winding up the hill, and there is a big house perched up among the trees, and then another. You wonder how people care to climb up so many steps; but then there is the view. I went over one of the houses one day, and from every window there was a perfect panorama. You could see miles away. Think what the sunsets must be from those windows!"

"You live lower down the hill, then?" with an air of polite interest.

"Yes, in such a quiet, secluded corner; but we are near the Quarry woods, and there are such lovely walks! And then the bay; it is not the real open sea, you know, but it is so pretty, and we sit on the rocks sometimes, to watch the sunset. Oh, I should not like to live anywhere else!"

"Not in London, for example?"

"Oh, no, not for worlds. It is very amusing to watch the people, but one seems to have no room to breathe freely."

"We are pretty crowded, certainly," returned Mr. Sinclair; "but some of us would not care to live anywhere else, and I confess I am one of those people. The country is all very well for a month or two, but to a Londoner it is a sort of stagnation. Men like myself prefer to be at the heart of things—to live close to the centre of activity. London is the nucleus of England; not only the seat of government, but the focus of intellect, of art, of culture, of all that makes life worth living; and please do not put me down as a cockney, Miss Lambert, if I confess that I love these crowded streets. I am a lawyer, you know, and human nature is my study."

"I quite understand you," returned Bessie, with the bright intelligence that was natural to her. She was beginning to think Edna a fortunate girl. "There must be more in her than I thought, or this clever man would not have chosen her," she said to herself; for Bessie, in her girlish innocence, knew little of the law of opposites, or how an intellectual or scientific man will sometimes select for his life-companion a woman of only ordinary intelligence, who will, nevertheless, adorn her husband's home by her simple domestic virtues. A wife does not need to be a moral whetstone to sharpen her husband's wits by the fire-side, neither would it enhance his happiness to find her filling reams of foolscap paper with choice specimens of prose and poetry; intelligent sympathy with his work is all he demands, and a loving, restful companion, who will soothe his hours of depression, who is never too weary or self-absorbed to listen to the story of his successes or failures.

"I shall be down at The Grange in a week or two—that is, if my mother be better; and then I hope we shall renew our acquaintance," were Mr. Sinclair's parting words as he took leave of Bessie, and Bessie sincerely echoed this wish.

"He is the sort of man father would like," she thought, as the train moved slowly out of the station. This was paying a great compliment to Mr. Sinclair, for Dr. Lambert was rather severe on the young men of the day. "I don't know what has come to them," he would remark, irritably; "young men now-a-days call their father, 'governor,' and speak to him as though he were their equal in age. There is no respect shown to elders. A brainless young puppy will contradict a man twice his age, and there is not even the same courtesy shown to the weaker sex either. I have heard young men and young women— young ladies, I suppose I ought to say—who address each other in a 'hail fellow well met' sort of manner; but what can you expect," in a disgusted tone, "when the girls talk slang, and ape their young brothers? I think the 'sweet madam' of our great grandmother's times preferable to these slipshod manners. I would rather see our girls live and die in single blessedness than marry one of those fellows."

"Father, we don't want to marry anyone, unless he is as nice as you," replied Christine, on overhearing this tirade, and Bessie had endorsed this speech.

It was rather late in the afternoon when Bessie reached her destination, and she was feeling somewhat weary and dusty as she stood on the platform beside her box. The little station was empty, but as Bessie was waiting to question the porter, a man-servant came up to her and touched his hat.

"Miss Sefton is outside with the pony carriage," he said, civilly; "I will look after the luggage ma'am—there is a cart waiting for it."

"Oh, thank you," returned Bessie, and she went quickly through the little waiting-room. A young man in knickerbockers, with a couple of large sporting dogs, was talking to the stationmaster, and looked after her as she passed; but Bessie did not notice him particularly; her eyes were fixed on the road, and on a pony carriage drawn up under the trees. Miss Sefton waved her whip when she saw Bessie, and drove quickly up to the door. She looked prettier than ever in her dark blue cambric and large shady hat.

"How do you do, Miss Lambert? I am delighted to see you again. How punctual you are! Jump in. Ford will look after your luggage. This is a very different meeting, is it not, from our last? No snow about, but a very hot sun for June. Where is your sunshade? You will want it. Yes; that is right, put it up—my hat shades me. Now then, Ford, are you ready? Go on, Jack. What are you about, Jill? Are not my ponies pretty, Miss Lambert? Richard gave them to me last birthday, but I am afraid I plagued him a good deal beforehand to provoke such unusual generosity. There is nothing like teasing when you want a thing."

Bessie smiled, but remained silent; she was tired, and not quite inclined for repartee. They had turned into a long, lovely lane, so narrow that no vehicle could have passed them, and the thick hedgerows were full of pink and white briar roses and other wild flowers; on either side lay hop-fields. Bessie uttered a delighted exclamation.

"Yes, I told you you would admire our Kentish lanes. They are pretty now, but in the winter they are not quite so pleasant. Well, did Mrs. Sinclair meet you, as she promised?"

"No, her son came instead; he said his mother was seriously indisposed, and unable to keep her engagement."

"Neville met you. How extremely odd! How on earth did you discover each other? Were you very much embarrassed, Miss Lambert?"

"No, it was a little strange at first, but Mr. Sinclair was very kind and pleasant, and soon put me at my ease."

"Oh, Neville always gets on with ladies; there is certainly no fault to find with him in that respect. His civility is natural to him; he is just as polite to an old woman with a market basket and a few apples tied up in a blue-spotted handkerchief, as he is to a lady whose dress has been made by Worth."

"I call that true politeness," returned Bessie, warmly.

"There is not much of the precious commodity to be found in our days; the young men one meets in society are not cut after that pattern. And so Mrs. Sinclair is ailing again?"

"'Seriously indisposed,' was Mr. Sinclair's expression, and he looked rather grave, I thought."

"My dear creature, Neville always looks grave, as though he were engaged in a criminal investigation. He is a barrister, you see, and he troubles himself if his mother's finger aches. The dear old lady is always ailing, more or less, but there is never much the matter—a creaking door, you know the sort; only Neville always makes the worst of it. Now look here, Miss Lambert, this is what we call the village—just those few cottages and the inn; there is not even a church; we have to walk over to Melton, a mile and a half away. Isn't that pond pretty, with the ducks on it? and there is a flock of geese. Now we have only to turn down this road and there is The Grange." And as Miss Sefton pointed with her whip, Bessie saw the outlines of a large red house between the trees.

THE GIRL'S OWN CONVALESCENT HOME.

It is just a year ago since we first appealed to our girl readers on behalf of a Girl's Own Convalescent Home. Our proposition, it may be remembered, was to obtain at once by means of the smallest subscriptions a thousand pounds, that being the minimum amount with which it would be possible to commence operations.

Twelve months have passed away, and yet we have only £383 17s. 2½d., a large sum indeed when looked at as a sign of the loving hearts and sympathy of those who subscribed it, but of no service for the special object for which it was given.

Even supposing the money came in in the same proportion, it would be years before we could commence the work, therefore after much thought it occurs to us that we might seek some thoroughly good institution for girls, crippled perhaps for lack of funds, and by the money which has been subscribed help to build it up and strengthen its hands.

We trust this proposition will meet with the approbation and sympathy of those who have given of their means in answer to our appeal. It seems to us better to grant help in a pressing present need, than to postpone it indefinitely merely to bestow it in another form.

There has always been so much unanimity of feeling between us and our readers whenever any good work has been laid before us, that we cannot help hoping that all who have helped us with their subscriptions will agree with us in the disposition of them.

Total amount received up to October 13th, £383 17s. 2½d.

VARIETIES.

SYMMETRICAL PUZZLE.

It is required to produce a symmetrical figure by a series of dots and lines indicating the order in which these syllables should be read. Paper ruled in squares, as below, will be found a great help in working out the key. As an example we give the following puzzle complete with its key. Reading from the star, we follow the line, and find this passage from Carlyle's Hero as Prophet, "The greatest of faults, I should say, is to be conscious of none."

scious	is	none	should	great
be	con	say	of	faults
of	to	the	I	est

Key to example—follow on from the star.

We now give a puzzle containing a familiar quotation from Shakespeare, and those of our readers who delight in such things will find that, though difficult, it is by no means impossible to find the solution.

HERO WORSHIP.—Some of the admirers of the great Duke of Wellington hit upon curious ways of expressing their regard. One of them was a Mrs. Dowell, who kept a tobacconist's shop at the entrance to Wilton Place, Knightsbridge. She was always inventing some new plan whereby to express her devotion, and sent his grace a long succession of patties, cakes, and other delicacies. As it was useless to attempt to defeat the old woman's pertinacity, everything sent was taken in. To such a pitch did she carry this mania that she kept a place for the Duke at her table, constantly expecting that the victor of Waterloo would call in and dine with her.

A SLOW POISON.

A physician said one day to Fontenelle, the French poet, "Coffee is a slow poison." "Yes, very slow," answered the aged author, smiling, "for I have taken it every day for more than four-score years."

NOTES ON TEARS.

The power (or weakness) of abundant weeping without disfigurement is an attribute of deficient rather than excessive feeling. In such persons the tears are poured from their crystal cups without muscular distortion of the rest of the face. In proportion to the violence or depth of emotion, and the acute or profound sensibility of the temperament, is the disturbance of the countenance. In sensitive organisations, the muscles round the nostrils and lips quiver and are distorted, the throat and temples swell, and a grimace, which, but for its miserable significance would be grotesque, convulses the whole face.

Men's tears always seem to me as if they were pumped from their heels, and strained through every drop of blood in their veins; women's, to start as under a knife-stroke, direct with a gush from their heart, abundant and beneficent; but, again, women of the temperament I have alluded to above (superficial sensibility) have fountains of lovely tears behind their lovely eyes, and their weeping, which is indescribably beautiful, is comparatively painless, and yet pathetic enough to challenge tender compassion.

I have twice seen such tears shed, and never forgotten them; once from heaven-blue eyes, and the face looked like a flower with pearly dewdrops sliding over it, and again, once from magnificent dark, uplifted orbs, from which the falling tears looked like diamond raindrops by moonlight.

Frances Kemble.

AN OLD SERVANT.—An instance of fixedness in domestic service is afforded by an old coachman, long in the employment of a noble lady, who gave all the trouble and annoyance which he conceived were the privileges of his position in the family. At last the lady could stand it no longer, and gave him notice to quit. The only satisfaction she got was the answer, "Na, na, my lady; I druve ye to your marriage, and I shall stay to drive ye to your burial."

LOVE ASLEEP.

Hush! hush! the God of Love here sleeping lies;
His hands disarmed and closed his restless eyes.
The bow, unstrung, awhile forgets to wound,
His useless shafts lie scattered on the ground.
Sleep on, sweet babe, and smiling, promise peace;
For should'st thou wake, we know 'twill quickly cease.

From the Latin.

OUR OWN WAY OF THINKING.

So wedded are some people to their own notions, that they will not have any persons for friends, or even for servants, who do not entertain similar views. Lord L.— makes a point of strictly cross-questioning his domestics as to their religious and political faith before he engages them. While residing on his Irish estates a groom presented himself to be hired, resolving, beforehand, not to compromise himself by any inconsiderate replies.

"What are your opinions?" was the peer's first demand.

"Indeed, then, your lordship's honour! I have just none at all, at all."

"Not any! Nonsense! you must have some, and I insist upon knowing them."

"Well, then, your honour's glory, they are for all the world just the same as your lordship's."

"Then you can have no objection to state them, and to confess frankly what is your way of thinking."

"Och! and is it my way of thinking you mane by my opinions? Why then, I am exactly the same way of thinking as Pat Sullivan, your honour's game-keeper, for, says he to me, as I was coming upstairs, 'Murphy,' says he, 'I'm thinking you'll never be paying me the two-and-twenty shillings I lent you last Christmas was a twelvemonth.' 'Faith,' says I, 'Pat Sullivan, I'm quite of your way of thinking.'"

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

A. BERRY.—The demand for female rubbers or masseuses is increasing, but however well acquainted you may be with the process, and expert in the work, you should be not only healthy but exceptionally robust, or you will not only derive injury yourself, but may injure your patient. In the first place you should be acquainted with Ling's Swedish system of gymnastics; have a practical knowledge of anatomy and physiology; going through a six months' course of instruction (at a cost of £10) at the Women's Medical College; and then a six months' training under a good shampoor, to complete your preparation for the vocation. You can obtain lessons in massage at the Hampstead Physical Training College, Broadhurst Gardens, N.W. The remuneration to be had for it rises from 3s. to 7s. 6d. an hour.

MAY OLIVER.—Lady students in London can find a residence at Russell House, Tavistock Square, W.C., of which the late principal was Miss Cail, who, with her sister, Miss Mary Cail, manage the institution. There is a committee, and also trustees forming the council, so that you may rely on the efficiency and respectability of the place.

ONSTANT READER OF "G.O.P."—The secretary of the College of Preceptors is C. B. Hodgson, Esq., 42, Queen Square, W.C.

WATER-LILY.—Your education would be very imperfect were you to omit reading certain standard works of fiction; but you should inquire of some competent person as to those suitable, in a moral or a religious point of view, to a girl of your age.

PRINCE'S PEARLS.—I. We have had articles on laying a table and waiting, etc. See vol. viii., p. 488, April 30th, 1887. 2. You should ask your lodgers which plan they prefer in frying eggs, as it is quite optional whether they be fried on one side only or turned; and whether rashers of bacon be served on the same dish with them or separately. Lay a napkin at the side of each person's plate, and when once used roll each and place them in rings, so that the lodgers may all know their own. Our articles on "Carving at Table," page 403, vol. iv.; and "Duties of Servants," pages 534 and 646, vol. ii., might be of use to you.

AN ANXIOUS MOTHER AND BLUE-EYED VIOLET should write to the Civil Service Commissioners, Cannon Row, Westminster, for their rules and prospectuses. Violet's writing would not pass as it now is. Writing, spelling, geography, and arithmetic are amongst the special requirements.

MISCELLANEOUS.

MRS. A. WARD (head-mistress of St. John's Schools, Canterbury Road, Brixton, S.W.) is thanked for her strong recommendation, from personal experience, of a home at Shaftesbury House, Seaside Road, Eastbourne, kept by a Mrs. Parsons. Terms for a bed in a dormitory, 12s. per week, inclusive, and for a private room 15s.; children 7s. 6d. All clean; food good and plentiful. Morning and evening family prayer (including reading and singing). We give the address of this Home of Rest very gladly, on the strong recommendations we have received, especially as so few can take in children with their mother, as in this case.

FRANCES S. I. (Bradshaw End, Cheshire).—We thank you for your recommendation of a respectable Home inquired for on the coasts of Brittany or Normandy. There is a pension for Protestants near Trouville, Normandy, which is open during the months of July, August, and September; terms 3 francs 50 centimes a day; but for this low charge they are required to attend to their own bedrooms, and bring their own bed and table linen with them, unless they prefer to pay a small sum extra. Address, Madame La Directrice, Maison Evangelique, Benzeval, Calvados, France. A letter of introduction from a clergyman or other respectable person is required; and the visits should date from the 1st or 15th of each month.

INQUISITIVE ONE.—You should read books of travels in all parts of the world, and books of antiquarian research, natural history in all its branches, and astronomy. Of the latter we have recently published one, illustrated. You do well in reading Sir W. Scott's works. You ought not to take singing lessons till you are sixteen, or you will spoil your voice; and, unless you mean to be a professional singer, an hour's practice daily is amply sufficient.

PRISCILLA.—Read our reply to "Inquisitive One." A visit to the seaside is good for the cure of hay fever.

FARMER'S DAUGHTER.—Your hen should be supplied with lime; old mortar should be scattered within her reach; and the nest where she lays her eggs should be darker than it is. If you cannot by these means prevent her from eating her eggs, either have her killed that she may not set the fashion to the other hens, or else burn the tips of her beak with a red-hot poker, so as to blunt it—a plan strongly recommended as quite effectual, and giving no pain whatever to the bird.

CHRISTINE.—You will find the recipe you require by reference to our indexes. Your hand is not formed.

PALLIE.—You are very much out of health, and ought to see a doctor. No one but a quack would prescribe for a girl or anyone without a personal interview. Did you never hear the proverb, "One man's meat is another man's poison"? We can only give general advice, whereas many cases are abnormal. The habits, hereditary tendencies, and surrounding circumstances of the patient, and the possible complications in the special case, should be known to the doctor engaged to prescribe. One thing we may tell you, that, being subject to fits, you should abstain from eating meat.

SARAH B.—Although we have only just accepted the idea of women lawyers in this country, they were common and very distinguished in former times elsewhere. Professor Calderina held the Chair of Jurisprudence in the University of Bologna in 1360, and Professor Novello, who occupied it subsequently in 1366, were equally celebrated not only for their legal lore and abilities, but for their remarkable personal beauty. There are many distinguished female lawyers in America at present, and the gifted lady who has taken her double degree in the University of Dublin has many supporters in the vocation she has adopted.

MOSS ROSE AND ARUM LILY.—The unsightly excrescences on your hands might be removed by acetic acid being lightly touched in the centre with a camel's hair brush. There are many prescriptions given in our several volumes ("G.O.P."), which you can find on reference to the indexes. See the article by "Medicus" on "Teeth like Pearls." Some kinds of teeth are naturally rather yellow, and cannot be whitened, but they can be made beautifully clean.

LEONORE.—Pronounce the "re" in the word livre as if there were no "e," only sound the "r," as if written "leavr." We know no remedy for the natural roughness of your arms.

JEANNIE.—The phrase now in such common use, "the almighty dollar," is a quotation from Washington Irving's "Creole Village," i.e., "the almighty dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout our land," etc.

FIDELIS.—We had pleasure in giving a little notice to your excellent society, "The King's Daughters," and are glad to hear that you will be able to establish a branch in Streatham, S.W., more especially as you so graciously attribute the event to our aid. We should be glad of any further information you could give us of the excellent society for invalids, called "The Shut-ins," of which we think you once wrote to us. We give your own address again, "Ventnor," Baldry Gardens, Streatham Common, S.W.

ADELINA.—See our answer to "Mrs. A. Ward," who gives so satisfactory an account of a home at Eastbourne.

COLINO.—Your verses need much revision. You should study the art of metrical composition before you attempt to write in verse. Your sentiments are good, but there is no originality of idea, without which there can be no genuine poetry.

LOUIE.—There is a consumption hospital at Brompton, S.W., which we believe is highly approved of.

F. E. S.—Glandular swellings indicate a consumptive or scrofulous taint in the blood, and may be caused by a bad cold. Mumps is a separate complaint; and persons of good constitutions may suffer from an attack, either induced by infection or a cold.

A LONELY GIRL.—We do not know on what grounds you objected to your lover going to see your mother. Was the connection between you clandestine? The great mistake was that you did not always meet at her house, and with her sanction.

BARBARA.—You should use the spectacles called "Clearers" at once, when your sight begins to fail. An aching round the eyeball, at the back and under the brows, is an indication of mischief, perhaps a little congestion; and your eyes need an oculist's advice, and the use of glasses of a power prescribed expressly to suit them.

LADY DOROTHY.—Your action was hasty in the extreme. You should have consulted your parents first. All you can now do is to place the matter in their hands, and let them act for you. They should politely inform him that the conditional engagement formed was without their permission, which he was bound in honour to have obtained before entering into any sort of compact, conditional or not, with their daughter; that it was clear to them that this indiscreet and hasty consent on her part had been repented of, and that they hoped that this representation of the case would appeal at once, not only to his good sense and knowledge of what is right, but his kind feeling towards one for whom he professed a regard.

"JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."—We are glad to give information or advice to our brothers as well as our sisters, and rejoice to hear that you have found benefit from reading our magazine. The Christian Progress Scripture Reading and Prayer Union, of which the Rev. Ernest Boys, Beverley, Sidcup, Kent, is the secretary, is a good one; headquarters, Exeter Hall, London, W.C. Also the Bible and Prayer Union—the Rev. T. Richardson, Vicar of St. Benet's, Mile End Road, London, E., secretary and director—is likewise an excellent one.

CARRIE.—No, the treatment of the ostrich in obtaining their feathers is not such as shown towards the poor goose. When fully ready for use the feathers are cut with a sharp knife, not pulled out, each taken very carefully, when the stumps dry up and wither and fall out, or are easily removed in about ten days afterwards. The finest white plumes fetch about £10 a pound weight; but the small ones, from very young birds, of eight or ten months old, are not worth more than about 30s. the pound weight. The largest quantity of these feathers comes from the Cape; some 35,000 birds supplying about 300,000 pounds a year. Smaller supplies come from Egypt, Morocco, Tripoli, and Buenos Ayres, at which latter place, however, the race is dying out, because, instead of cutting the feathers, they slaughter the birds.

N. D.—A gargle of a slight solution of powdered alum and water, or taking some tannin lozenges, might be of service to your relaxed throat, as well as bathing it outside with vinegar and water.

PHIBBS.—There is much freeness in your versification, also poetic feeling. "The brave heart" is good through the first four verses, but then needs revision. Count the syllables of corresponding lines, and let the beat fall always on their corresponding syllables.

EMILY SEVERN.—Old back numbers of the "G.O.P." are not "to be had at less cost than new ones," nor, in fact, are they to be had at our office at any cost.

MARIE.—You had better read our article on "Teeth like Pearls." Powdered chalk and mild unscented soap, used alternately night and morning, we consider much preferable than the use of salt; the latter would irritate the gums. There is no cure for moles. Warts may be removed.

DOLLYPIG.—Linseed oil may be as good as glycerine as a component part of your recipe for bronchitis; but you should get medical advice. There could be no irreverence in using an accordion to support your voice in singing hymns.

A DESOLATE ONE, "who desires a loved one," cannot pay her addresses nor propose to "the good young man." We regret that "the future happiness of the 'Desolate One'" should "depend on" the reciprocity of love between them.

A. WHITE.—The origin of the name of the London suburb, "Gospel Oak," may be found in the fact that it was customary, in ancient times, when marking the boundaries of parishes, to halt at remarkable trees, and recite passages from the Holy Gospels. At Burley Lodge, New Forest, there is a fine group of twelve oak trees, which go by the name of "the Twelve Apostles." They stand on the property of Lord Bolton. Old Herrick says—

... "Dearest, bury me
Under that holy oak, or Gospel-tree,
Where, though thou see'st not, though may'st think upon

Me, when thou goest procession. . ."

GRATEFUL FOR A REPLY.—There is no demand for translations, except for those of scientific works, at least as a general rule; nor for such as those to which you refer, at any rate.

E. CHAMPION.—We think that the Home of Rest for Ladies, Bognor, Sussex, will answer your case. It is supported by the Merchant Taylors' Company; apply to Francis Faithfull, Esq., Merchant Taylors' Hall, Threadneedle Street, E.C. Three letters are required, from a clergyman, doctor, and a lady householder, respectively. No charge is made for railway fare, board, lodging, nor servants' fees. There are three essential requirements with which an applicant for admission must comply, i.e., that she must be a "lady," one in need of such assistance, and quite convalescent.

M. and E.—Of course your respective mothers "do not like you to stay out after dark," because no respectable girls venture to do so; it would be as much as their reputation is worth to do so. Remember that mothers have a right to enforce obedience, and you should submit respectfully and willingly.

ALICIA.—We doubt your suitability for the sort of work you wish to undertake, instead of domestic service. However, you might apply to Miss Webb, 127, Vauxhall Bridge Road, London, S.W., secretary for the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East, etc. Should you be found ineligible, you might be employed as a "Bible-woman" at home.

IGNORANT ONE.—If true that "in gentlemen's company you are very objectionable," we advise you to remain at home when your family go out amongst their friends. Study our series of articles on "Good Breeding."

MAY BIRD.—Consult our indexes for an answer so often given as to the cleaning of piano-keys and ivory in general.

RESTLESS ONE should use two pillows instead of one at night, and tie up her lower jaw; and then perhaps she would not snore. It may be that she suffers from a relaxation of the tonsils or uvula; and gargling with a solution of powdered alum and water, or tannin lozenges, might help to cure the snoring. Young people ought not to make any noise in breathing.

EVENSONG.

The light grows dim
Upon the purple mountains, and I raise

My little hymn
To mingle with the universal praise.

From all around,
Fields, woods, and sea, low wind-borne songs arise—

One restful sound
Of holy peace ascends into the skies.

God of the day,
Thou art the fount of light and life to all;

Thou art my stay,
And with a hymn of praise on Thee
I call.

God of the night,
Through veiling shadows still Thine eye can see,

For Thou art light;
And, safely curtained, I can rest in Thee.

SISTER-CROWNS.

By JESSIE M. E. SAXBY.

THE Highland hills wore diadems of snow;
A garland pure was twined for maiden's hair;
While sister-blossoms, that so whitely blow,
Were woven in a cross with tearful prayer.

Belovèd hands set on one gentle head
The bridal wreath—the crown of womanhood;
And o'er the other's buried bosom laid
The symbol of our pain—the holy rood.

So lightly stepped the happy, trusting bride!
So very still the "folded" sister lay!
Life wore its flowers with conscious joy and pride,
Death meekly took its tokens of decay.

The sun shone brightly, though 'twas wintertime,
Upon the orange flower, the deathly yew;
The bells rang out their glad, melodious chime,
And brooding parent-hearts yearned o'er the Two:

The maid at altar, and the maid asleep,
The sisters that in harmony had grown;
Both given away, for God and man to keep,
Both nestlings of one home, both fledged and flown!

And as the mother thought of what had been,
And as the father breathed a silent prayer,
Their souls were well assured that One unseen
Had each dear daughter in His tender care.

O blossoms white! O virgin crown and cross!
How much of love that cannot speak ye tell.
Mute tokens of parental pride and loss,
Of faith and hope, which say "He doeth
well."

CHAPTER VIII.

AT THE GRANGE.

As Miss Sefton spoke, the lane widened before them, and the hedgerows gave place to a short avenue of elms, the sunlight filtering through the thick interlaced branches, and throwing quivering shadows on the white road below; a low white gate opened into a meadow where some cattle were grazing, and on the right hand side was a large, straggling red house, with picturesque stables half smothered in ivy. The hall door stood open, and a fine Scotch deerhound lay basking in the afternoon sun; he roused himself lazily as the pony carriage stopped before the door, and as Bessie alighted he came up to her wagging his tale slowly, and put his long, slender nose into her hand.

"What a beautiful creature!" exclaimed Bessie, who was exceedingly fond of all dumb animals; "look how friendly he is, as though he were welcoming me to The Grange."

Miss Sefton, who was patting the sleek sides of Jack and Jill, looked round carelessly.

"Mac is a good old dog, but he is not always so amiable to strangers; he has his likes and dislikes, as we humans have, only I must tell Richard that he has taken to you—he is his property. Now let us go and find mamma." And Edna locked her arm in Bessie's, and followed closely by the deerhound, led her into the house.

There was no servant in attendance; a strange hush and stillness seemed to pervade the place. Bessie almost felt oppressed by it. The hall was large and dark, with a smooth, slippery floor, and was panelled in dark oak; oak settles and large carved antique cabinets were ranged round the walls. The great fireplace was filled with green boughs, and a tiger-skin, with a huge grinning head and eyes, lay before it. The quiet little country girl had never seen such a hall in her life.

"Take care; our oak floors are slippery to people who are unused to them," observed Edna. "Mamma is in the drawing-room, I suppose." And she opened the door and ushered her companion into a handsome room, with three windows opening on to a lawn. A lady, who was sitting on a couch reading, rose as she perceived the two girls, and crossed the room with a slow, stately step.

"Mamma, I have brought Miss Lambert."

"I am very glad to see her, Edna. My dear," taking Bessie's hand and kissing her cheek, "you are very welcome, for your father's sake."

"Thank you," returned Bessie, with unusual shyness, for Mrs. Sefton's stateliness rather awed her. Both her words and her manner were kind; nevertheless Bessie found it difficult to respond; even when Mrs. Sefton had established her in the corner of the couch, and was questioning her with polite interest about her journey, she found herself answering in almost monosyllabic replies, as though she were tongue-tied.

"I cannot tell what came over me," she wrote the next day to her mother; "I never felt so bashful and stupid in my life; and yet Mrs. Sefton was most kind and considerate, only her graciousness seemed to crush me. She is very handsome, far handsomer than her daughter, slightly stout, but such a grand-looking figure; Miss Sefton and I look like pigmies beside her; but there is one thing that strikes me about her—a sort of hardness when she is not speaking. I never saw a mouth close so tightly; and then there is no rest in her face. I could not help thinking about father's story as I looked at her; it is not the face of a happy woman. I can imagine that disappointment in her husband has hardened her. I admire her very much; she fascinates, and yet repels me, but I do not think I could ever love her very much. Miss Sefton does, but then her mother dotes on her."

Bessie was devoutly wishing herself at home during that first quarter of an hour, but after a few minutes Mrs. Sefton's questions ceased, and she touched a silver mounted gong beside her, and almost as though by magic the door was thrown noiselessly back, and the butler entered with the tea-tray, followed by a footman in smart livery. Bessie wondered what her mother would have thought of the delicate Worcester china that was placed on a low table beside Mrs. Sefton, while a second table was quickly covered with bread and butter and dainty-looking cakes. Edna had thrown off her hat, and had coaxed Bessie to do the same; then she proceeded to wait on her guest. A little table was placed at Bessie's elbow, and all manner of sweet cakes forced on her. The very tea had a different flavour from her mother's tea; it was scented, fragrant, and mellow with rich country cream. Bessie sipped her tea and crumbled her rich cake, and felt as though she were in a dream. Outside the smooth shaven lawn stretched before the windows, there was a tennis net up, and some balls and rackets were lying on the grass. Some comfortable wicker chairs were placed under a large elm at the bottom of the lawn.

"Do you play tennis?" asked Edna, abruptly, as she noticed Bessie's eyes were wandering to the garden.

"A little; I am fond of the game, but I have not played a great deal; it takes time, and there is so much to do."

"Edna plays beautifully," observed Mrs. Sefton. "It is a fine exercise for young people if they are moderate, and do not over-exert themselves. We have some neighbours, the Athertons, who come in nearly every day to practise with Edna."

"Does not your brother play with you sometimes?" asked Bessie.

"Richard? Oh no!" And Edna's lip curled a little disdainfully. "He is far too busy to waste his time on me—he prefers playing cricket with the village lads at Melton. By the bye, mamma, I left Richard at the station; he said he had business with Malcolmson, and would not be home much before dinner."

"Indeed, I am sorry to hear it," returned Mrs. Sefton, coldly; "of course it was no use my warning him against any dealings with Malcolmson; Richard will go his own way; but I confess that this infatuation for Malcolmson vexes me much," and a slight frown crossed Mrs. Sefton's white forehead.

"Was the young man with two splendid dogs that I passed in the waiting-room your brother?" asked Bessie, in some surprise.

"Yes, that was Richard," returned Edna; and she added, a little maliciously, "I can see you are a little surprised. I suppose you took him for a young farmer or gamekeeper. Richard is terribly clownish in appearance."

Bessie thought this speech was in very bad taste, but she replied quietly—

"I cannot say I noticed your brother, but one of the dogs attracted my attention, he had such a fine head; I should think Landseer would have enjoyed painting him."

"Oh, that must have been Gelert; everyone admires him; I know Neville coveted him. Now we have finished tea, and I daresay you will be glad to get rid of the dust of your journey, so I will undertake to show you your room. Mamma was going to put you into the big spare room, but I insisted that you would prefer a smaller one. Was I right, Miss Lambert?"

"Perfectly right, thank you," returned Bessie as she rose with alacrity.

Mrs. Sefton's eyes followed her curiously as she crossed the room.

"A healthy, fresh-coloured country girl," she said to herself; "quite a little rustic; but she seems a nice, harmless little thing; though why Edna took such a fancy to her rather puzzles me. I thought she would take after her father, but I can see no likeness. What a handsome fellow he was, poor Herbert—and so gentlemanly." And here Mrs. Sefton sighed; for to her it was always a perilous thing to recall the past. No woman had ever been so foolish as she; she had cast away gold for dross.

While her hostess was indulging in these heavy reflections, Bessie was uttering little staccato exclamations of delight at the sight of the room allotted her.

"What a lovely view!" she had observed, running to the window, for not only was the pretty shady garden to be seen, but some meadows, and a glimpse of a fir wood in the distance; and it all looked so cool and still, and the only objects of moving life were some white lambs, feeding by their mothers, and a pretty brown foal with its dam.

"Do you think you will like your room?" asked Edna, demurely; but there was a gleam of fun in her eyes as she put the question, for she had a vivid remembrance of Bessie's room at home; the strips of faded carpet, the little iron bedstead, and painted drawers; and yet it had been a haven of rest to her that night, and she had slept very sweetly on the little hard bed.

"It is far too grand for me," returned Bessie, candidly. "I shall feel like a fine lady, for the first time in my life." And she looked round her with admiring scrutiny, noting every detail—the wax candles and hothouse flowers on the toilet-table, the handsome wardrobe and cheval glass, the writing-table with its dainty appendages, and the cosy-looking couch; even the brass bedstead, with its blue cretonne hangings, and frilled pillow cases, demanded some fresh comment.

"I think it is a lovely room, and far too good for me," finished Bessie.

"All our rooms are very comfortable," was the careless response; "but one is too used to this sort of thing to notice it. Now shall I send Brandon to help you? She is our maid, and understands hair-dressing perfectly. She will help you unpack, and arrange your things."

"Oh, no, thank you!" returned Bessie, in such an alarmed voice that Miss Sefton laughed; and then she continued, in rather a shamefaced manner, "You see I am not like you, Miss Sefton. I have not been used to luxuries and being waited on; we are plain people, and wait on ourselves."

"Just as you like," was the indifferent answer. "Brandon is the comfort of my life, though she is such a cross old thing. Now, Bessie—I am going to call you Bessie, and I beg you to lay aside the stiff Miss Sefton—you must tell me if I can lend you anything, or help you in any way. And you are not to trouble about making yourself smart, for we have no one coming to dinner to-day, and I shall only put on an old dress. We are in the country now, and I don't mean to waste my fine London gowns on Richard, who calls every material dimity, and never knows whether one is dressed in velvet or sackcloth."

Bessie smiled, and then asked if she might use any of the flowers on her toilet table.

"My dear child, just look behind you," was the amused answer; and Bessie saw a breast-knot of lovely crimson roses on the writing-table; "those are for your use to-night, but if you will let me know every morning what colour you want for the evening I will tell Brandon."

As Bessie was unpacking she heard a faint scratching at her door, and on opening it found, to her great surprise, Mac, the deerhound, sitting on his haunches with a very pleading look in his beautiful brown eyes.

"You may come in if you like, old fellow," she said, wondering at his sudden friendship for a stranger; and sure enough the hound walked in and stretched himself under the writing-table with his nose between his paws, quietly observant of every movement.

When Bessie had finished her unpacking, she proceeded to brush out her bright, brown hair, and arrange it in her usual simple fashion. Then she put on the dress of cream-coloured nun's veiling, which was cut square and trimmed with her mother's lace; and when she had clasped the pearls round her neck, and had pinned on her roses, she felt she had never been so well dressed in her life, and, indeed, the girl's freshness and sweet expression made her very pleasant to look upon.

Bessie was sitting at the window thinking of Hatty when Edna entered, looking like a young princess to her dazzled eyes. The old gown proved to be a delicate blue china silk, and was trimmed in a costly fashion, and she wore at her throat a locket with a diamond star. As she came sweeping into the room, with her long train and fair coronet of hair, she looked so graceful and so handsome that Bessie uttered an admiring exclamation.

"Oh, don't look at me," observed Edna, rather pettishly. "I have told Brandon I really must discard this gown; it is getting too bad even for quiet evenings."

"I think it lovely," returned Bessie, much surprised at this remark; "I thought it was quite new."

"Oh no, it is nearly a year old, quite a patriarch in gowns, and besides, I am getting so tired of blue. Mamma likes me best in white, and I agree with her; but you look very nice, Bessie, more like a crimson-tipped daisy than ever. You remind me so of a daisy—a humble little modest bright-eyed thing."

"Thank you, Miss Sefton," returned Bessie, blushing at such an unexpected compliment. "I think I must tell Hatty that."

"Hatty! Oh, you mean the little pale-faced sister with the clever eyes. Now, what did I say to you? That I preferred Edna to Miss Sefton. Oh, there goes the second gong, and Richard has only just come in. Mamma will be so vexed at his unpunctuality. Why, I declare if Mac has not taken up his quarters under your table. I suppose he approves of Miss Daisy as much as I do."

Edna chatted after this fashion as she tripped down the oak staircase, while Bessie followed her more slowly. They found Mrs. Sefton in a somewhat ruffled mood. She looked handsomer than ever in her grey silk dress; her hands were blazing with diamond rings; her dark hair was still unmixed with grey, and hardly needed the lace cap that covered it.

"Richard has only just come in, mamma; need we wait for him?"

"It is our duty to wait for the master of the house, Edna, however much we are inconvenienced by the delay." And Mrs. Sefton fanned herself with a dissatisfied expression. "Your brother never thinks of our comfort, as long as he is engrossed with his own occupations. I must apologise to you, Miss Lambert, for our unpunctuality. I am sure, after such a journey, you must need your dinner."

"I am not at all hungry, thank you," replied Bessie, whose appetite was not stimulated by her hostess's aggrieved remarks. She sat literally on thorns during the next five minutes, while Mrs. Sefton fanned herself, and Edna walked up and down the room, humming snatches of songs, and then breaking off into a sarcastic observation on the length of Richard's toilet.

"I shall expect great results," she was just saying, as the door opened and a tall, broad-shouldered young man advanced rather awkwardly into the room.

"I am afraid I am late again, mother," he began, apologetically; but Mrs. Sefton apparently took no notice of this remark, except by a slight shrug of her shoulders.

"We have been waiting half-an-hour," broke in Edna, with a pout. "You get worse and worse, Richard. Now, will you take in my friend, Miss Lambert, and mamma and I will follow?"

Bessie rose at once, as Mr. Sefton offered his arm, but beyond a stiff bow he took no further notice of her. His face wore a moody expression as they seated themselves at the table. His reception had evidently damped him.

Bessie glanced at him. Richard Sefton was certainly not handsome; his features were rather heavily moulded; he had a reddish moustache that hid his mouth, and closely-cropped hair of the same colour. His evening dress set rather awkwardly on him, and he had looked far better in his tweed coat and knickerbockers. Bessie was obliged to confess that Edna had been right in her description; there was something clownish about his appearance, and yet he looked a gentleman.

"Have you nothing to tell us, Richard?" asked Mrs. Sefton, sharply, when the silence had lasted long enough.

"Nothing that will interest you," he replied, rather gloomily; and Bessie noticed that his voice was not unpleasant. "I have been with Malcolmson all the afternoon." And he looked steadily at Mrs. Sefton as he spoke.

A slight flush crossed her face, but she evidently did not trust herself to answer.

"I know our opinions differ about him," he continued, as though forcing himself to speak; "but for my part I think him a clear-headed, reliable fellow. He has done my business well, and has relieved me of a great deal of responsibility."

"I hope you will not have cause to repent your rashness, Richard," was the severe answer; but Edna, who was watching her mother's countenance with some anxiety, interfered in an airy fashion—

"Oh, pray don't begin to talk business, Richard, or you will make mamma's head ache. You know she can't bear to hear Malcolmson's name mentioned. All this is not very amusing for Miss Lambert; can't you find something interesting to suit a young lady?" But if Edna hoped to pose as a peacemaker, she failed signally, for a sullen look came to her brother's face, and, with the exception of slight attention to his guest's wants, and a few remarks about her journey and the weather, Richard made no further attempt to be agreeable.

ART AND HEART;

OR,

DECORATION FOR THE POOR.

PART I.

HE teaching of Mr. Ruskin, no less than his life and its example, has wrought a deep influence on many who, nevertheless, would not admit his agency. We need only point to the Whitechapel Fine Art Exhibition, the People's Palace, and Mr. Horsfall's Manchester Museum, as evidences that some at least of his lessons have sunk into minds that have proved responsive to them.

That there is no true "art" where there is no true "heart" is one side of his teaching, and the life of this preacher-critic, with its sacrifice and spending of self, go far to show the further truth, that where true heart exists—that is, where there are love for and sympathy with one's fellow—there ought to spring (and does spring) from this a desire to ask all men to come in and sit down and share in the beauty and fitness of such things lovely as we can put before our fellows. The Beautiful is not, as one writer would always put it, the True, but it may often lead to it.

It was the recognition of the belief that art is a message from man to man, and that those who can speak that message should not be dumb, which gathered together some twelve or thirteen years ago a little band of art-workers. For the initiative in this, still further thanks are due to Miss Miranda Hill, whose name is so well known from its association with that of her sister, Miss Octavia Hill, in all kinds of work that lighten the lives of the poor. In a circular-letter addressed to certain of her friends, she pleaded for the formation of "A Society for the Diffusion of Beauty." "We have," she said in this letter, "a Society for the Diffusion of Christian Knowledge. It is quite as Christian a work, if taken up in the right spirit, to endeavour to spread beauty, since we look on beauty as of God's appointment, and as one of His ministers for good." This sentence foreshadows the scope of the work undertaken, firstly, by those who gathered round her, and, later, by a larger, and still widening, circle of friends. Under the name Miss Hill had proposed those associated together worked for a couple of years. It then seemed to them that the title was perhaps a little unwieldy and awkward, and they determined to rename the Society, and to select some such title as should be short and apt. The result was that in a re-constituted and reorganised state it announced itself to the world as "The Kyrle Society for bringing Beauty home to the Poor."

"But why Kyrle?" the reader will ask. "Who and what was Kyrle? And why choose the word to act as the name-giver of your Society?" Well, in the first place, its brevity gave it an advantage over many other names proposed; and in the second, the fact that the explanation of it to the "earnest enquirer" brings out the statement of our objects seemed a further gain.

"But all our praises why should lords engross?"

Rise, honest Muse, and sing the Man of Ross!

With this invocation Pope* enters on a description of his type of the charitable, benevolent man. He draws the portrait in vivid colours, and sings of a blameless life, full of kindly work for others. He contrasts the death of the "Man of Ross," deplored and wept by all the country round, and his monument, the church "he built to God, and not to fame," with those of the miser, at whose death he says—

"A thousand lights attend
The wretch, who living, saved a candle's end."

John Kyrle, the Man of Ross, was born in Dymock in 1637, and lived well on into the next century, dying at the ripe age of ninety. His estate was situated in the town of Ross, in Herefordshire, and small though his income was (never amounting to more than £500 a year), yet he used his resources to such good purpose, that his name is still "had in remembrance" as a type of the unostentatious doer of good deeds.

Some of his work for others Pope enumerates, and describes his love for the beautiful finding vent in planting and hanging with woods "the mountain's sultry brow," and tells how he led through the village the little hill-side rill—

"Not to the skies in useless columns tossed,
Or in proud falls magnificently lost,
But clear and artless, pouring through the plain Health to the sick, and solace to the swain."

And then, asks the poet—

"Whose causeway parts the vale with shady rows?
Whose seats the weary traveller repose?
Who taught that Heav'n-directed spire to rise?
'The Man of Ross,' each lisping babe replies."

Such, and other deeds of a kindred nature, all tending to the pleasure and the gain of his humbler neighbours, and all given freely and gladly, formed the life-work of John Kyrle. And at the end, when he had done what he could to make lighter and brighter the lives of others, he "stole to rest, unheeded and unseen."

* "Moral Essays," Ep. iii., v. 249.

But the Society of which we are writing has partly removed Pope's further reproach—"His race, his form, his name almost unknown."

We have at all events done our best in that direction, inasmuch as we have elected John Kyrle if not as our "patron," at all events as our sponsor and our name-giver.

So much for a brief account of the rise of the Kyrle, and the origin of its name; to which we would add as concisely as possible that it has grown and prospered exceedingly, and numbers amongst its supporters and workers many names in different fields of art with which our readers would be acquainted. This series of papers, however, does not by any means profess to be an account in detail of its work, nor indeed an appeal for assistance. It is not that we scorn, or are superior to, offers of help in work or in kind. But it seems likely that the interests which the Society has at heart will be better served if we explain in detail at all events part of its operations; and trust to those who are interested in them and feel they would fain "go and do likewise" to form their own separate agencies, and to work side by side with the same end and object in view.*

The work of the Society in the main consists of four branches; but it is with only one of those that we now propose to deal. It brings the influences that beauty in nature and in art must needs exercise upon the people home to them by the following means:—

(1.)—The Society decorates by mural paintings, pictures, and so on, workmen's clubs, schools, hospitals, and such places of the poor.

(2.)—It lays out as gardens available pieces

* In connection with this we would remark that whilst the head office is at No. 14, Nottingham Place, London, W., there are branch societies in Birmingham, Cheltenham, Dublin, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Leicester, Liverpool, and Nottingham. The present articles, however, are confined to the work done by the London Society.

of waste ground, and presents such open spaces with benches, or when occasion needs, gymnasias.

(3.)—It gives, by the aid of its voluntary choir of singers, oratorios and concerts to the poor.

(4.)—It distributes, monthly, very large numbers of books and magazines to hospitals, infirmaries, and clubs in need of such help.

And in all these different lines of work it only exacts or saddles itself with two conditions:—

Firstly, that its assistance shall be given without payment, and without any distinction of creed. And, secondly, that the recipients shall do, in conjunction with the Society, all they can on their parts towards supplying the want they feel.

It is with the first of these four divisions of work that we propose to deal. In these days, when so many of the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER have studied drawing and painting, there must be many of them who want a field for the exercise of such skill as they have acquired, and whose "heart" would prompt them to make their poorer friends sharers in their "art," if they but had hints or suggestions as to the practical way of doing so. Every town has its hospital, infirmary, workhouse, boys' and girls' institute, and men's, boys', and girls' clubs. Many villages have their cottage hospital, schools, village hall, and club or institute. And the fact remains that few of these in town or in country convey any other art lesson than can be inculcated by the inspection of walls coloured "workhouse blue," tastefully set off with a dado painted mud colour. And yet how easy it is in place of an ugly room to have a pretty one, or to change one that is cheerless and triste into something which, if simple, is at all events bright and fresh and gay! Those coming into contact with hospital patients who have gone through their time of suffering in the room that is thus brightened know (for they are told often enough) how thoroughly appreciated by the sick ones is a painting of a bunch of wild flowers, or of a view of the breezy Surrey hills. There is a certain amount of mild envy, the nurses have often told us, felt by those whose fate it is to be ill in an ordinary and undecorated ward, for such as have the better fortune to be relegated to one where the Kyrle Society has been at work. "Why, I assure you," once said a ward-sister, "as soon as the ward was finished in all its brightness and prettiness, there seemed quite a run on it." And bearing in mind that the sick body is too often the result or accompaniment of the tired and weary mind, we generally choose for hospital decoration such a treatment and such subjects as can be easily "understood of the people." Purists may object to decorative panels or friezes in which the attempt has been to make the flowers represented as naturalistic as possible. But how often have we found that a painting can best touch and teach the uneducated mind in so far as it leaves conventionalism behind. A flower should be represented simply, and as it grows. We think that to the sick labourer or navvy "the primrose by the river's brim" is most likely to be the object-lesson that all real art is if it readily recalls to him the flower that grows along the Dorset or Surrey lanes he left behind him so many years ago. Let it, as he would say, "look as if it grewed there," and remind him, as he lies weak and quiet, of boyish walks beside the country hedges sown thick with little yellow stars, and then it not only "a simple primrose is to him," but something more—much more.

On the other hand, when we come to treat other classes of institutions, we choose a different and wider range of subject. Friezes of allegorical figures, a well-known tale illustrated by a series of panels, conventional ornaments, inscriptions, or mottoes, all are used as occasion serves.

The way in which a piece of decorative work is put in train is generally as follows. An application for assistance in making some "place of the poor" more bright and cheerful is received by the Decoration Committee. It is drawn up on a printed form, specifying the name, locality, and objects of the building in question, the terms of its tenure,* what portion of it our help is asked for, the size—roughly—of this room or rooms, and other details to enable the committee to consider the application in all its bearings. If we see our way to assistance, the next step is to depute some member of the society to visit the place, and to report on its needs and suitability for decorative treatment. The member at the same time suggests some method of dealing with it, and gives—on the basis of past experience—an outline of the cost likely to be incurred. If a grant in accordance with this report is made, the room is then measured and a scale-drawing is got out, showing what is proposed. And this measuring and drawing of the "elevations," I would here say, is certainly not one of the easiest parts of the work to get done. Many amateurs can scheme out on paper an effective idea of colour-treatment for a room, but it seems far more difficult to find one who can make a workman-like set of scale-drawings showing its four walls.

* Of course if the building is held on only a short tenure, this stands in the way of its receiving permanent decoration.

The work is then allocated to different artists, being in some cases divided amongst half-a-dozen or more helpers, each, however, working according to the pre-arranged plan, and under the "headship" of the designer of the whole. There are those whose strong point is in figure-drawing, and others whose forte is conventional-pattern work, or flowers, or landscape, or lettering, and according to his or her "line" each worker does a share of the general scheme. As a rule the only paid labour is that of the carpenter employed to do any necessary frame-making, and to fix and put up the decoration when completed.

In this and the following papers we propose to set before the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER some specimens of Kyrle Society work. And this, not so much with a view of recording the help the Society has tried to render to others, as of pointing out to a wide circle various inexpensive and effective methods of execution that we have only felt our way to after much experimenting.

The illustrations we give in this number represent the decoration lately carried out at the Victoria Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Victoria Park. We propose in our next article to describe at length the design as carried out, and its cost.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER VIII. LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

ON the afternoon preceding the night on which the one-inch net was found on Noah's eel-set, Eve, it will be remembered, left her father's side suddenly after the report of a gun had been heard, to go for a walk. That gun was a signal. It told Eve that Mr. Arthur Clifford, who was staying at the rectory, was tired of Grace Leicester's society, and was going to walk to a certain heronry about a mile from the ark, and would be glad of her company. It was not the first nor the second walk they had taken together during this last visit of Mr. Clifford's, and the walks had been so delightful that Eve never paused to ask herself if they were wrong, or if she would like her father to know of them. And so this afternoon she started off, following the course of the river for about half a mile, but paying little attention to the beautiful sedges which rustled in the breeze or the forget-me-nots and wild marsh-marigolds which lined its banks, gleaming blue and yellow among the fresh green grass at her feet. On she walked, till she reached a clump of pollard willows, from among which a gentleman in a tweed suit, with high boots and a large hat, like the broadmen, came forward and greeted her. He was of middle size, well-proportioned, well-dressed, and his easy carriage at once proclaimed him a gentleman; he was a handsome man, with curly brown hair, brown eyes, good features, with a good-tempered rather than an intellectual type of face, and a general air of contentment, and a determination to enjoy the good things the gods provided him; and they provided him with many of the things of this world generally supposed to bring happiness. He was rich, of good family, handsome, worshipped by his mother and sisters, popular among his acquaintances, loved by his friends; what more could he desire to make him happy? A few months ago he would have said nothing; but if you had asked him this afternoon, he would have said one thing was indispensable to his future happiness, and that one thing his mother and sisters, who had plenty of family pride, would think him mad to desire. Mr. Leicester, who had been his guardian since his father died, would be of the same opinion, and yet he had come to the conclusion he could not live without it, and was determined at all costs to have it; and this thing so necessary to his happiness was no other than Eve.

"How long you have been, Eve! I have been waiting ages," he said impatiently.

"I came directly I heard the gun, and I walked fast, too; you can't have been here very long," said Eve, archly.

"It seemed long to me."

"Ah, that is because you are so impatient to know what plans I have made for your lordship's pleasure to-night; you think of nothing but fishing."

"How can you say such a thing when you know it is you I am thinking of, morning, noon, and night. But have you asked your father to let me come and see him set his net to-night?" said Arthur, who, partly because he really wished to see the process of netting eels, but still more because he wished for Eve's society, had begged to be allowed to come to the ark one evening.

"No; his net is broken, so he is not going to fish to-night; but I have made a capital plan," said Eve, and then she proceeded to describe her plan.

It was that Mr. Clifford should come to the ark about half-past seven that evening, when Noah would be at the decoy, and Mrs. Oldman at Fordham, and that he and Eve should set Noah's old one-inch mesh on his eel-set. Eve then undertook to lower the net, if any wherries passed, for she could hear them whistle as she lay in bed, and could easily jump out of her window, which, as the ark was only one storey high, was only a few feet from the ground, and lower the net without her father or mother knowing. All this was easy enough to do—the difficulty was to take up the net after it was set, and to dispose of the eels; and after much discussion, they came to the conclusion it would be better for Arthur to come at daybreak, let the eels go, haul up the net as quietly as possible, and put it back in the shed. He would never be able to catch the eels alone, and if he did he would not know what to do with them, as he could not use Noah's eel-trunks; moreover, as Eve explained, this small mesh was illegal, so it would not be right to keep the fish, but there could be no harm in setting it, just for the sake of the sport. Arthur Clifford agreed to this plan, as he would have agreed to anything else Eve suggested. His principal object was to have as much of Eve's society as possible. He cared a vast deal more for this than for eels or eel-nets.

They wandered slowly along the river-side, as they talked, till they reached a little boat belonging to Arthur Clifford; this was moored opposite a wide ditch or dyke, which was a short water-cut from the river to a large broad, which we will call Filton Broad; this dyke went by the name of the Muck Fleet, fleet being a Norfolk word for shallow, and muck for dirt of any kind. The name thus explained was more expressive than euphonious, for the water in the dyke was both shallow and muddy; small boats could and did traverse it, but wherries wanting to get from Filton Broad to Windham must go round by the river, a journey of two or three miles; whereas Muck Fleet was barely half a mile long. On one side of it lay some marshlands, rich in snipe in winter, their monotony varied by the quaint little windmills, which help to drain them; on the other side—the side nearer to Windham—lay some rich green pastures, now golden with buttercups, a brilliant, burning gold, which only Norfolk pastures seem able to produce to this extent. Sheep and cattle were peacefully grazing in the meadows, and about half way down Muck Fleet stood a plantation, chiefly of beeches, on the pasture side, in which was a heronry.

The pastures were several feet above the level of the water in Muck Fleet, which was affected by the tide, so that at low water a boat and its occupants would be invisible to people walking in the meadows, unless they came to the bank; and though the tide was flowing fast, only the hats of this pair of lovers were on a level with the pastures, as Arthur pulled his fair companion slowly up the dyke to the heronry, where the bank was lower, and they could land.

Arthur was in the act of shipping his oars, meaning to land, when the figure of Adam Day, who was strolling in the pasture, came to the bank to see who the occupants of the boat might be, just as Eve said—

"You must be sure and put the net back in the shed, mind, or we shall be found out."

Adam heard her, and though he did not know what she meant at the time, he guessed, directly he heard the one-inch mesh had been found on the set, that it must have been these two who set it; in fact, at the time he didn't pay much heed to her words, he was too much concerned to see her on such intimate terms with Arthur Clifford, though he was aware how much Arthur admired her; but until this moment he did not know they were in the habit of meeting clandestinely.

Except her father, there was no one Eve wished less to see at that moment than Adam Day, so pretending not to have noticed him, she said to her companion—

"Let us go on and have a peep at Filton Broad before we land."

Arthur took to his oars again with alacrity, for Eve had always refused to go further than from the river to the heronry with him, saying her father never allowed her to go in a boat unless he or Adam Day was with her, though, as Muck Fleet was so shallow, she thought he would not see any danger in her going for a little row there, forgetting that he would probably have seen a great deal of danger of a different kind in the companion of her excursions.

Eve was very silent as they went on up the dyke, thinking how angry Adam would be, and wondering whether he would tell her father; but as the banks got lower, and the dyke widened, and then Filton Broad burst upon them, the beautiful yet cumbersome wherries, with their rich coloured sails and their heavy cargoes, sailing slowly and majestically by; the fishing boats and the white sails of some trim yachts contrasting with the old-fashioned wherries; here and there a steam-barge invading the sleepy waters and poaching on the work of the wherries; the sunlit waters of the broad stretching out as far as they could see under the bright blue sky; the cold wind lightly rustling among the reeds and sedges which lined the borders of the lagoon; the gulls skimming lightly over the surface of the broad; the reed-wrens and buntings softly and sweetly discoursing among the rushes; the larks carolling joyously overhead—as Eve saw these sights and heard these sounds, and the salt breeze softly yet boldly kissed her cheeks, and spoke of the sea away across the broad, her spirits rose, and she clapped her hands with delight.

"Oh! how beautiful it is! I should like to be in one of those wherries, and sail away, away over the broad out to sea. I wonder where I should get to!" said Eve.

"You would get to Yarmouth first. I believe you can see the lights plainly from here at night. Shall we go one day, Eve?"

"Oh, no; I was only joking. Look at that wherry; how pretty it looks, with the sun catching its sails, doesn't it?"

"That one nearest us, you mean? Yes, it does; but I don't see why the owner should be spying at us through his glass."

"Is he? Then it must be Jack Farrar; he is sure to be about here somewhere, and he is always using his glass. We had better turn back," said Eve, uneasily, thinking the fates were against her that day, since she had been caught by two people.

"We had, if we are to set this net at half-past seven," said Arthur, looking at his watch.

The result of their evening's work is already known to us; and Adam's depression that night, and Eve's grief the next day, are now accounted for; while it is almost superfluous to say it was Arthur Clifford who, finding the mischief he had done, had sent Noah the five-pound note. Eve had been right in her suspicion that it was Jack Farrar who was spying at them through his glass, as they lay among the reeds and flags just outside Muck Fleet; but Farrar, though he recognised Eve, mistook Arthur in his broadman's hat for Adam Day, and, burning with jealousy, took his wherry round the next day and proposed to her. This, coupled with the fact that Adam arrived at the ark as he, having been rejected, was leaving it, convinced him that Adam was his favoured rival, encouraged by Noah; and mad with jealous anger against both Noah and Adam, he had tried to injure Noah's character, which the affair of the prohibited net rendered at first an easy task; and afterwards, failing in this, he had purposely destroyed Noah's eel-net. The trouble which the discovery of the net by the police had caused woke Eve's conscience to the sense that all these stolen meetings with Arthur Clifford were very wrong, and in the first blush of her repentance, when Noah was summoned, she resolved to have no more of them. But she woke also at the same time to another consciousness, and that was that she loved Arthur, and as this last feeling was a much more powerful one than the former, the resolutions were speedily broken. For a week after the net was discovered Eve did not go to the heronry, though she knew Arthur Clifford was waiting there every afternoon for her; but at the end of the week she could hold out no longer, so knowing that Noah and Adam were going to the decoy on Saturday afternoon, she resolved to go to the heronry, but she would walk there across the meadows instead of going up Muck Fleet in the boat, and to do this it was necessary to cross the river in her father's boat.

VARIETIES.

A REASON FOR DYING FIRST.

"Precedence of rank," says Furetière, "has its charms certainly, though I cannot go so far as a lady of my acquaintance who wished to die before her husband. I inquired of her the reason for wishing so extraordinary a thing.

"Because," said her ladyship, "'if my husband dies before me I cannot put his arms on his tomb, because he is not a man of family; though, should I die first, he can claim the right of placing my arms on my tomb, because I am a woman of quality by birth.'"

THE DROWNING BOY.

A little boy went one day into a river, and not having learned how to swim, had like to have been drowned. Seeing, however, a man at a distance, he called out to him for help. The man, as soon as he saw the boy's distress, began to expostulate with him on the folly of going into a river before he had learned to swim. The boy, instead of answering him, cried out:—

"Save me, save me; then chide as long as you will."—From the Persian.

IN GOOD COMPANY.

One day a friend of mine put into my hand a piece of scented clay. I took it and said to it—

"Art thou musk or ambergris, for I am charmed with thy perfume?"

It answered—

"I was a despicable piece of clay, but I was some time in the company of the rose; the sweet quality of my companion was communicated to me, otherwise I should only be a bit of clay as I appear to be."—Saadi.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

IN the vagaries and changes of the fashion for the coming winter we can find much cause for satisfaction, for we have dismissed the extremely high and ugly hats and bonnets, and have arrived at something unquestionably more elegant in its moderation. Yet there is really very little change in the shapes of either bonnets or hats, and hats seem this year to have been more worn in London than bonnets. The stringless bonnets have always had a very naked and unbecoming appearance to my mind, and so I am glad to say that all the newest shapes have strings, and for the most part they are of velvet, though the bows underneath the chin are very small, and have short ends not longer than the bows themselves. The hat or bonnet worn must harmonise with the dress below; but this winter they should be in accord with the small jacket or long mantle. If these be of a dark red, for example, the bonnet or hat must be dark red too. Black hats may, of course, be worn with any costume, and either bonnets or hats may be a combination of two colours, but one of the colours must agree with the mantle or dress.

Feathers appear to be the most popular trimmings, especially those of the ostrich, but the poor tortured birds, deformed and distorted, which made one miserable to see last year, are quite out of date; and only wings, which may be those of fowls or pigeons, and the commercial ostrich feather, are worn. Thus we may be thankful that the poor birds will have a respite from cruel, wholesale slaughter, and perhaps our sisters in the world may grow more thoughtful and kinder, and in time will learn to love God's creatures too much to wish to mutilate and kill them for fashion's sake. I have no words to say what I think of this dreadful sin; and I hope my girl and women readers will feel some of my horror of it.

One reason for the improvement in our millinery this winter is that we have got rid of some French ideas, and returned to our quieter English tastes; for all our ridiculous and foolish-looking savagery of topknots come from France. When we hold to our really English creations, the small and graceful "Princesse shape," and the coronet-fronted bonnets, we have something suited to the beauty of our island homes, where, a recent American writer declares, "a woman of forty looks and really is as young as an American woman of thirty."

Nearly all hats are of felt, of fine quality and light weight; the brim rather wide and flat in front, and turned up at the back. The crowns are low and the top flat. There is also a very modified boat-shape, which is very pretty. The ribbons for trimming both hats and bonnets are still wide, and are mounted in clusters on the top; but nothing is extreme. I have seen several straw hats with the crowns taken out and filled with a collection of ribbon bows, or a "Tam o' Shanter cap" of velvet. Hats and small "toques" to be worn with costumes, matching the material, and made on buckram crowns, the brims being of velvet; these crowns take two folds of a turban. There are quantities of very cheap hats, with cloth tops of every hue, to be purchased in the shops at present, and so no girl need be without a neat head-covering; and if she have clever fingers she can transform one of them into something quite different, by a little thought and trouble.

Bonnets seem to show a tendency to return to an addition of inside caps; and we find bows, quilled tulle, and lace gathered up underneath the bonnets with the flaring brims. Some of the newest bonnets are very small and close, and are quite of the cap order; but as yet it is impossible to say whether these will be taken up or not.

I have carefully illustrated most of the prettiest shapes of hats and bonnets, and have selected the simplest, so that they are quite suitable to be copied by the home-milliner, with whom I feel the greatest sympathy, and cordially desire to help. "In the New Gallery," the hats and costumes shown are exactly what is being worn in London to-day, and they will form a guide to the walking dress of the season. The "Two English Girls" show the two simplest and most ladylike bonnets, and the exact size of the bows beneath the chin. The "braided jacket," which is illustrated, shows the shape of felt hat which most of our girls now adopt for morning walking costume; it is bound round the edge with a narrow silk galloon. I notice a great leaning towards black and white in millinery; for instance, a black hat with white wings, a black bonnet with a white feather, or with bows of white silk or velvet; and they are generally worn by quiet and elegant people, who dress well without great expense or show.

And now I must put in a word on colours, of which the first and foremost seems to me to be grey, in its darker variations of a grey blue, some of which are very nearly blue. These new hues are called "vapeur," "princess grey," and "nunnery grey." They are not very dark, but are pretty, and likely to be useful. Yellows are hardly seen even in millinery. Red is very much worn, but it is no longer bright, but dull red and crimson. One dark brown red is very handsome, and is called "Veronese," as it reminds one of the tints of that master's pictures. There is also a very fine dark red known as carnation. Terracottas are very dark and rich, and more becoming than the early hue of that colour. Prune and dahlia are both found in cloth for ladies' wear, and in cloaks; but greys, browns, and very dark greens seem to be the predominating colours for the coming winter.

I must now turn to the subject of mantles and out-of-door raiment. In reality, there is not very much to say about them, for there is nothing worn but small jackets and long cloaks, with a few mantles here and there, which are jackets at the back, and have long pointed fronts, which make them look like long mantles more than anything else. Beaver cloth, lined with silk to ensure their slipping on and off over woollen dresses, forms the favourite material for these little jackets, and they are made up in all dark colours as well as neutral hues. The general shape is tight-fitting at the back and open in front, either with or without a waistcoat. Many of them have lapels and waistcoats of fur, and nearly all the jackets and mantles, if not fur-lined, are trimmed so as to make them look as if they were so. Sealskin jackets follow the same rule, and have open fronts and waistcoats of beaver. There are two small pockets on the right front, and one on the left front, of most jackets, having flaps to them. One very stylish mode of trimming a plain jacket is represented in our picture, entitled "In the New Gallery." It is striped with braid from the neck (and sometimes also from the armholes) to the edge, the braid ending in each case in a trefoil shape.

All the newest cloaks are made full. Some are put into a yoke, some gathered round the shoulders; and a cloak, called the "Bonne femme," has a shaped neck-piece, and the cloak is put into it in wide pleats. Some have pleated backs fitted in, the fronts being double, and fulled into the neck by means of pleats or "smocking." All the fronts are long and double, like the striped cloak in our illustration; and few, if any, sleeves or capes are to be seen. Ulsters of tweed and plain cloths have capes, which are large, and fall to the waist and below the hands. Some of these large capes have tabs across the front, which button down, and others have hoods. Macintoshes will be made with fitting backs and the new double fronts, instead of the short capes coming only from the back.

In our paper pattern we give one of the new fashionable skirts that are flat, straight, and alike on each side, giving the same general impression of plainness that is shown by a redingote and hanging straight from the waist. The dress-improver has disappeared in favour of two crinoline flounces, as seen on some people; or else a tiny pad and one steel, six inches below the waist; and the much-draped and full skirts of last year are apparently quite passed and gone.

Jerseys and Garibaldis are still as much worn as ever, though of course in thicker materials; but most of them are now worn with some description of sleeveless Eton or Zouave jacket, made in velvet, silk, or moiré, which are much used over lace jackets in the evening. These last-named have full sleeves in puffs, with a deep frill of lace falling over the wrists.

I forgot to say (in speaking of skirts) that the large outside pockets have been brought back again by the taste for everything of the Directoire period. Braiding is much used, and the skirts of plain cloth have a border of braiding round the edge, the pockets and waistcoat also being braided. Some ladies, who are fortunate enough to possess them, are using the lovely rich squares of Indian, Turkish, or other Oriental embroidery for vests, collar, and cuffs for woollen dresses, and very rich they look. Gowns, all of woollen material, are more seen than those mixed with velvet. Homespun, vicuna, ladies' cloth, and woollens mixed with silk are all worn, and all suit well with the present style of making up into long coat-like dresses, which are as long as the skirt, hang evenly all round, and, in fact, are mantle and skirt in one. Very long princess gowns and long polonaises are as much worn as the Directoire coats and redingotes; and all of them seem to be equally well suited for winter clothes. This style makes all stout, rich materials more popular than they have been for years past, and so we see the advent of poplins, brocades, and matelassé, all of which are "old friends with new faces."

Stripes continue to be the leading feature in all patterns, and are generally produced in subdued combinations of colour, very fine stripes in groups being the most popular. Checks are also seen, and are large and simple, and generally unbroken crossbars of lines on a plain ground, two colours crossing each other. Then we have bordered robes of all kinds and colours, and also Persian and Indian tapestry designs, for both dresses and cloaks, and flannel with queer Japanese designs on it, for dressing-gowns.

The pattern selected for our paper pattern of this month is the "New Pleated Skirt," made quite plain, which has succeeded the old "Housemaid's Skirt," and is very much used for thick materials, such as tweed or serge. The skirt is in three pieces—front, side, and back. The front and sides are narrow and flat, the back being set in three large kilt folds, which are shown rather widely spread. The width of these folds is about equal to the width of the front. It is made to the ankles, and may be bordered with a plain band of ribbon or fur. It will take from six to seven yards of material, has a small pad, and one small steel placed six inches below the waist, at the back.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker, care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.," price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county; and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may always be obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, the Lady Dressmaker selects such patterns as shall be of constant use in making and re-making at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of the "G.O.P." may know of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic under-clothing have already been given:—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing-jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke, blouse polonaise, princess dress or dressing-gown, Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, plain basque bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials, Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, yoke bodice and bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, Emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle, polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket bodice, striped tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi skirt, new American Emancipation bodice (instead of stays), and new Corday skirt with pleats.

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER II.

It would seem out of place in writing of the violin to commence with the Mittenwald instrument and its makers, but for the fact that I came to this old-world Bavarian town to get some personal knowledge of both, and to find answers to problems which had long puzzled me with regard to the violin.

Whatever is said, therefore, of the Mittenwald violin and its makers, must be regarded as affording some points of interest in and about the kingdom of sound, just as we study a book on a new country before setting out on the journey thither.

It is curious to note how that the prosperity of a nation is often due to the special talent and enthusiasm of an individual cropping up at a time when, from loss and misfortune, the people are easily directed and induced to throw their whole energy and talent into an undertaking.

It was so with the establishment of nearly every branch of the toy industry. It was so here in Mittenwald with the making of violins.

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the art of violin-making in Italy was at its highest point of perfection. In Brescia, Cremona, Treves, Mantua, Verona, Padua, Venice, Florence, Rome, and Naples, dwelt the most renowned masters, who gave lessons in the art of violin-making, and their fame went out into all lands.

Of course, Mittenwald being the central point between Italy and Germany, heard very much about it from the various travellers to and fro, in addition to which it had a very celebrated maker of violins dwelling near, and who often paid a visit to Mittenwald in search of special wood for his instruments; this was the celebrated Jacob Stainer, of Absom (a little village near Innsbruck) a man of surpassing intelligence, delicate constitution, and gentle manners, the first celebrated maker who exercised his art outside the charmed circle of Italy.

The people of Mittenwald had often watched him with curiosity as he went about their forests, mysteriously striking first one tree and then another with his hammer, and then putting his ear close to catch the sound.

At the periodical cutting down of trees he was sure to be present, listening for the sound of occasional large branches as they fell into the valley below, or regarding with attention the trunks of large trees whose tops and branches were decayed, to ascertain the number and character of the rings.

These mysterious movements of Stainer had a special fascination for one of the inhabitants of Mittenwald named Klotz, who desired above all things that his son Matthias should follow in the footsteps of Jacob Stainer, and become a violin maker.

It is said he could get no rest for thinking how it could be managed, and at length he consulted a friend of his, a traveller between Italy and Germany, who promised on his next journey to the South to take the boy with him, and leave him with one of the celebrated masters.

And so it happened that Matthias Klotz, then ten years old, was, by the influence of his father's friend, placed in the workshop of Nicolo Amati, in Cremona, little dreaming of what he was to do for Mittenwald in the future.

He had a hard time of it at first, for he was terribly homesick, but Amati was a kind man and a judge of character, and took a fancy to the modest, thoughtful German lad, and by degrees the intense longing for home subsided.

He gave himself up to his art with love and zeal, and in a few years he was one of Amati's best pupils, among whom at that time were Andreas Guarnerius and Anton Straduarius.

The preference shown by the master for Klotz roused the envy of the other pupils, who made his life a misery to him, and compelled him to seek protection in the house of Amati. They one day attacked him with weapons, and his remaining longer was out of the question, and so after eight years he left the town and the master whom he had learned to love, and wandered about till hunger compelled him for the time to take the place of an agricultural labourer.

This did not last long, he plucked up courage, took his staff, and sought out those towns wherein he could work at his craft. This was not difficult, and he made use of every opportunity of completing his education in the art of violin-making.

At length, after two years of wandering, he returned to Mittenwald, in his twentieth year.

as an authorised certificated master, rich in knowledge and experience, and in possession of the best models and drawings of violins, 'cellos, and other stringed instruments.

His determination was to found a school and take apprentices, as the masters in Italy had done, but before moving a step in this direction he went to the church of St. Nicolas, in Mittenwald, an old Gothic building, and prayed earnestly for God's blessing on and approbation of his work. His prayer was heard, and the seed which he sowed has for 200 years brought forth fruit a thousand fold.

Before leaving the church he went to the side of the stone altar and carved his name—Matthias Klotz, Geigen Macher, im 20 Jahr, 1684—which is still clear to read.

He became teacher first to his relations and then to his fellow-citizens. He related the position and influence of the Italian violin makers; he told them how Jacob Stainer, the man whom they had often seen, had rendered the little village of Absom famous in the world by his violins, and of the large sums of money people paid for his instruments.

He found observant, willing listeners, for many were without work owing to the depreciation of the Botzen Market, and gladly became his scholars.

And so it was that in the old market town of Mittenwald, in the midst of the Bavarian Alps, a German Cremona was established, without cathedrals and marble palaces, it is true, but producing violins as famous as those made in proud Cremona on the Po.

In one thing it had a preference over Cremona, viz., that in the neighbourhood there was an abundance of pine and maple wood—wood which was believed to surpass all other in intensity and quality of tone.

Just as formerly Stainer might have been seen wandering about the forests, so now Klotz was observed testing the trees and listening to the sound, and with an experienced eye detecting easily the age and grain of the wood, and noting those which would best suit his purpose.

In his time, and that of his immediate successors, the instruments made in Mittenwald were not sent abroad by agents or on ships over the ocean to foreign lands, but as a rule were carried on the backs of the makers themselves, and sold in Bavaria, Tyrol, Switzerland, and never carried beyond the Frankfort and Leipzig markets.

As time went on and the reputation of the Mittenwald violins became established, the business, if so it may be called, fell into the hands of the Neuner and Baader families, who undertook long journeys to London, Russia, and America, for the purpose of introducing the Mittenwald violins and other stringed instruments.

A century ago these journeys presented serious difficulties and dangers, but nothing daunted these enterprising people, and the result is that thousands of violins, 'cellos, guitars, and zithers are sent out from this little mountain town annually to all parts of the world. From Neuner's factory alone 10,000 are sent yearly to England and America.

The maker with his pack at his back has vanished from the road, and with him, of course, much of the early romance.

Entering Mittenwald from Partenkirchen in the summer, a wonderful sight meets the eye. Violins large and small, fresh varnished, violas without bridges, bassviols, guitars and zithers, finished and unfinished, hang in the cottage gardens and fields on lines from pole to pole, just as our clothes are hung out to dry. And to see them as you descend the hill, shimmering, shining, and swaying to and fro in the rays of the sun, calls to mind the German proverb, Der Himmel hängt voller Geigen (the sky is hung full of violins), by which is understood that things have a bright and producing aspect, a proverb which well depicts both place and people.

Of the makers themselves you will scarcely obtain a glimpse, for they are off to the mountains on the first approach of summer to look after their fields, cows, and goats. Here they live roughly, sleep on straw, and do the work of peasants. No advantage which could be offered would keep a Mittenwald violin maker in the town during the summer months.

This intense love of mountain life is often a source of trouble to the wholesale houses, especially when large orders are waiting to be executed. They work faithfully and diligently during the winter, as you may see for yourselves if you visit the town at that season of the year; then in every window may be seen the master with his sons or apprentices seated before high benches, all occupied on the various parts of the violin.

Although there are two large factories here for the manufacture of stringed instruments, yet the art of violin making is essentially a home industry, in close connection, however, with the two great houses of Neuner and Hornstein and Baader and Co.

These houses in many cases give out the material to the home workers, and pay for the work when finished according to the manner in which it is completed. Some of the makers like to polish and varnish their own violins; others, on the contrary, deliver them to the wholesale houses white, and are polished and finished by their own special workmen.

There are a few individuals who, having worked well all the winter, and loving a roving life, prefer to be their own salesmen, and therefore as soon as summer appears pack up the instruments they have made in a chest, on the cover of which they paint a violin and the figure of their patron saint, and start for other lands, finding buyers among the clergy, schoolmasters, and play actors, and it sometimes happens that when no special home ties bind them to return to Mittenwald, they accept a good offer and settle in a foreign land.

To Herr Neuner we are indebted for much of the detail of violin making and violin mending in Mittenwald, the latter being quite as interesting as the former.

Our first insight into the art was in his factory and under his guidance. He not only allowed us to go through every room, but made us acquainted with each step, from the choosing and cutting down of the wood in the forest, to the moment when the perfect instrument stood waiting for the master hand to draw out its sweet sounds, for, perfect as it is, it is hopeless to charm without the controlling hand.

It required such an insight as this to teach us the complications of the simple-looking instrument we call the violin, and to prove to us how much more difficult it is in construction than either the harp or the piano.

We could not have learned it from books, it would have been too puzzling for comprehension, but seeing step by step of the process, and learning the reason and necessity of each, the mind gradually took it in, and no longer troubled itself as to the why and wherefore.

Unless we had seen with our eyes, we never could have understood how an instrument so simple in its construction could be so complicated in its details, nor could we have been so thankful to our ancestors for the trouble, time, and research they must have expended before arriving at the true form in which it has come to us.

The wonder, however, still remains in our minds, how, with the materials all ready to hand, so many centuries should have passed away ere this perfect instrument should have been discovered.

most ancient of arts; for the Creator, who placed in the heart of man an intense love of harmony, gave him at the same time the means of gratifying it, leaving him, however, to find out what the means were, and how to make them subservient to his will; and it was early in the world's history that Jubal, Adam's grandson, learned the secret of infusing life into dead matter, and producing sweet sounds from wood and metal, thereby earning for himself the title of "Father of all such as handle the harp and organ." From the beginning, therefore, the heart of man has craved for musical instruments and had them, but the violin, the king of instruments, is the child of the last two or three centuries only. No one knows the name or the country of the inventor, nor the exact date of its springing into life; yet what other instrument ever had the power of this to charm, to soothe, to provoke enthusiasm, to scold, caress, inspire, to paint the thoughts, to express the passions? "It is," says an old enthusiast,

"the sustainer of our voice, the necessity of our symphonies, the soul of our concerts, the life of our dances, the charm of our assemblies."

What is it which gives to the violin its enormous value, and places it on the throne of the domain of musical instruments?

It is a something detached from the instrument, yet a most intimate part of it—a something which holds it in subjection, and makes the air, the wood, and the strings submit to it, and which, being put in motion, draws forth the sounds, otherwise dormant, and makes them vibrate to its touch.

This magic wand, this sceptre, is the bow. Armed with this, the king of instruments never grows old like other instruments, but increases in strength and beauty with the centuries. Of the origin of this sceptre it is difficult to speak with certainty. Whether we derived it from Arabia or from Wales authorities are not agreed, but all are of one mind that it was brought to its present perfect form in France.

In the making of the violin there are certain fundamental principles to be observed, and as they have to do with nature, and not with opinion, they can never be infringed without damage to the instrument. The laws are the same, whether they have to do with the smallest of violins, or the largest double-bass, and the violin maker is bound to possess knowledge of these, otherwise his work will be a dead failure.

For example, he must understand thoroughly the nature of the wood to be used, the equilibrium of the air, the size of the model, the height of the arch, the piercing of the holes, the relation of the parts to the whole, and the composition and tint of the varnish.

All these came under our notice in Mittenwald, in Herr Neuner's factory, where the whole history of the violin is to be seen, and in the next chapter we will try and explain what we actually saw, beginning with the wood.

By LADY WILLIAM LENNOX.

CHAPTER IV.

NINTEEN months had passed since that bright August morning when Kitty apostrophised the river just before going to the church for her own wedding. She had been many times since to her accustomed seat close to the Dee, and as she listened to the hum of insects, and all the other pleasant sounds which seemed to come with the sunshine, she told herself that her dreams had been realised, and that her cup of happiness was well nigh full. At first there used to be no "well nigh" about it. She was perfectly happy for about three months; but then these Grants, who had arrived ten days after her marriage, began to make friends so far as they could with Jamie, and she did not like it. Kitty had one unfortunate quality in her disposition—jealousy. She was so fond of her husband that she did not really like his even caressing a dog or cat, and directly she fancied he found a certain pleasure in talking to the Grants, she added that on to the dislike she felt because of their rough manner, and at last grew to positively hate them. Foolish, indeed, she was, and making worries for herself without the smallest foundation; but she chose to fancy that her husband liked a chat with Sandy or Andrew because they were men, and could talk of things she did not understand, such as politics in their bearing on trade, and the labour market, and so on, and as a result of that she imagined that perhaps Jamie rather looked down upon her; in fact, there was no end to the self-torment she went through, all for nothing; and being ashamed to confess to "Miss Bessie" that anything was troubling her, she kept it to herself and brooded, like the silly girl she was. Jamie meanwhile went on his way, did his work, and came home to his tea, happy, and at peace with all the world, never dreaming there was anything wrong, and never seeing that Kitty's face clouded over whenever he mentioned that the Grants had walked with him, or that he had been telling them such news as he could pick up in Aberdeen.

One evening, however, the shade was so apparent that he did notice it, and asked her what was the matter.

"I don't like those Grants," she burst forth. "You always seem to want to be with them instead of me."

"Why, Kitty!" exclaimed her husband, in astonishment, "whatever do you mean? I like the Grants, instead of you? Why, wife, you must be clean daft to say such a thing. Poor Andrew and Sandy! I never told you that the old man's gone—died yesterday. They are but ignorant folk, and like a chat, because I tell them what I read in the papers, and when I come back by train it passes the time if they meet me and walk home from the station. Kitty, woman, don't go troubling yourself about such-like follies. It spoils your pretty face, and makes me unhappy to see it." So saying, he went over and kissed her, adding—

"Ye'll not see much more of the Grants again, for they are going to emigrate to America, to try and find better work and wages."

"Oh," said Kitty, a good deal mollified, and somewhat ashamed. "Well, I can't say I'm sorry if they do go, but it's all right with you now, Jamie, darling," and she smiled brightly and gave him a kiss in return for his.

"Yes, my lassie, we'll have no more of long faces I hope now; Sandy told me he and his brother are going in a fortnight."

He sat silent for a time, drinking his tea, and then said:—

"I believe I shall have to go to London before long, on a job which they want a Scotchman for."

"London! but why do they want a Scotchman? They are no better builders here than in London, I suppose?"

"No, I don't believe we are," he said; "but it seems there's an old gentleman, a Scotchman himself, who's just got a fad to have some job done by his own countrymen, and so we'll have to go and do it, some of us. It'll be a pretty penny he'll have to pay, I'm thinking, us coming so far to the work."

"Yes," said Kitty, rather gloomily. "Well, I think he might be content with the builders in London, and not take you away."

"Aweel, aweel," interrupted Mrs. McGowan, "it'll no be for long that Jamie'll be gone, and maybe the wage will be extra."

Ten days after this conversation the two Grants came to say good-bye as they were to start for America next day. Jamie was not at home, so the visit was paid to Kitty and her grandmother.

"An' are ye really going to-morrow?" asked the latter.

"We leave to-morrow," answered Sandy; "and we'll stay in Aberdeen the night to see our sister who's married and settled there, and then start for America on Wednesday."

"We saw Jamie yesterday," said Andrew, "and maybe we'll see him in Aberdeen to-morrow to say good-bye."

And so they left, Kitty being glad to see the last of them, and Mrs. McGowan rather sorry, as she liked a little company.

Jamie came in soon after they had left.

"Well," he said, "I am ordered to go to London on Wednesday, for the job I told you of, but it won't take long—not more than a fortnight, I believe. A good many of us are going. I just met the Grants," he added, "and said good-bye to them. I'll write from London directly I can and tell ye about the place, which is grand enough, from all I hear."

"Yes," said Kitty, feebly. "I'll go and see that your things don't want any stitches put in them before you go, Jamie, dear."

Wednesday came and went, and with it Jamie; and Kitty, who had never been parted from him before for more than a few hours, felt so low and depressed, that it was all she could do not to burst out crying before her grandmother, who was not at all the person to sympathise with any such exhibition of feeling. By dint of great effort, however, she did "keep up," and went about her usual work without saying a word; only in the evening she walked to the Manse and had half-an-hour's talk with her friend, which did her more good than anything else possibly could have done. She walked home briskly, for it was dark and cold, and comforted herself with the thought that she would soon have a letter telling her where he was, and so on.

Two days passed in peace, as she did not expect to hear directly, but by Saturday evening she began to feel just a little surprised, and then vexed, because no tidings had come from her husband. Sunday and Monday did not count, but Tuesday came and still no letter; Wednesday and Thursday ditto, and in fact the second Sunday found her still without any tidings.

She grew pale, and black circles appeared under her eyes; even Mrs. McGowan began to be anxious, though she did not show it much.

At last Kitty burst forth, "I don't know how to bear it, grannie; what do you think can have happened?"

"I don't know, dearie; we canna tell. Maybe he's got so much work, and that's why."

"Oh, no! I am sure he would find a minute just to write to me, if it was only the work that he was busy about. Maybe he's ill. Oh, grannie, or——" she hesitated, and then said, "or——well I hate those Grants!"

"Hate those Grants? I know ye never liked them, but what have they got to do wi' Jamie?"

"Perhaps they saw him in Aberdeen and got him to stay there, or perhaps they've gone to London with him."

"Ye're just daft, Kitty," said her grandmother. "Ye ken they were going to America on Wednesday, an' Jamie never left here till that day, and besides, what should he be staying with them for?"

"I don't know," said Kitty; "but only I always hated them, and if it's not that, why then Jamie must be ill, or——" She could not utter the awful fear which she had of some accident having happened to him, and, in fact, extraordinary as it may seem, she was in reality much more possessed with the idea that "those Grants" were at the bottom of his silence than that any more natural and reasonable explanation might account for it.

Days grew to weeks, however, and still no word came to relieve the anxiety which was almost unbearable. Kitty was at her wit's end, and looked so ill that her grandmother was frightened about her, more especially as she still harped on the idea that the Grants had somehow influenced her husband. She went so far at last as to say she thought he had, perhaps, gone to America with them, or, on the other hand, that they had, perhaps, murdered him to get the little store of money which he had taken with him when he left Deeside Cottage.

She could not go and consult "Miss Bessie" either, as Robert Forbes was seriously ill with scarlet fever, and the Manse was consequently closed to everyone but doctors and nurses. Once, after nearly six weeks had elapsed, a letter came from the firm in Aberdeen to Kitty, asking whether she could tell them where her husband was, as the job in London was finished, and the other workmen had returned without him.

Poor Kitty went herself to Aberdeen then and saw the foreman, asking him what she could do, the result being that a notice was sent to the paper describing Jamie, and asking for news of him. The building in London had been so delayed, owing to bad weather, that it was only just finished, which was the reason of the firm not knowing that Ferguson was missing sooner.

Another week passed, and Kitty in despair went up to the Manse on the chance of seeing her friend. Bessie sent for her into the room she knew so well, and in a few minutes all the story was told.

"My poor Kitty," she said, with tears in her eyes; "how you have suffered! But don't for one instant think that he has gone away, or stayed away, on purpose. We make such mistakes, we women, very often about that, dear, imagining things which have no foundation, and making ourselves miserable without cause. No, it is bad enough as it is, the terrible suspense. I tell you what, Kitty," she said, after a pause. "My husband is now so much better that he can quite well do without me for a day or two, or even more if necessary. I shall tell him my plan, and I know he will say at once 'Go.'"

Kitty looked up, not understanding.

"I shall go, dear," said Bessie, "and see if I cannot find your husband. Listen, Kitty! If he has met with any accident he will have worry about his friends again—never worry about anything. This is so awful!"

"You have been very good and brave all this time, poor child," said Mrs. Forbes. "And now you try and keep on being brave till you hear from me, and I hope and pray my news may be good."

And thus it was settled. Robert Forbes encouraged his wife in her undertaking, and the very next morning saw her in the train on her way to London, full of energy and determination to do all that was possible to discover Jamie Ferguson. On her arrival she went at once to the house of an uncle, a lawyer, whom she felt sure would give her the best advice, and she found him fortunately not very busy, so that he was able not only to enter into the subject fully, but also volunteered to go with her on her quest. He and his wife invited her to stay with them as long as she remained in town—an invitation which she accepted with pleasure—and so she took up her abode in a large house in the somewhat unfashionable neighbourhood of Russell Square, from whence she started with her uncle the following morning to begin her search.

Meanwhile Kitty was striving her hardest to control the anxiety which would have been terrible for any woman to bear, but was, if possible, even more terrible for her whose nature, highly-strung and excitable, was acted upon by a vivid imagination, which suggested horrors of every kind, till she sometimes felt afraid of a sudden collapse of bodily, if not mental, strength. But she struggled bravely, and forced herself to do her ordinary occupations, taking as well walks to the Manse to try to be of use to Mrs. McBain, now that Bessie was absent. Four days only passed—but they seemed like four weeks—and then a letter in the well-known handwriting came one morning.

"My dear Kitty," it began, "you have had sorrow, now you must try and bear joy. I have seen your husband. He is in St. George's Hospital, where he was brought the very day of his arrival here. He was knocked down by a runaway cart, and hurt and stunned, but no bones broken. He is doing perfectly well in body. The reason you never heard from him is that his memory for the time is gone. He is quite conscious, and knows the nurses and doctors, but of things and events in the past he has no recollection as yet. So, as there was no clue to his name or address, they could not write. Now, dear Kitty, come as soon as you like, and I know that will be at once. Take a cab at the station and drive straight to 100, Russell Square, where I shall be looking out for you, and you will be among friends. Keep up heart. It won't be long, the doctors say, before Jamie will be quite himself again, and as delighted to see you as you will be to see him.

"Believe me, your affectionate friend,
"BESSIE FORBES."

Kitty's joy when she read this letter may be imagined, but cannot be described. Jamie was safe, not dead—not gone to America. As for his memory, she hardly gave it a thought, so sure was she that the very sight of her and the sound of her voice would work a complete cure in that respect. She could not rest now without seeing him; and putting a few things into a small box, she took the train to Aberbeen taken to one of the hospitals, and I shall go to them all in turn and see. I have a sort of feeling, dear, that he will be found there."

"Oh, Miss Bessie, how I thank you! But surely he would have written if he wanted to, or got somebody else to write."

"We never know," said Bessie. "So many complications happen sometimes. Of course, if I succeed, Kitty—in fact, in any case—you shall hear from me, and if he is where I think very likely he is, you shall come at once and see him."

Kitty could not speak, the relief of thinking something was to be done was so enormous. The tears ran over her cheeks, and she said—

"Oh, if I only have him back, I will never seen that afternoon, and travelled up to London that night, arriving at an unearthly hour next morning; and going straight to Russell Square, as she had been told, early though it was, Bessie was not surprised to see her, and welcomed her so warmly that she felt quite at home, and sat by the fire with a cup of hot coffee which Bessie had had made directly she arrived, listening with a sense of wonderful rest and comfort to all the details of her husband's case.

"I can't help thinking that when he sees me he will remember," she said; but her friend shook her head as she answered—

"Hardly yet, I fancy, dear Kitty; we must have a little patience still."

That day the two women went to the hospital and saw Jamie. He was sitting up as a convalescent patient, and looked well, except for being somewhat paler and thinner, but when he raised his eyes to Kitty there was no remembrance in them; indeed, he turned to the nurse, asking, "Who is that?" And the poor wife, after one cry of "Jamie, don't you know me?" burst into tears, and Mrs. Forbes took her away. The same thing happened often, only that Kitty grew more able to bear it without giving way openly, and at length, after a fortnight, her husband looked up at her and said, "Wife," and laid his hand on his forehead as if puzzled about something. There are moments about which it is better to be silent, and this was one of them; for such intense joy as filled Kitty's heart then can hardly be told.

From that day Jamie rapidly improved, and was soon pronounced able to leave the hospital. Mrs. Forbes' kind uncle and aunt insisted upon his coming to their house for a few days before attempting the journey to Scotland, and the night before he was to leave St. George's and come to Russell Square, Bessie went up into Kitty's room, and found her standing near the window, such a smile on her face, and turning her wedding ring round and round on her finger.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, as her friend entered the room, "how happy I was when he put this on, and how miserable I have been since; but now, please God, the misery is over, and he will be with me again to-morrow. Oh, dear Mrs. Forbes, I don't know how to thank you for all you did for me. I should never have found him, perhaps, but for you!"

"Yes you would, dear, when his memory returned; but you would have had a longer waiting. Well, it's over now, and what a blessing he is really none the worse. Kitty, dear, you will never again fancy things about his friends, will you? I'm sure you won't! And you will try to feel that however happy we may any of us be, yet we must not make too sure of its continuing without a break."

This little story has come to an end now. Jamie came to Russell Square the next day, and a week later travelled back to Scotland with Kitty, and returned to old Mrs. McGowan and the Deeside Cottage.

[THE END.]

BIRD LIFE IN DECEMBER.

By A NATURALIST.

THE birds have not yet suffered from hard times; blackbirds and thrushes frequent those old garden walls which are built with rough stones, for they know well that snails and other creatures have sheltered for the winter within the crevices and cracks in the lower parts of them. The blackbird hops up in his half-bold, half-distrustful way, his bright dark eyes, with their rings of orange, looking all ways at once. He is not quite sure that all is right; some slight noise has alarmed him, for he hops a few feet into the strawberry bed, with his tail raised and spread like a fan. Nimbly he hops back to the wall, secures a large snail, and makes away with it. He will keep coming and going all through the short day.

The song thrush is not so shy; he will get his snail and take it to a stone in the summer-house, crack the shell on that, and then eat the poor owner of it. If you look at the place after he has gone to roost, you will find quite a small heap of broken snail shells. All day long you may hear him tap: tap! tap! and see him, too. The song thrush is a very confident bird in places where experience or instinct tells him that people will not hurt him; but the blackbird is shy always and everywhere.

A mournful pipe comes from the privet hedge surrounding part of our garden, up to the old wall. On looking, we see bullfinches, four of them, clinging to the top twigs, on the lookout for any berries that may be in their neighbourhood. Their breasts look like roses, they are so bright in colour. The title of parrot-finch would suit a bull-finch better than his own name does; I always think of a small parrot when I see one. A most playful and affectionate creature he is, when domesticated, and he has a nice quiet song peculiar to himself, which he will sing for the benefit of those who treat him kindly.

At the bottom of the hedge a couple of hedge-sparrows hop in and out with their own special wing shuffle. The country folks call him "shuffle-wing," in some localities. He is quiet in all his ways, his plumage is sober in tone, and when closely looked at is very beautiful, as is also that of the cock-sparrow.

If, in the course of the short, bright day you can visit the woodland roads, where the great beeches reach out their huge arms, lacing and interlacing, you will hear a chorus of "Twink! twink!" and nothing but "twink!" The sound proceeds from a host of chaffinches that are feeding on the beech nuts or mast, which they find in plenty under the fallen leaves. As you walk on, a cloud composed of birds rises up, showing their beautiful white upper tail coverts and bright tawny plumage, barred with white and black. They are "bramblings," or bramble finches, which have come from northern counties to our more genial one. When the winter is over they will go back to begin their nesting time. And there are cottage children—mites, some of them—carrying sprigs and branches of holly full of bright red berries; they know where the best are to be found. They will cut each piece in a slanting direction, make bundles of the lot, and put them in the ground to keep fresh for their Christmas decorations; and before it gets dark, if you continue your walk, you will meet some of their bigger brothers and sisters with branches of mistletoe, which they had noted months ago growing on the old crab trees in the wood.

NOTICES OF NEW MUSIC.

EDWIN ASHDOWN.

Twenty-five Progressive Studies for the Pianoforte, by Georges Pfeiffer.—These well-planned exercises, for style and finesse, combined with manual independence and the higher departments of technique, are greatly to be recommended, and would precede, in a most satisfactory manner, a study of either Clementi's "Gradus" or Bach's "Well-tempered Clavier."

The Diatonic and Chromatic Scales, edited by Charles Gardner, present no novel features, and connect major and minor scales, bearing the same signature, as heretofore. We hope some day to find the minor scale having the same key-note, second, fourth, fifth, and seventh as the major holding that connection, as the acknowledged "nearest relation."

Fifty Five-finger Inventions, by Edwin M. Lott, represent an earnest attempt to supply a much-needed equalising practice for the five fingers, without changing the position of the hand. Considering the limits to which Mr. Lott bound himself, it is really surprising to find so much interest in his melodies.

J. AND J. HOPKINSON.

Daybreak. Four-part song, by C. A. Macirone.—This is a beautiful composition of Miss Macirone's, possessing all the breezy vigour which Longfellow's words naturally require in the first part, and filled with a very touching sadness when the wino "cross'd the churchyard with a sigh, and said 'Not yet! in quiet lie.'"

A Book of Four Songs, by Kate Boundy.—These settings of Herrick's and Shelley's words show great individuality of thought and harmony.

The Parting Hour, by Ernest Birch, is a typical ballad of the period, as free from difficulty as it is from interest.

W. MORLEY AND CO.

A Ribbon and a Flower. A song, with sweet, sad words, by Mary Mark-Lemon, receives a rather poor setting at the hands of Joseph Barnby.

Ask Not. By Maude Valerie White.—There is always some trait of originality in the compositions of this talented woman. In this case the words are weaker than the music.

PHILLIPS AND PAGE.

Little Guardian. A song, by Cécile S. Martog.—Although rather in the style of such works as "Daddie," "Auntie," "Childie," and other relative compositions, this little song has the advantage of looking at things from a cheerful, hopeful point of view, which is greatly in its favour.

PATEY AND WILLIS.

Who Was It? is the title of a very funny song, by F. E. Weatherley, cleverly and humorously set to music by J. L. Roeckel.

La Cavalcade makes a brisk march, although inclined to the polka in style.

STANLEY LUCAS AND CO.

Lullabye, my Darling. Words and music by Jenny Maude.—This is a simple, pretty berceuse, of which the first part is excellent.

The Dew is Sweet to the Lily. Song, by R. B. Addison.—Mr. Addison's songs are all nice, and this is no exception to the rule. The compass is from D up to E.

The Queen's Fester. A jig, by E. Boggetti.—Has all the freshness and go required, and would be very suitable for playing at a children's romp.

SOMERSET AND CO.

The Grenadiers. Polka-March, by Theo. Bonheur.—Is a lively quickstep, dedicated to Lieutenant Dan Godfrey, whose portrait is reproduced on the cover.

Jessamine, No. 1, of Floral Beauties, by J. E. Newell.—A drawing-room piece of the nocturne kind. Why "Jessamine," we cannot tell!

THE PRINCESS LOUISE HOME.

By ANNE BEALE.

WE are once more encouraged to appeal to our young readers on behalf of this Home, in which they have been so long interested. A few weeks ago we told them that it must be closed next Christmas, unless a debt of £600 could be paid. A portion of that sum has been collected, but at least a third has yet to be gathered, if the inmates are to be saved from that destitution which must result from their being cast adrift on the stormy sea whence they were rescued. We venture to plead earnestly for them, and to ask our readers to allow the subscriptions they have generously sent in towards a Convalescent Home for Girls, to be transferred to Woodhouse, which is virtually a "Convalescent Home," since the doctor's bill for last year was only £2 3s. 9d., and the neighbouring Epping Forest is quite a health resort. Of course we all know that the contributions sent to THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER towards founding a new Home for Girls are insufficient for the purpose. We have been told what a large sum is required to secure and maintain a permanent institution of this kind, and that the money in hand falls far short of it; indeed, that the scheme must be relinquished and the kind donations otherwise appropriated. This emboldens us to ask our friends to keep open the "National Society for the Protection of Young Girls," by allowing the £360 collected for the one Home to be transferred to the other. This sum will enable the committee to clear off the debt, and, we will hope, leave a small margin wherewith to start afresh. Instead of closing so valuable a preventive work, we would fain see it doubled. But for lack of funds, one hundred, instead of fifty, girls would be received at Woodhouse—saved from possible ruin. Our readers have done much towards filling the Home in the past, and we feel secure of their help and sympathy in the present crisis, as well as of their aid in the future. Could they only see the bright, happy faces of the girls, they would, assuredly, lend a hand to save them; which hand will be, metaphorically, stretched out by giving them a Happy Christmas once more in their dear Woodhouse. The following letter, lately received by the secretary, will speak for itself. The writer was three years in the Home:—

"Dear Sir,—I must ask you to forgive the liberty I am taking in writing to you. I do not know if you will recollect me or not. I was school monitor under Miss Crane, but I have not heard anything of the Home since I left, except by occasionally reading scraps in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER and the Quiver. I was sorry to read the other day that the funds were so low, but I sincerely hope that before long subscriptions will increase. I am sure if people only knew the immense good work the society carries on they would subscribe more liberally. I often think of the happy times I had in the Home and also of those evenings when you came in and enlivened us by joining in our somewhat boisterous run. Those were happy days indeed. I often feel thankful I was sent to the home, for many things I learned when there have proved invaluable to me since. I am glad to be able to tell you I have a good situation as parlour-maid. I have been eighteen months, and I hope to stay much longer."

All the letters from the girls in service are full of gratitude, and those from many mistresses are truly satisfactory. When we consider the degraded condition from which most of them were rescued, and that fourteen hundred and fifty have been trained, fed, clothed, and placed in domestic service, we thank God for His aid, and take courage. We feel sure that His servants will still help to save the young from such a state of sin and wretchedness as we find chronicled in the last report. We read of one, fourteen years of age, with an insane mother, and deserted by her father. Of another, eleven, with no parents that could be discovered, found in possession of two notorious drunkards. A third, aged fourteen, declaring that certain black lines under her eyes were caused by the black eyes she used to get when she was young; and so on. Most of them have been snatched like "brands from the burning." Knowing this, and much more, we need not apologise for our continued efforts on behalf of this excellent charity, or for our somewhat bold proposal that our girls shall benevolently signify to the Editor their willingness to save it from annihilation.

Since the above was written, the sum of £100 has been sent for the Convalescent Home by C. R. S. The donor adds to her benevolent gift the text, Psalm cxxvii. 1. The Editor wrote at once to the kind lady, to state that it was in consideration to transfer the sum collected for the one Home to the other, and received an immediate permission to appropriate her munificent contribution as he thought best. Had our readers seen the thankfulness of the secretary of the Princess Louise Home, as we did, on learning that £100 of the debt was to be thus wiped off, and that, with their approval, the whole would be eventually cleared, they would rejoice with us in the prospect of maintaining an existing Institution. The gratitude towards C. R. S. is intense, and the text she quotes is to be placed over the door at Woodhouse, so that all who run may read the words, "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

EDUCATIONAL.

MARY.—For information about the LL.A., St. Andrew's degree, you should write to the secretary, Professor Knight, University of St. Andrew's, N.B. The examination takes place in April. It is held at several places in England, Birmingham being one of them. The standard is the same for pass and honours as that of the St. Andrew's M.A. degree, in the same subjects.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER will find all the information needful in Cassell and Co.'s shilling "Guide to Female Employment in Government Offices," in which copies of examination papers are given which have been set for former candidates.

SILVER KING.—The address of the Church Missionary Society is Church Missionary House, Salisbury Square, E.C. The Church Zenana Missionary Society is at 9, Salisbury Square. We should think you would do well to qualify as a medical missionary for this branch in the South Punjab. You could apply to the secretary, Canon Crowfoot, Minster Yard, Lincoln. The address of the Zenana Medical College is 58, St. George's Road, S.W.—hon. sec., Dr. Griffiths. Help is sometimes afforded in training by the committees connected with Lady Dufferin's Fund, and also by the S.P.C.K., and some others.

AN INQUIRER and MARY.—On reference to our Answers on the question of entering hospitals as probationers, and also to our articles on nursing, etc., you will see that you would not be received anywhere at the age of eighteen. The age is fixed at from twenty-five to thirty-five or forty at most of them; and the earliest age is twenty-one, when you might be eligible at the Children's Hospital in Great Ormond Street, W.C. There they lodge, board, and train lady-pupils at one guinea a week, and nurses at 7s. 6d. a week, for not less than six months. They are received on the same terms at the Children's North Eastern Hospital.

SUNFLOWER.—We thank you for kindly expressing your approval of our magazine, and give your notice with pleasure. Those amongst our girls who desire to join the Utopian Reading Society are informed that the late hon. sec., Miss Impey, has retired; and that Miss Gibb, "Glenlyon," The Avenue, Beckenham, Kent, has taken her place.

H. M. H.—Apply to the matron, London Hospital, Whitechapel Road, E., where there is a training school for nurses without payment; and if appointed after a month's trial, a probationer will be paid £12 the first year and £20 the second. On the satisfactory completion of two years' training, and attendance upon the nursing lectures, a certificate is given.

LADY NYASSA.—The drawing you send is extremely well done; we should think you could make art a success, and regret to hear that you have to be taken from school. It is better for parents to practise economy in anything but in this, as in the present day it is of the utmost importance to their children. We should suggest your going to the Birkbeck Institution, Chancery Lane, E.C., or to the Polytechnic, Regent Street, W., or to some school of art near you, and making every effort to keep up your studies, and in due season to pass those examinations you have not passed. In this way you will do much better for yourself and your parents, than by trying to find a situation when too young.

A SCOTCH LASSIE.—Unless you joined one of the many societies constantly mentioned in our columns, we do not know what you could do for self-improvement; but you spell well and write a good hand. Could you not join a good library, and read standard works on history and literature?

GARÇON.—We may "suppose" so many things; for instance, "what should we have done without mouths or noses?" Is it not better "to-day, while it is called to-day," to help the humanity that really exists, and leave the humanity that never existed to take care of itself? Shall man by thinking find out God's ways?

MISCELLANEOUS.

F. Z.—It is not right to "pray that you may be married." Ask that your Heavenly Father would direct and rule your life just according to His own all-wise will. You are too young, by three or four years at least, to think of anything but your home duties and of how you may "requite your parents."

A SAD GIRL.—We sympathise much with you. You should try to go on a visit to some relatives or friends in the country, for a little time of complete rest and change of scene.

COUNTRY GIRL.—As you have been under the treatment of an aurist, it is to him that you should apply rather than to a stranger quite unacquainted with your case. He would know what description of appliance would suit you the best, and the size of any "ear-drum" to be ordered, as ears are not all alike. Besides, he could procure what might be suitable for you at less cost than you could procure them.

A LOVER OF THE "G.O.P."

—Write to Mr. Tarn, enclosing a stamp for his reply. If it be satisfactory, send the money due and the amount required for the postage. August the 29th, 1866, was a Wednesday.

HOPEFUL ONE.—If qualified in age, character, and attainments, and have sufficient interest likewise, to obtain such a post, of which there are so few at the disposal of the Government, then the circumstance which you think might be an obstacle (which you have confided to us) would not, we think, prove to be such.

ONE OF THE GIRLS.—There is no really definite period assigned to what is termed "the Middle Ages," for they vary a little as to date in different countries one from another. Speaking roughly, the period includes about a thousand years, that is, from the fifth to the close of the fifteenth century. According to Hallam, in his "History of the Middle Ages," it commences "from the invasion of France by Clovis, A.D. 480, to that of Naples by Charles VIII., 1495." At the same time he says, "It is not possible to fix accurate limits to the Middle Ages."

LADY SELINA.—The most original of the new Christmas cards this season are those printed by Mr. Edmund Evans, in which real needles are displayed to represent organ pipes in the reproduction of Raphael's world-famed "St. Cecilia," a copy of which picture we ourselves printed in our last volume. There is another card of a beautiful drawing-room organ, in the Renaissance style, in which the shimmering needles do service for the organ pipes with great effectiveness and beauty.

 In our next monthly part we intend to print as the frontispiece the outline drawing only of the beautiful picture "A Morning Gossip," to be painted by our girls in colours, like the frontispiece to this monthly number, and in competition for prizes, of which Birket Foster and the Editor will be the adjudicators.

The results of our Competitions in Musical Composition and Needlework for Deep Sea Fishermen will be given in our next Part.

A MODERN MONTAGUE.

EGLANTON THORNE,

Crowns," etc., etc.

"FATHER AND DAUGHTER WERE PROCEEDING WITH THE DELICIOUS, DREAMY MOTION PECULIAR TO GONDOLAS DOWN THE GRAND CANAL."

CHAPTER I.

"THIS IS A MONTAGUE, OUR FOE."

"ARE you satisfied, Olive?"

"Satisfied, father!"

The word was repeated in a tone of expostulation, as though it were one which fell far short of the occasion.

"Venice does not disappoint your expectations?"

"Father, could anyone find Venice disappointing?"

"Very easily if he came here in unfavourable weather. You have no idea what a dreary place Venice looks in heavy rain."

"I can imagine it," said the girl, lightly. "There would be altogether too much water then. But in this sunlight, with that glorious sky overhead,
Venice is simply enchanting. Oh, I could glide about in this gondola for ever. It is too delightful."

THE RIALTO BRIDGE AND FISH MARKET.

Father and daughter were proceeding with the delicious, dreamy motion peculiar to gondolas down the Grand Canal. The hearse-like cover of the boat had been removed, and as they lay back in the luxuriously-cushioned seats, the breeze which fanned them was at once soft and fresh. Perhaps there is no place that so inclines the traveller to yield to the allurements of dolce far niente as does Venice. Walking along the narrow, slippery calles and over innumerable bridges is not agreeable, and, when the perfect ease with which one may glide in a gondola from place to place along the watery ways has once been experienced, it seems absurd to take the trouble to walk anywhere.

There was a look of repose even on Mr. Denning's worn, thin, nervous face, and his daughter welcomed this indication that he was beginning to forget the home worries which had had so injurious an effect on his health, that his physician had prescribed for him many weeks of foreign travel, hoping that change of scene would free his mind from its painful tension.

Olive Denning looked to have life and energy enough for both. She was a girl of twenty, of slight supple form, rather above the middle height, with clear, dark complexion and soft dark eyes—eyes which had a wistful look at times, though the expression of the face was bright and buoyant. She wore a rose-coloured cotton gown, simple enough in style, but Olive had a knack of hitting upon just the colours that would heighten the beauty of her brown hair and eyes, and it seemed to her father that she had never looked better, also that she could not have chosen anything that would contrast more charmingly with the gloomy drapery of the gondola. A little white straw hat with rose-coloured band completed her equipment.

They had arrived at Venice in the dusk of the previous evening, and Olive had donned her gayest attire with a light, eager heart this morning, as she anticipated making acquaintance with the romantic city which from her childhood she had longed to see. There had not seemed much likelihood that her wish would be gratified, till quite unexpectedly circumstances had brought about this visit to Italy. By this time her anxiety respecting her father's health was sufficiently relieved to enable her to enjoy Venice thoroughly.

It was a pleasure to him to watch her eager, interested looks, turned now on this side, now on that, as their gondolier, a tall, fine man, with handsome, sunburnt face, who stood behind them gracefully propelling the boat by long oars, named the various palaces they were passing. It was as he watched her thus that he asked if she were satisfied.

"You would find life at Venice monotonous, I fear, when the novelty of the gondola had worn off," he said, in reply to her. "I can fancy a Venetian girl yearning to escape from its narrow streets, and make acquaintance with the wider world beyond."

"Oh, very likely a Venetian girl would," said Olive; "one wearies of sameness everywhere, and by constant gazing on them, these old palaces might come to look as uninteresting to her as I must own our village street at Wivescombe, where no change ever comes, has often looked to me. The church, the vicarage, the hall, nothing alters there."

"One change at least has taken place there within the last few months," said her father, in a low, bitter tone; "the Squire has robbed us of our right to Love Lane, which my father, aye, and my grandfather too, always regarded as belonging as much to our property as to his. They may call it law, if they will, but it's not justice."

Olive turned a troubled look on her father, whose face had grown dark with anger. What had she been thinking of to recall the old vexed question of Love Lane to his mind?

At this moment the gondolier turned the boat to the right, and skilfully steering it in and out between barges and gondolas, drew it alongside a flight of stone steps.

"Why is this?" cried Mr. Denning. "Oh, to be sure—the bank! I had forgotten that I told him to bring me here."

The man had sprung out, placed a board from the boat to the steps, and stood waiting, with a deferential air, for the signor to land.

"You will not mind sitting here a few minutes, Olive?" said her father, as he rose.

"Not at all," she said, brightly. "I will wait as long as you please. How can anyone be in a hurry here?"

The gay scene which the Grand Canal presented in the bright sunshine of a September day afforded Olive ample amusement whilst she waited. She gazed with interest on each old grey palace and the coloured masts before its door bearing the badge of the noble family that once resided there. Many of the stone balconies had bright awnings stretched above them, and showed masses of green foliage, relieving the cold hue of the stone. Here and there a flag fluttered in the breeze, or a design in Venetian mosaic furnished a touch of harmonious colour, whilst on the water the long-proved, sombre gondolas glided to and fro. Sundry barges, and even a small steamer—most prosaic innovation—passed by, all giving animation to a scene as novel as delightful to the English girl.

Yet presently, as she looked about her, with eyes that missed no touch of beauty or quaint evidence of antiquity, her mind reverted to her rural home in the heart of Hampshire, and a very different scene rose before her mental vision. She saw the narrow lane, which at one side his land ran between her father's property and that of his neighbour, Squire Rowcroft. A pleasant bowery lane it was, fragrant in summer with wild roses and honeysuckle, and yielding in autumn the finest nuts to be found near her home. It was no thoroughfare for the general public, but merely a back way to the Hall, as the Squire's house was always called, and by means of a path across some fields, to the Chase, Mr. Denning's residence, which lay beyond. It was known as Love Lane, though why no one could say. Perhaps, in days long gone by, some pair of lovers, belonging to one house or the other, had so named it. Unhappily of late the lane had come to be associated with strife rather than with love. The two neighbours having fallen out over some parochial business, the question of the ownership of Love Lane was somehow brought up, and became the cause of wrangling and bitterness for years. Squire Rowcroft contended that Mr. Denning's property ended at the hedge which bordered the lane on his side, and that the lane had been originally intended to be a private way to the Hall, and to the Hall only. Mr. Denning, on the other hand, maintained that his land extended to the middle of the lane. He claimed a right to use it in any way he pleased, and his young heifers were allowed to stray into the lane, much to the annoyance of the Squire's lady, who had a nervous dread of encountering these animals, yet liked to avail herself of the shortest way to the village. John Denning was of a pugnacious turn of mind, and he determined to do battle for his rights, as he deemed them. It was at his suggestion that the matter was finally carried into a court of law, and he averred that he had no fear of the result. There was a grand turning out of musty old documents, much studying of maps and plans, and taking of measurements. Love Lane became the subject of a protracted lawsuit, in which all the neighbourhood was interested, and which considerably drained the pockets of the two parties concerned in it.

It was a sore mortification to John Denning when at last the suit terminated by judgment being given in the Squire's favour; that is to say, it was decided that Love Lane was included in the Rowcroft estate. But at the same time the judge ruled that since the residents at the Chase had been accustomed for years to use the lane, its owner had no power to deny them the right of way. It was all one, however, to John Denning. Since the lane was to be considered the Squire's property, he vowed that he would never set foot in it again. He had excited himself greatly over the affair, and his chagrin at its issue was extreme. The enmity with which he had long regarded Squire Rowcroft grew more intense. He dreaded meeting him, flushed with triumph at his victory. But the two men were destined not to meet again for some time after the day on which their suit ended. John Denning fell ill and was ordered abroad. Some people believed that the physician's advice to him, to spend some months in foreign travel, had been suggested by himself in his desire to avoid the condolence of his friends; but however people might talk, Olive and her mother knew that the danger was only too real, which they sought to ward off by change of scene. Very anxiously the girl had watched her father as the days went on, and eagerly had she marked each sign of improvement, never failing to record it in the letters which she frequently sent home to allay her mother's anxiety. They had been travelling for more than two months, and she hoped that her father was ceasing to brood over his vexation. It was a disappointment to her to find that his feelings on the subject were still so sore.

When he came down the steps from the bank and sprang into the boat, he looked brighter. Clearly his talk with the banker had for the time driven every cause of annoyance from his mind.

"What a mercy it is that most of the people we meet understand French," he observed. "I have had a pleasant chat with an Italian gentleman, although I could not have said a word to him in his native tongue." Then addressing the gondolier in the only foreign language he could command, he bade him proceed down the Canal.

Presently, as they went on, they saw, turning into the Grand Canal, from a smaller canal on the left, several gondolas so laden with luggage that it was clear the travellers they bore had but just arrived at Venice.

"Look, father! these people are coming from the station," said Olive. "Oh, those are Englishmen, I am sure!"

In the first gondola sat two young men in grey tweed suits and peaked caps, whose healthy, sunburnt faces had a look unmistakably British. As the boats passed they gazed, not rudely, but with pardonable interest at their pretty young countrywoman in the rose-coloured gown.

"You are certain they are not Americans, Olive?" suggested her father, mischievously.

"Father! As if American faces ever attained that warm, brown hue! Besides, I heard them speak, and their voices were English."

"Really," said her father, laughing, "seems to afford you great satisfaction to meet with your compatriots."

"It does," said Olive, unabashed. "I wonder why it is that English people seem much nicer abroad than they do at home."

"You like them better because you see less of them, I suppose," replied her father. "Distance lends a certain enchantment to everything connected with our own country whilst we sojourn in a foreign land. When we get home you will begin to perceive our national faults."

At the thought of going home the cloud settled again upon his brow. Olive exerted herself, and by her lively talk soon succeeded in banishing it.

Having made the tour of the Grand Canal, they landed at the Piazzetta, and a little later went up by its delightfully easy ascent to the top of the Campanile, from which they had a magnificent view over the whole of Venice.

Afterwards they entered St. Mark's, and Olive was fascinated by the quaint, half-barbaric splendour of the grand old church, so different from any other cathedral she had seen. They explored it thoroughly, spending considerable time in examining the curious mosaics, and ascending to the roof to inspect more closely the famous bronze horses.

The whole day was spent in sight-seeing; and when they returned to their hotel, barely in time to dress for table d'hôte, Olive was tired enough, though she was not a girl easily fatigued.

When Olive and her father descended to the dining-room they found it rather crowded, for there had been a large influx of visitors to the hotel that day. Every place at the long table was occupied; but covers had been laid for them on a round table before the large window that commanded the Canal.

"This is delightful!" said Olive, as she took her place. "I would much rather sit here, for we can see all that passes as we take our dinner, and shall not lack entertainment, however long they keep us waiting between the courses. But who are to be our companions, I wonder?" for the table was laid for two others.

"You will soon know, if you have a little patience," returned her father.

He had scarcely spoken when two gentlemen entered the room, and were conducted by one of the waiters to the vacant places. At the first glance Olive recognised them as the young Englishmen they had passed on the Canal. Perhaps Mr. Denning was in reality as well pleased as his daughter to meet with English travellers. Certainly he made very gracious advances to these young strangers, and the four were soon talking freely together. Olive was not shy. Her manner as she talked to these chance acquaintances was perfectly frank and simple, and one of the two, at least, found her charming by virtue of her child-like frankness. But whilst she talked Olive was making shrewd observations, and she speedily came to the conclusion that the strangers were very nice, and "perfect gentlemen." The elder, who was also the taller of the two, was a man about seven and twenty, of fine, erect form, and an appearance of great physical strength, but with a gentleness of manner and a kindness in the look of his earnest dark eyes which struck Olive as being almost womanly, though no one could have described him as effeminate. His square, intellectual forehead, his firm, well-cut lips and powerful chin, all betokened a strong character. He looked a man to be trusted and honoured. His companion, whom he addressed as Martin, was perhaps some four years younger, but he was not one whose age could be easily guessed. Below the middle height and of sturdy build, with a large head, covered with thick reddish-brown hair, drooping heavily over his brows, he was undeniably plain, but his was the head of a student, and one which seemed to prophesy a not inglorious future. Studious as he appeared, his eyes had a merry twinkle, and his ways were so boyish that Olive liked him at once, and soon felt as if she had known him all her life.

In the course of conversation the Dennings were made aware that both the gentlemen were of the medical profession, the elder being a house surgeon at one of the London hospitals, and the younger a medical student attached to the same hospital.

When dinner was over the four strolled out into the wide hall of the hotel, and thence on to the steps which descended into the Canal. At their appearance shouts of "Gondola, gondola, signori?" were uttered by the gondoliers stationed outside, all eager to secure their custom. It was a most inviting evening. A glorious moon was rising and sending a track of silvery light along the gleaming water. Far away across the lagoon the church of San Giorgio caught the illumination, and its beautiful tower shone like silver against the dark blue sky. The air was cool and still. The soft plashing of oars fell soothingly on the ear. Now, if ever, was the time to see Venice by moonlight.

"Don't you want to try a gondola now?" the young fellow named Martin asked Olive.

"Oh, I should like it above all things," she replied eagerly; "father, do let us have a row."

"Very well, if your heart is set upon it," said her father, carelessly. "Will you join us, gentlemen?"

The young men accepted the invitation readily.

"You will need a wrap," said the elder one, addressing Olive, to whom as yet he had said little, though his keen, dark eyes had been observing her pretty closely. Olive ran off in high glee to get her hat and shawl. She was very glad that her father had taken to these strangers, and seemed to enjoy their society.

"It is so good for him," she thought, "to talk with someone whose conversation really interests him. It must be dull to have only me. And that Mr.—Stuart, I think his friend called him, talks so well, and seems to know so much. But though I am sure he is very clever, I do not feel afraid of him. He has such a kind, good face."

"I feel as if I were in a dream," she said, a little later, as she sat in the gondola between her father and the gentleman whose surname she supposed to be Stuart. "It does not seem as if it could be real that I am floating along in a gondola at Venice. My life has been so commonplace till now. I never expected that anything so romantic could enter into it."

"Then this is your first visit to Venice?" Stuart said.

"Yes, indeed. I never came abroad before. Till lately I had seen nothing beyond my native land, and of that I know very little; most of my days having been passed in one of the quietest of quiet villages in Hampshire. I assure you I am disgracefully ignorant and rustic."

He smiled.

"You must excuse my saying that I cannot accept that statement."

"Oh, you will soon find out that it is true. You have only to question me a little to discover that my ignorance is profound," said Olive, lightly.

"You know London, of course," he said.

"Yes, I know London," she answered demurely, so demurely that he divined that for pure mischief she was exaggerating her unsophisticatedness. "I was there last spring, staying with an aunt of mine at Bayswater, who did her best to initiate me into the mysteries of fashionable life. But she found me poor material to work upon. I do not take the polish well. Everyone can see that I am country-born and bred. She despaired of ever making a fine lady of me."

"What a blessing!" he replied. "I congratulate you on the fact. A fine lady seems to me the most useless, superfluous creature under the sun."

"Ah," said Olive. "I see you go in for utility. You admire women who can nurse the sick and wounded, who are not afraid to go into fever haunts or to visit the most dreadful persons; but I assure you I am not such a one."

"Certainly, I admire such women," he replied; "who would not? But I admire, too, the bright, helpful, unselfish women who make homes happy, good wives who strengthen the hands and hearts of their husbands, good daughters who devote themselves to the happiness of their parents."

Why did Olive's heart beat more quickly as he spoke? His words could not be meant to apply to her. He could not know whether or not she were a good daughter.

Unconsciously their tones had dropped, and Mr. Denning, who was talking with the other gentleman, knew nothing of what was passing on his left. When a pause in his talk recalled his attention to them they were speaking of Hampshire.

"I know something of Hampshire," Mr. Stuart was saying. "I have relatives down there whom I occasionally visit, though I have not seen them now for some years. In what part of Hampshire do you live?"

The thought of Love Lane still so rankled in Mr. Denning's mind that he was impatient of any talk about Wivescombe. Ere Olive could reply to the question addressed to her, he caught hold of her arm, and directed her gaze to the Rialto, towards which they were gliding, and which presented a striking appearance, with one side lit by the moonlight and the other in blackest shadow. And as they all began to remark upon the sight, the question was forgotten.

There was no lack of music on the water. The Venetians are a music-loving people, and every now and then a passing gondolier would break into a peculiar and somewhat monotonous chant, or the sound of a mandolin would be heard across the water.

"Do you sing?" Martin asked Olive.

"A little," she replied.

"No one will own to more than a 'little' singing," he said, with a smile. "But I don't mind telling you in confidence that my friend Stuart can sing a good deal if he likes." "Nonsense!" returned that gentleman. "Speak for yourself, Martin. I suppose you want me to say how well you sing."

Of course after that Olive was determined to judge for herself of the quality of their voices. She proposed that they should try to sing a glee together, and presently they hit upon one which they all knew. Their voices blended well as they rose upon the evening air. Olive had a fresh, clear soprano voice; Mr. Stuart a full, rich bass; and his friend, a not despicable baritone. One thing after another they tried, waxing gayer and gayer as they sang. Olive had no idea how time was passing, and it was a surprise to her when her father said it was ten o'clock, and they must get back to the hotel.

"I am not in the least tired," she said, as Mr. Stuart helped her to land. "I have never enjoyed an evening more!"

"Nor I," said Mr. Stuart, with an earnestness which surprised her, since this was not his first visit to Venice.

She bade the gentlemen good-night, and ran lightly upstairs, leaving them talking with her father in the hall. Her room was flooded with moonlight. She sank on to a seat by the window, threw down her hat, and sat there gazing on the moonlit water, the swaying gondolas moored below, the twinkling lights. Presently the sound of voices singing a romantic strain rose from a gondola. Some of the natives were giving the hotel visitors a serenade. How delightful it all was! No place had ever charmed her like Venice. She was glad that her father had decided to spend a week there. And those gentlemen too meant to stay several days, and she and her father would be sure to see more of them, which was well, for their society was certainly good for him. Olive was convinced that her mother would think so. But at this point her meditations were disturbed by a knock at the door.

"It is I," said her father's voice; "may I come in?"

Olive ran to open the door.

"I want to have a word with you, Olive," said Mr. Denning, as he stepped into the room and closed the door behind him, "a word respecting those young men who have been with us."

Olive looked at her father in wonder. He had changed during the few minutes since they parted. His manner was nervous and troubled. Something had happened to disturb him.

"I am vexed now," he said, "that I so hastily invited them to join us. I find that the elder one is a most undesirable acquaintance."

"Father!" exclaimed Olive, in astonishment.

"Yes, my dear, he is," he returned, rather testily. "He is a Rowcroft, cousin to Squire Rowcroft, who I think you will allow has proved himself to be no friend of mine."

"But his name is Stuart," said Olive.

"His name is Rowcroft—Stuart Rowcroft," said her father. "He has just told me so himself."

"Is that all?" asked Olive. "I declare, father, you frightened me so that I expected to hear nothing less than that he was a criminal in disguise."

"It may seem nothing to you, Olive," said her father with dignity, "but I wish you to understand that we can hold no further intercourse with these young men. We will be civil to them, of course; but any advances on their part must be checked, and we will avoid them as much as possible. Do you hear me, Olive?" he asked after a moment, as his daughter remained silent.

"Yes, father," she said with an effort, "I understand, and of course I will do as you wish. But it is a pity, for they seemed rather nice."

"I daresay he is very well in himself," replied Mr. Denning, "but I do not choose to make the acquaintance of any Rowcroft. Good-night, Olive." And kissing her on the forehead he turned away.

Olive echoed his "good-night" rather mechanically. She stood motionless, with her hands clasped before her till the sound of his steps died away along the passage.

"Oh," she said then, half aloud, with a deep-drawn breath, "how unfortunate! I quite thought his name was Stuart; I called him 'Mr. Stuart' once. Oh, why was he not named Stuart? It would have been so much nicer!"

HOW TO PLAY THE BANJO.

By FRANK MOTT HARRISON, B.Mus., A.C.O.

FEW instruments in the annals of musical history have made such rapid strides into popularity as the banjo. Less than half a century ago its tones were only to be heard emanating from the "log cabins" of the plantations in the Southern States of America, where it formed the solace of the slave; to-day it is seen in the hands of kings and princes, noblemen and statesmen, clergy and laity.

It is not difficult to understand the reason why the banjo has become so popular. It supplies a demand. Its ingenious mode of being tuned, and its simple manipulation, enables anyone possessed of average ability and a good ear to become a proficient player with a few weeks of perseverance, or to be able to accompany a song after a few hours of practice.

Its Origin.—The banjo is undoubtedly a development of the Ravanastrom,* which has been used in India for about two thousand years. The two instruments are almost identical in construction, with the exception that the latter has only one string.

The modern banjo was introduced into England from America, to which country it was probably taken by the African slaves, who originally obtained the idea from India. The unmusical name "Banjo" seems to have been derived from "Banya," the name of a Senegambian instrument of the guitar species. As an instrument for recreation and pleasure, the banjo is unique.

Description of the Instrument.—The design of the banjo must be familiar to everyone, but the technical names of its various portions (which are employed hereafter) are probably foreign to a great many. For this reason the accompanying sketch is given, with reference letters:—

- A—The vellum or drum.
- B—The brackets for tightening the vellum.
- C—The tail-piece to which the strings are fastened.
- D—The bridge.
- E—The strings.
- F—The finger-board (showing the frets), also called the neck.
- G—The nut (on which the strings rest).
- H—The head.
- I—The pegs.
- K—The "thumb" string peg.

* For a description of this instrument, etc., the student is referred to "The Banjo: its Origin, Construction, and Capabilities," by W. Temlett. London: Willcocks and Co., Berners Street, W.

The Strings.—There are five, six, and seven string banjos in general use. The first is essentially a solo instrument, while the other two are suitable either for solos or accompaniments; and, as the seven-string banjo is the more popular, these remarks will refer to that instrument in particular, as an accomplished player on it will find no difficulty in manipulating the others.

The seven strings are counted from right to left, and the seventh is generally called the thumb or octave string.

The tone of the instrument will considerably depend upon the quality of the strings; the best will invariably prove the cheapest. If the strings are too thick the tone will be dull; thin strings produce a bright and clear quality of tone. The strings should be as follow:—

The 1st. (D) a very fine string (specially made).

" 2nd. (B) a thin 1st violin string.

" 3rd. (G) " 2nd "

" 4th. (D) " 3rd "

" 5th. (C) a silver banjo string.

" 6th. (G) " "

" 7th. (G) a very fine string (specially made).

The position of the bridge is a matter of great importance when playing in the higher positions.

Rule.—There should be an equal distance from the nut to the twelfth fret, and from the twelfth fret to the bridge, i.e., the twelfth fret should be equidistant between the nut and the bridge. Should the bridge be in other than the proper position, the higher frets will be out of tune.

On Tuning.—The banjo is tuned in the key of G major. Until the student is thoroughly acquainted with the intervals in which the banjo is tuned, she may find it necessary to take each note from the pianoforte, which will be as follow:—

String: 7th. 6th. 5th. 4th. 3rd. 2nd. 1st.

Notes as written for the Banjo. } Actual sounds produced, and notes to tune from the Pianoforte.

* The 3rd string is tuned first.

It will be seen from the above that the banjo sounds an octave lower than the notation for which it is written.

There is another method of tuning, which is far more convenient, as the use of a piano may be dispensed with:—

1. Tune the third string (G) to a banjo pitch-pipe or tuning fork.

2. Stop this third string at the fourth fret, and tune the second string in unison with the note (B) produced.

3. Stop the second string at the third fret, and tune the first string to the note (D).

4. Stop the first string at the fifth fret, and tune the seventh string to note obtained (G).

5. Tune the sixth string an octave below the third.

6. Stop the sixth string at the fifth fret, and tune the fifth string to the C obtained.

7. Stop the fifth string at the second fret, and the note (D) of the fourth string will be made; tune the same in unison.

The instrument will now be in tune.

The compass of the Banjo extends over three octaves, from sounding sounding with all the intermediate semitones:—

String: 6th. 5th. 4th. 3rd. 2nd. 1st.

(Thumb string.) G (Silver) C (Silver) D (Silver or Gut) G (Gut) B (Gut) D (Gut)

THE BANJO.

Only one note of a kind is shown above; but as each strag produces seventeen semi-tones, many of the notes are repeated in other positions on different strings—viz., the note  may be found at the fifth fret on the first string, or by stopping the second string at the eighth fret, and so on.

How to hold the Banjo.—An easy and graceful style of playing depends in a great measure upon holding the instrument in the proper position; the student will do well, therefore, to study the illustration and observe the following directions:—

The player should be seated on an ordinary drawing-room chair, rather near the edge of the seat, with the left leg raised by means of a low footstool. The edge of the drum of the instrument should rest on the right thigh, as near the body as possible. Let the neck lay between the thumb and first finger of the left hand, but do not clench it. The neck should slightly incline towards the left shoulder. The right arm must rest on the edge of the drum, in order to bring the hand directly over the bridge. Place the little finger of the right hand on the vellum about two inches from the bridge and the thumb on the third string, the first and second fingers on the second and first strings respectively.

This is the position for Striking the strings.—To set the strings of a banjo vibrating but little force is required, in fact force should not be employed at all, except in forte passages. The unpleasant "twanging" so often observed is frequently caused by the strings being "pulled up." Although difficult to describe without personal explanation, a few rules may enable the student to acquire a good tone.

1. Place the little finger as before described, about two inches from the bridge.
2. Lay the tip of the second finger on the first string, the first finger on the second string, and the thumb on the third string. Then allow the thumb to spring quickly from its string against the first finger. The first and second fingers should spring towards the palm of the hand. Try each finger separately, then all together. In "striking" a chord the hand will assume the position as though it were squeezing something, but not too tightly.
3. Do not pull the strings up, which will cause them to "twang," and jar against the finger-board.
4. The thumb plays the four bass and thumb strings, and the first and second fingers the two remaining strings.
5. In playing a full chord of four notes, the third finger is introduced. Care must be taken to make the strings vibrate simultaneously, unless the chord be marked arpeggio, or a special effect be desired, as on a finishing chord, etc., in which case the fingers should leave the strings one after another; at the same time ascending the finger-board—e.g., the thumb may strike near the bridge, the first finger a little higher, and so on.

The various gradations of tone are obtained by playing forte passages near the bridge, mezzo-forte about two inches higher, and piano at the foot of the finger-board. Of course in playing pianissimo or piano, the strings must be struck more gently than in forte passages.

On forming the notes.—The horizontal lines on the finger-board are called frets. On most of the best modern banjos, instead of frets round pieces of pearl or ivory are inserted in the side of the neck, serving the same purpose as the frets. These frets or dots are each one semi-tone apart, as the following diagram will show:

Open 7th. 6th. 5th. 4th. 3rd. 2nd. 1st.
strings: (G G C D G B D

(This string is never stopped.)

Of course the frets which produce the sharps are the same as used for the flats—e.g., the first string stopped at the first fret will make either D sharp or E flat.

The next consideration will be—

How to stop the strings.—Briefly stated, the fingers and frets go together, that is, the first finger is employed to stop the string at the first fret, the second finger the second fret, etc. This rule cannot be implicitly carried out, as certain chords require particular fingering. The following rules must be observed—

1. Use the tips of the fingers to stop the strings, and press them down very tightly, to prevent the string from jarring or an imperfect note being made.
2. In stopping a chord requiring a long reach do not place the fingers straight, but obliquely, which will facilitate the fingering.
3. Keep the knuckles as high as possible, to prevent the fleshy portions of the fingers and hand from touching the strings and thus hindering their vibration.

The positions are determined by the first finger; for instance, if the first finger be placed on the first string at the fifth fret, and the other fingers taking their places for the remaining intervals of the chord, the chord is said to be in the fifth position.

The position barré and barré refer to the left hand. The barré is made by placing the finger firmly across the strings at the fret indicated in the music. The position barré is formed by placing the first finger across as many strings as possible, the other fingers forming the rest of the chord, while the first finger keeps its position.

It is impossible in this limited space to treat of the various effects to be obtained upon the banjo. A slight mention of some of them must, therefore, suffice.

The roll is chiefly adapted for breakdowns or comic song accompaniments, and consists of a continuation of triplets played rapidly:—

Right-hand fingering: } + 1 2 + 1 2 + 1 2 + 1 2 + 1 2

The tremolo is very effective, but requires an immense amount of practice. There are several methods of producing it; two of the best ways are (1), by striking the tip of the first finger backwards and forward with great rapidity; (2), by playing the note with the thumb, first and second fingers alternately, viz.:—

etc.

The harmonics, or upper partials,* may be produced on all the strings (the seventh excepted) at the fifth, seventh, and twelfth frets. The finger should be pressed very lightly across the strings, which should be struck rather forcibly at the same time, near the bridge. Those who play the violin or guitar will at once comprehend this.

For an explanation of the slur, snap, and double-snap, the treatment of grace notes, etc., the student is referred to one of the many instruction books published for the banjo.

Banjo Literature.—High class music for the banjo is very limited: the instrument being essentially more for amusement than for the interpretation of classical works, which would be out of place, not to say absurd, upon it. Banjo players who aim at something higher than marches, breakdowns, and jigs, will feel the want of superior and suitable music, and will have to wait the time until some enthusiastic lover of the instrument endowed with the talent for composition comes forward, as the highly gifted musician Madame Sidney Pratten has done for the guitar. One accomplished musician, Augustus H. Walker, Mus. Doc., has composed a "Sonata in G for violin and banjo."† In this scholarly production the doctor has contributed a work which is both melodious and effective, and it would well repay the student's careful study. "What the banjo can do" will be seen in the concert solo "Home, Sweet Home,"‡ by Herbert J. Ellis.

This composition is very difficult, since it contains almost, if not quite, every effect the banjo is capable of producing. Marches with pianoforte accompaniment are both numerous and effective.

To those young ladies who sing, the following works are recommended—

Boosey's "Banjo Album of Modern Songs," Orsborn and Tuckwood's "Banjo Bijou," Chappell's "Books of Songs" (Nos. 1 and 2), and Ballantine's "Standard Songs," which contain the most suitable selections. A few favourite songs have banjo accompaniments adapted, including "Who's that calling so sweet?"

Among the numerous public performers on the banjo in England the names of Messrs. Ballantine and Ellis stand among the foremost. Mr. Ballantine, an accomplished guitarist and violoncellist, is renowned for his executive skill and artistic style. Mr. Herbert Ellis displays fine execution and produces many pleasing effects in his playing.

* The student is recommended to study "Musical Acoustics," by John Broadhouse, London: W. Reeves, Fleet Street. This work contains excerpts from the investigations of Helmholtz, Tyndall, Airy, and other scientists, and very interesting chapters on harmonics, etc., etc.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER IX.

"MOTHER, I am going for a walk across the meadows; shall you want to cross the river? If not, I'll leave the boat till I come back," said Eve.

"No, I shan't want the boat; but why don't you go to Windham instead of across them lonely meadows?" said Mrs. Oldman, coming to the door of the ark to see her start.

Eve made some excuse, and then got into the boat. She looked charming as she pulled herself across the river, while Mrs. Oldman stood gazing admiringly at her.

"Looks the lady, every inch of her; and if she ain't off to meet Mr. Arthur I ain't her mother. I see him on Sundays; can't take his eyes off the child all through the service; but Eve can take care of herself, I have no fear of that; only if my old man were to hear of it he'd take it to heart sorely, I am afraid. But dear me, where's the use of trying to stop them if they're bent on each other? I might as well try to stop my ducks from going to the river. He'll never do anything but what is honourable by her, I know that well enough, and if he chooses to marry her when he comes of age, why shouldn't he? I am not going to be the one to stand in her way," said Mrs. Oldman, as she spread Noah's net out on stakes outside to dry, and then took in the pike-liggers—bundles of reeds tied up together, and about the size of a rolling-pin—which were hanging up on nails on the side of the ark.

Meanwhile Eve walked across the golden fields to the heronry in the plantation, bounded on one side by Muck Fleet; but she had scarcely come in sight of the plantation when a well-known figure emerged from it, and hastened to meet her.

"How could you be so cruel all these days?" asked Arthur Clifford, for it was he, after their first greetings were over.

"Well, if you are so bent on studying the habits of the herons, greedy, gorging things, it is no fault of mine, is it? Have you seen one of their nests yet?"

"Yes. I climbed up a tree yesterday, and peeped into one while I was waiting for you. There were five pale green eggs in it."

"Lucky for you the hen bird was not sitting. They only lay six eggs."

"Ah, but I watched her go out on a fishing expedition first. There were several of them about here yesterday; but you think no more of seeing a heron in this part of the world than we do of a thrush or a blackbird in other counties. And now tell me why you have not been to meet me for so long?"

"Because I think it is very wrong of me to deceive father in this way. I was so sorry when I found the policeman had been and summoned him for our fault, that I very nearly confessed it was our doing. I never was so miserable in my life. I have been very wicked."

"My poor little Eve, I am sorry; but, my darling, for my sake keep our secret a little longer, till my twenty-first birthday; it is only another month, and on that day we will be married first and tell them all afterwards. I come into my property then; now I only have an allowance, and Mr. Leicester is quite capable of stopping that if he knew of our engagement, for my mother and sisters will be odious to you till they have learnt to accept the inevitable; and he knows that as well as I do. Hold on, my little love, for another month, and then we will be married at Yarmouth, and sail away in my yacht till the nine days' talk our marriage will excite has blown over; and we will go to Paris, and get you some grand dresses, and we will travel for a year; and then when we come and settle down in my place in Essex, if you are not able to hold your own against the grandest lady of them all, I shall be surprised indeed."

"But, Arthur, are you quite sure I shall make you happy? You know I am only a fisherman's daughter, and you will have to teach me how to behave like a lady, or I shall make mistakes and make you miserable. Thanks to Adam Day and Miss Grace, my education has been as good as most ladies', but it is all the little things which make the difference between a lady and a poor man's daughter that I want to know," said Eve, gravely.

"And I will teach you, and Grace will teach you, for she will be a true friend to us both, I am sure, and you will soon learn, for you are a lady by nature now, my darling. I don't think I could love even you if you were not, and you have seen more of Grace than of any other girl, and have learnt a good deal unconsciously from her."

"Yes; mother never would let me play with any of the village children, only with Adam Day and you and Miss Grace—"

"Say Grace, my pet," whispered Arthur, interrupting her.

"Grace, my pet; you three were my only playmates," said Eve, wilfully misunderstanding him, which proceeding on her part caused one of those little interludes so interesting to lovers.

When this was finished Arthur renewed his proposal, Eve at last promising that she would go with him to Yarmouth to be married on his twenty-first birthday, and would keep their engagement secret during the month which intervened. How bitterly she was punished for this rash decision and wicked disloyalty to Noah and Mrs. Oldman we shall see.

"But we shan't be able to see much of each other during this next month, so you must be content with one evening walk a week. Saturday will be the best, because father and Adam are always at the club then," said Eve.

"But why can't we meet every day?"

"Because father would certainly find us; he begins marsh-mowing on Monday, and he will be down here all day, mowing the other side of Muck Fleet, till five or six o'clock."

"Well, we can come here later, then."

"No, we can't; he'll be tickling trout and tench and pike fishing in the mornings and evenings; and eel-bobbing and spearing begins now netting is just over, so we shall never know where father may or may not turn up; he fishes all along from Windham Broad to Filton, and he is at that or marsh-mowing from early dawn to late at night. It is one of his busiest times, really, so it won't do to run any risks; but I'll meet you here every Saturday evening about six, and I can stay till dark."

"What was that?" exclaimed Arthur, starting at a sound like the splash of an oar in Muck Fleet, a few yards off.

They were standing under a beech-tree, Eve leaning against its silvery trunk, and gazing up into the clear blue sky peeping through the maze of fresh green leaves, of that lovely delicate green, perhaps the loveliest of all the young tender greens of early summer—the beech-green—while Arthur had been feasting his eyes on her beauty until he turned to look in the direction of the sound.

"It is only a water-rat," said Eve, carelessly.

"No, it was an oar; I hope no one is making off with my boat; come and see," said Arthur, moving to the edge of the dyke, a few yards from where they were standing. Eve followed, and as they reached the bank they saw a man in a wherryman's hat and jersey, pulling himself quickly up Muck Fleet towards Filton Broad, while Arthur's boat lay safely moored where he had left it a little nearer the river.

"It is Jack Farrar," whispered Eve, drawing back under the shelter of the trees, lest he should turn and recognise her.

"What is he doing here, I wonder?" said Arthur, suspiciously.

"Oh, he trades constantly between Yarmouth and Windham; I daresay his wherry is outside in Filton Broad, and he has very likely been to Windham for something. Perhaps he has been to the ark; if so I am very glad I was out."

But though this idea satisfied Eve and her lover, it was not correct; the truth was Farrar had been haunting the neighbourhood in his leisure moments since he caught sight of Eve and the man he supposed to be Adam Day in the boat at the entrance to Muck Fleet, but unsuccessfully until this evening, when, coming silently along in his boat, he had heard the sound of voices from the heronry, and standing up just opposite where the lovers were, he had overheard the greater part of their conversation; but in turning his boat to return he had inadvertently made the splash which had attracted Arthur Clifford's attention.

THE LAND OF PROMISE.

By WILLIAM CARTWRIGHT NEWSAM.

WHEN Israel out of bondage came,
 Before they saw the promised land,
 They journeyed far, with weary feet,
 Across the burning desert sand;
 So, when night's shadows gather round,
 And life's short pilgrimage is o'er,
 Walk firmly onward through the gloom—
 The Land of Promise lies before.

No human eye hath ever seen
 A land so beautifully fair;
 No mortal ear hath ever heard
 Such songs of joy as mingle there;
 And, scattered o'er the heavenly plains,
 Bright gardens, rich as Eden, lie,
 Filled with rich fruit that never fades
 And fragrant flowers that never die.

The mind of man can ne'er conceive
 That glorious land, so bright and fair,
 Nor can the painter's skill portray
 The shining forms that wander there.
 Now mounting on their glittering wings,
 Behold, they seek the vault on high,
 And strike anew their harps of gold
 To heavenly strains that fill the sky.

They gather round the shining hill
 On which the glorious city stands;
 They seek the living river there,
 And rest upon its golden sands:
 A crystal stream whose healing power
 Doth far excel Siloam's pool,
 For life eternal comes to all
 Who taste its waters, pure and cool.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER IX.
RICHARD SEFTON.

"RICHARD is a perfect bear!" exclaimed Edna, angrily, as she threw herself into one of the wicker seats on the lawn. It was a lovely evening; the sun was just setting, and she had invited Bessie to take a stroll round the garden.

"The dews are very heavy," remonstrated her friend. "I think we had better keep to the gravel paths." And then Edna had got up from her seat, grumbling as she did so, and had again reiterated her opinion that Richard was a bear.

"I think something must have put him out," returned Bessie, who was always prompt in defence of the absent. "He did not look quite happy."

"That was because mamma was so vexed about his unpunctuality, and about Malcolmson. Richard hates to vex her, and when she looks at him like that he always becomes gloomy and morose. I have known him silent for days, when they have fallen out about something. I am taking you behind the scenes, Bessie, but all our friends know that mamma and Richard do not agree. You see mamma is very clever, and she likes managing, and Richard has a will of his own; he is very tenacious of his own opinions, and when he has got an idea into his head he can be as stubborn as a mule."

"Don't you think a man has a right to his own opinions, Edna?"

Edna pursed up her lips.

"A man like Neville, perhaps, who is clever and knows the world; but Richard is a perfect child in some things; he ought to be reasonable and allow mamma to have her say. Now, she dislikes Malcolmson—she does not believe in him, and Richard, as you hear, swears by him."

"Who is Mr. Malcolmson, if I may venture to ask?"

"Oh, he is an ugly, scrubby little Scotchman, whom Richard means to take as a sort of bailiff, or overseer, or something; I don't understand what."

"Your brother farms himself, does he not?"

"Yes; he has a large farm; and then there is the brewery a few miles off, and he wants Malcolmson for that. Mamma is disgusted, because she wanted Richard to take a protégé of her own—such an interesting young fellow, and so poor, with a widowed mother and two or three young sisters; and my lord won't look at him."

"Perhaps he has his reasons for declining him."

"No, it is just his obstinacy; he will not allow mamma to interfere in his business. He thinks she ought to keep to her own department, and leave him to manage his own concerns; but mamma can't see it; she has been used to rule, and she is always offended when he refuses to take her advice."

"What a pity!" observed Bessie. "I think people in one house ought to be of one mind."

"My dear Daisy, your golden rule won't hold at The Grange. No one thinks alike in this house; mamma and I dote on each other, but we do not always agree; she makes me cry my eyes out sometimes. And as for Neville, as I told you, we have not an idea in common. I think perfect agreement must be rather monotonous and deadening; I am sure if Neville were to say to me, 'My dear Edna, you are always right, and I agree with you in everything,' I should be ready to box his ears. It is much more amusing to quarrel half-a-dozen times a day, and make it up again. Oh, I do dearly love to provoke Neville: he looks so deliciously bored and grave."

Bessie was at a loss how to answer this extraordinary statement, but Edna gave her no time to collect her ideas.

"Quarrelling with Richard is poor fun," she went on; "he hasn't the wit to retaliate, but just sits glum, as you saw him to-night. I mean to tell Master Richard, though, that his manners were worse than usual, for he actually did not open his lips to his guest, although she was a stranger."

"Indeed you are wrong," returned Bessie, eagerly. "You are doing your brother an injustice; he spoke to me several times, and made remarks about the weather and my journey. I was just describing Cliffe to him when your mother gave us the signal to rise."

"What a brilliant conversation!" observed Edna, sarcastically. "Well, I will prove to you that Richard is in his sulks, for he won't enter the drawing-room again to-night; and if he did," she added, laughing, "mamma would not speak to him, so it is just as well for him to absent himself. Now let us go in, and I will sing to you. When people are not here mamma always reads and I sing to her."

Edna sang charmingly, and Bessie much enjoyed listening to her; and when she was tired Mrs. Sefton beckoned Bessie to her couch, and talked to her for a long time about her family.

"All this interests me; I like to hear your simple descriptions, my child," she said, when Edna interrupted them by reminding her mother of the lateness of the hour. "Now you must go to bed." And she dismissed her with another kiss and a kindly good-night.

As the two girls went out into the hall they found Richard Sefton hanging up his cap on the peg. He wore a light overcoat over his evening dress, and had evidently spent his evening out.

"Good-night, Richard," observed Edna with a careless nod as she passed him; but Bessie held out her hand with a smile.

"Good-night, Mr. Sefton; what a beautiful evening it has been!"

"Yes, and so warm," he returned cheerfully, as though the girl's smile had loosened his tongue; "it is glorious hay-making weather. I expect we shall have a fine crop in the lower meadow."

"Are you hay-making?" exclaimed Bessie, with almost childish delight. "Oh, I hope your sister will take me into the hay-field."

"I will promise anything, if only you and Richard will not turn over the hay-cocks now," retorted Edna, with sleepy impatience. "Do come, Bessie." And Bessie followed her obediently. Richard Sefton looked after her, as her white dress disappeared up the dark staircase.

"She seems a different sort from most of Edna's friends," he muttered, as he lighted his pipe and retired to the nondescript apartment that was called his study. "There does not seem much nonsense about her. What do you think about it, Mac?" as the hound laid his head on his knee. "I imagine, as a rule, women have a precious lot of it." And he whistled a bar from the "Miller of the Dee."

"I care for nobody, no, not I, And nobody cares for me."

"What a long evening it has been," thought Bessie, as she leant out of the window to enjoy the sweet June air, and to admire the lawn silvered by the moonlight.

"It seems two days at least since I left Cliffe. Oh, I hope Hatty is asleep, and not fretting!"

"I wonder if I shall be happy here," she went on. "It is all very nice—the house and the country beautiful, and Edna as delightful as possible; but there is something wanting—family union. It is so sad to hear Edna talking about her brother. He is a perfect stranger to me, and yet I took his part at once. How could the poor fellow talk and enjoy himself while Mrs. Sefton was sitting opposite to him looking like an offended tragedy queen? He had not the heart to talk; besides, he knew that in engaging that man he was going against her wishes, and so he could not feel comfortable. Edna was wrong in calling him a bear. He was not at his ease, certainly; but he anticipated all my wants, and spoke to me very nicely. But there, I must not mix myself up in family disagreements. I shall have to be civil and kind to everyone; but it makes one thankful for one's peaceful home, and the dear mother and father," and the tears came into Bessie's eyes as she thought of her shielded and happy life, and the love of her sisters and Tom.

"God bless them all, and make me worthy of them!" thought the girl, with a sudden rush of tenderness for the dear ones at home.

Bessie was an early riser. Dr. Lambert had always inculcated this useful and healthy habit in his children. He would inveigh bitterly against the self-indulgence of the young people of the present day, and against the modern misuse of time. "Look at the pallid, sickly complexions of some of the girls you see," he would say. "Do they look fit to be the future mothers of Englishmen? Poor, feeble creatures, with no backbone to mention, leading unhealthy, frivolous existences. If my girls are not handsome, they shall at least be healthy; they shall learn self-control and self-guidance. Early hours will promote good appetites; plenty of exercise, fresh air, and good digestion will sweeten their tempers and enliven their spirits; a clear conscience and a well-regulated mind will bring them happiness in whatever circumstances they are placed. I am not anxious for my girls to marry. I don't mean to play minor providence in their lives, as some fathers do; but I would fit them for either position, for the dignity of marriage or for the unselfish duties of the single woman."

Dr. Lambert loved to moralise to his woman-kind; he had a way of standing before the fire and haranguing his family—anything would serve as a text for his discourse; some of his daughters certainly thrived on his homely prescriptions, but Hatty was the thorn in her father's side, the object of his secret anxiety and most tender care—the sickly one of his domestic flock. Hatty would never do him credit, he would say sadly; no medical skill could put colour into Hatty's pale cheeks, nor cure the aches and pains and nervous fancies that harassed her youth. As Dr. Lambert watched the languid step, or dissatisfied voice, he would sigh, as though some thought oppressed him; but, with all his gentleness—and he was very gentle with Hatty—he never yielded, nor suffered anyone else to yield to her wayward caprices. "My dear," he would say, when Bessie pleaded for some little extra indulgence for Hatty, "you must not think me hard if I say distinctly no to your request. You may trust me; I know Hatty better than you do. Very little would make her a confirmed invalid. It is not in our power, not in the power of any man living," continued the doctor, with emotion, "to give that poor child health; but we may help her a great deal by teaching her self-control. Half her misery proceeds from her own nervous fancies; if we can help her to overcome them, we shall do more for Hatty than if we petted and waited on her." But Bessie had always found this wise prescription of the doctor's a very difficult one.

Bessie always called the hour before breakfast her "golden hour," and by her father's advice she devoted it to some useful reading or study. In a busy house like the Lamberts', where everyone put his or her shoulder to the wheel, it was not easy to secure opportunity for quiet reading or self-improvement. There was always work to be done; long walks to be taken; the constant interruption of the two schoolgirls; Ella's practising to overlook; Katie's French verbs to hear, besides household tasks of all kinds. In the evenings the girls played and sang to please their father, who delighted in music; sometimes, but not often, their mother read aloud to them while they worked. It was against the family rules for one to retire into a corner with a book; in such a case the unfortunate student was hunted out, teased, pursued with questions, pelted with home witticisms, until she was glad to close her book and take up her needlework, for the Lamberts were brisk talkers, and their tongues were never silent until they were asleep, and then they talked in their dreams.

When Bessie rose early as usual, the morning after her arrival at The Grange, she sat down by the open window, and wrote a long letter to her mother and a little note to Hatty. It was an exquisite morning; the thrushes and blackbirds, the merle and the mavis of the old English poets, were singing as though their little throats would burst with the melody, and a pair of finches in the acacia were doing their best to swell the concert; the garden looked so sunny and quiet, and such a sweet breath of newly-made hay came in at the open window, that Bessie at last laid down her pen. The household was stirring, but the family would not be down for half an hour, so the maid had informed her, when she brought Bessie the morning cup of tea. Bessie had looked rather longingly at the pretty teapot, but her father had been so strong in his denunciations against slow poison, as he called it, imbibed on waking, that she would not yield to the temptation of tasting it, and begged for a glass of milk instead. This the maid promised to bring every morning, and as Bessie ate the bread and butter and sipped the sweet country milk, yellow with cream, she thought how much good it would do Hatty. Then she put on her hat and went softly downstairs, and, finding a side door open, went out into the garden.

She thought she and the thrushes and blackbirds had it to themselves, but she was mistaken, for in turning into a shrubby walk, skirting the meadow, she was surprised to see Richard Sefton sitting on a low bench, with Mac's head between his knees, evidently in a brown study. Bessie was sorry to disturb him, but it was too late to draw back, for Mac had already seen her, and had roused his master by his uneasy efforts to get free, and Mr. Sefton rose, with the awkward abruptness that seemed natural to him, and lifted his cap.

"Good morning, Miss Lambert. You are an early riser; my mother and Edna are hardly awake yet."

"Oh, I am always up long before this," returned Bessie, smiling at his evident astonishment, as she stooped to caress Mac, who was fawning on her.

"Mac seems to know you," he observed, noticing the dog's friendly greeting.

"It is very strange, but he seems to have taken a fancy to me," replied Bessie, and she narrated to Mac's master how the hound had pleaded for admission to her room, and had lain under her table watching her unpack.

"That is very odd," observed Richard.

"Mac has never bestowed a similar mark of attention on anyone but a certain homely old lady that my mother had here for a time, as a sort of charity; she had been a governess, and was very poor. Well, Mac was devoted to the old lady, and she certainly was an estimable sort of woman, but he will have nothing to say to any of Edna's fine friends, and generally keeps out of the way when they come."

"An animal's likes and dislikes are very singular," remarked Bessie, looking thoughtfully into Mac's brown eyes. "I believe Mac knows that I am a lover of dogs."

"Are you indeed, Miss Lambert? Would you like to see mine?" returned Richard, quickly; and his face lighted up as he spoke. He looked younger and better than he did the previous night. His powerful, muscular figure, more conspicuous for strength than grace, showed to advantage in his tweed shooting coat and knickerbockers, his ordinary morning costume. The look of sullen discomfort had gone, and his face looked less heavy. Bessie thought he hardly seemed his age—nine-and-twenty—and in spite of his natural awkwardness, he had a boyish frankness of manner that pleased her. Bessie was a shrewd little person in her way, and she already surmised that Richard Sefton was not at ease in his stepmother's presence. She found out afterwards that this was the case; that in spite of his strength and manhood, he was morbidly sensitive of her opinion, and was never so conscious of his defects as when he was presiding at his own table, or playing the part of host in her drawing-room, under her critical eye. And yet Richard Sefton loved his stepmother; he had an affectionate nature, but in his heart he knew he had no cause to be grateful to her. She had made him, the lonely, motherless boy, the scapegoat of his father's deceit and wrongdoing. He had been allowed to live at The Grange on sufferance, barely tolerated by the proud girl, who had been ignorant of his existence. If he had been an engaging child, with winning ways, she would soon have become interested in him, but even then Richard had been plain and awkward, with a shy, reserved nature, and a hidden strength of affection that no one, not even his father, guessed. Mrs. Sefton had first disliked, and then neglected him, until her husband died, and the power had come into Richard's hands. Since then she had altered her behaviour; her interests lay in conciliating her stepson. She began by recognising him outwardly as master, and secretly trying to dominate and guide him. But she soon found her mistake. Richard was accessible to kindness, and Mrs. Sefton could have easily ruled him by love, but he was firm against a cold aggressive policy. Secretly he shrank from his stepmother's sarcastic speeches and severe looks; his heart was wounded by persistent coldness and misunderstanding, but he had sufficient manliness to prove himself master, and Mrs. Sefton could not forgive this independence. Richard took her hard speeches silently, but he brooded over them in a morbid manner that resembled sullenness. Yet he would have forgiven them generously in return for one kind look or word. His stepmother had fascinated and subjugated him in his boyhood, and even in his manhood it gave him a pang to differ from her; but the truth that was in him, the real inward manhood, strengthened him for the daily conflicts of wills. Poor Richard Sefton! But after all he was less to be pitied than the woman who found it so difficult to forgive a past wrong, and who could wreak her displeasure on the innocent.

VARIETIES.

A PLEASANT EXPRESSION.

Miss Smith was sitting for her photograph.

"I saw you in the Park last Friday, Miss Smith," said the photographer.

"Oh, did you?" said she.

"Yes, and also your friend, Miss Brown—if you could raise your chin a trifle, thanks—and what an atrocious looking hat she had on!" After a pause, "There, Miss Smith, it is over, and I think we have caught a very pleasant expression."

TIME AND ETERNITY.—There are two things that should take up most of our thoughts and cares—time and eternity. Time, because it will so soon have an end, and eternity because it will never come to an end.

NOT FOR THE FIRST TIME.

"Gerty, did I show you this engagement ring of emeralds and diamonds that Charlie Brown gave me?"

"Oh, I have seen it before!"

"Seen it before?"

"Yes, when I was engaged to him last year."

HOW AND WHY SUNDAYS SHOULD BE KEPT.

The observance of Sunday as a Sabbath to the Lord is matter of obligation to every faithful Christian. No secular work should engage the body, no worldly thoughts the mind. It is a festival, and should be spent cheerfully; it commemorates the most inspiring of all achievements, and should be observed with elevation of spirit. On it light was created, therefore we should lay aside the works of darkness; on it the Lord rose from the bondage of the grave, so should we rise also to newness of life; on it the Holy Spirit descended, therefore on it specially should we rejoice in His Holy comfort and evidence His indwelling by active habits of grace and goodness.

AN HONOURABLE DIVISION.

"Now, George, you must divide the cake honourably with your brother Charles."

"What is honourable, mother?"

"It means that you must give him the larger piece."

"Then, mother, I'd rather that Charles should divide it."

BEAUTY IN PLAIN CLOTHES.

If ladies will take my word for it—and as they dress to please men, they ought to consult our fancy rather than their own in this particular—I can assure them there is nothing touches our imagination so much as a beautiful woman in a plain dress.

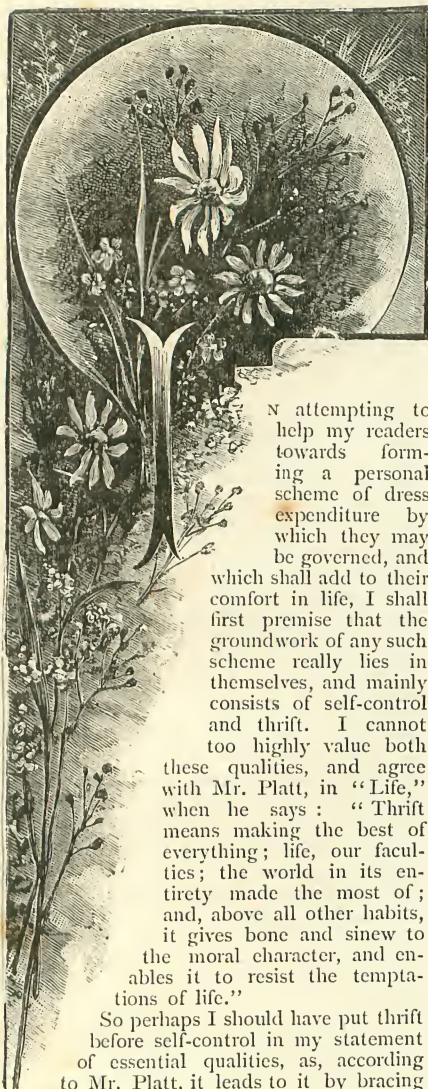

This, I know, is a very harsh doctrine to womankind, who are carried away with everything that is showy and with what delights the eye more than any other species of living creatures whatsoever.—Addison.

A LAWYER'S MARRIAGE.—The attention to business of the famous Lord Chancellor Hardwicke was so great that on the day of his marriage he went to chambers as soon as the ceremony was over to inspect his papers as usual. He returned to them in the afternoon after tea, and did not appear at his own house again till supper-time.

EASY AND DIFFICULT.—What is easy ought to be entered upon as though it were difficult, and what is difficult as though it were easy.

WHAT SHOULD WE AFFORD FOR DRESS?

By DORA DE BLAQUIERE

N attempting to help my readers towards forming a personal scheme of dress expenditure by which they may be governed, and which shall add to their comfort in life, I shall first premise that the groundwork of any such scheme really lies in themselves, and mainly consists of self-control and thrift. I cannot too highly value both these qualities, and agree with Mr. Platt, in "Life," when he says: "Thrift means making the best of everything; life, our faculties; the world in its entirety made the most of; and, above all other habits, it gives bone and sinew to the moral character, and enables it to resist the temptations of life."

So perhaps I should have put thrift before self-control in my statement of essential qualities, as, according to Mr. Platt, it leads to it by bracing the whole moral man or woman. It seems that one cannot put too high an estimate upon it, and he also quotes Burns to show that the practice of thrift leads to higher privileges and blessings. He says—

"Be thrifty,
Not for to hide it in a hedge,
Nor for a train attendant;
But for the glorious privilege
Of being independent."

That, of course, is thrift in the widest sense; in the narrower one it means, not to spend a shilling when sixpence will suffice, and to purchase nothing not absolutely needful, to waste nothing, and to economise clothes by taking due care of them. And here a friend of ours gives us a hint, that we are saved from much temptation to spend money when we make a rule to carry very little in our pockets. This rule, however, appears to us to be capable of abuse in the carrying out.

For we may succumb to a worse temptation, i.e., that of making our friends spend for us. We most of us have had experience of the friend who never seems to have any money, or who has "forgotten her purse," and whose little debts, run up in this way, seem to be forgotten with only too much facility. So perhaps we must add to our thrifty ways honesty in the practice of it, and then we shall not offend against the highest law of being equally careful of our neighbour's interest as of our own.

Another rule seems to be that we must keep a strict account of our dress expenditure, and be very apt in comparing one year's outlay with another, so as to learn the lessons of each year's demands and experiences. A fixed time for a thorough review of the wardrobe is also needful; and likewise a fixed period for the renewal of certain expensive articles, which, under the limitations of small dress-allowances, we cannot obtain every year.

It is rare to find an English household where there is not some definite arrangement about money-matters and the amount to be spent by both the husband and the wife on dress, what departments of expenditure it is intended to include—stationery, short journeys, books, essentials of the toilet, charity, in short, all the small expenses of daily life that must be provided for. If a woman do her duty as a wife and mother, she has a right to be treated as well, at least, as a paid housekeeper, and have the comfort of a clear and definite understanding on money-matters; and however generous and loving the husband may be, it is better that he should, from the first, place his wife in this position, rather than treat her as a child or a mere plaything, and to place her under the necessity of asking for money at the last moment when she wants it, and perhaps undergo a thousand tortures, for fear she may be asking too much in his estimation or spending more than she has a right to spare. Be the income large or small, the working partner at home has her right to a reasonable and proper share; and no honourable man will consider the allocation of such money either a grievance to him or a favour to her. It seems to me that half of the causes why "marriage is a failure," or why husband and wife may make shipwreck of their matrimonial peace, lies in the fact of the lack of a clear, mutual understanding on money matters. The happiest married people that I ever knew, who had been happy for fifty years, had prescribed to themselves one unvarying rule—i.e., outside the house the husband ruled unquestioned by the wife; inside the house the wife ruled unquestioned by the husband; while each leaned on the other for advice in all things relating to the general welfare of the home.

I have thus far been endeavouring to clear the ground in advance of me before proceeding to the consideration of my subject, for many things are included in my title. These really begin with the economical management of the income, and of the true way of doing it—i.e., that the husband and wife, as joint partners in the concern, should put their heads together and consult first as to the wise partition of the general funds. Of these latter funds the rent and household expenses form the greatest part, of course; and most people who reside in London have to make up their minds to pay too heavy a rent in proportion to their income. In a flat this is in some measure made-up to them by the absence of certain other expenses.

Lastly will come the question of dress, what the dress allowances are to include, and whether stationery, charities, and travelling expenses are to be chargeable on them. The extra cost of evening dress has also to be considered, and (if the person be a girl) who will supply her ball dresses? Or, if court dress be required, who will pay for that? All these things take some time to discuss, and we must remember that a professional man's wife is always a good deal criticised, and the amount of success with which the husband follows his profession is gauged by the apparel of his spouse. In America it is said that this is carried on to a vast extent, and the credit of a business man may be very seriously injured if his wife should fail to follow the prevailing fashion, or to wear some extravagant ornament on which she is by no means entitled to spend her money. But it must be done, such expenses must be entailed, or the economy practised will have disastrous effects on her husband's affairs.

And here we seem to feel it well to discuss another side question, which amongst women is often warmly debated, and has partisans both for and against. This consists in the sale of cast-off clothing, a custom which seems so universal amongst us, yet one at which all sensible persons must wonder, if they do not actually revolt at it. The prices paid are so small, while the garments sold, as a rule, are so good, too valuable, one would think, to their owners to be parted with so lightly. There are two reasons for this sale of good and half-worn clothes. The first is, that the wearer herself is not sufficiently clever, or not sufficiently industrious, to turn and remake them to advantage. The other reason is, that the prices of dressmakers are so high that they would not be worth remaking, while women who go out to work by the day are not often able to advise, and even supposing they could be obtained, they are not always satisfactory workers, and take a very long time to perform their work, which sometimes costs more than the materials are really worth. It seems strange that in all the outcry about "work for women" we should be always at a loss for good dressmakers, and good needlewomen of all kinds are so hard to be obtained. One would think that the quiet, sheltered life of a visiting needlewoman would be suitable and pleasant to many women, and the needful education which would enable them to cut out and fit new gowns, and cut down and remake old ones into children's frocks, would not be difficult to obtain. Evidently the true difficulty lies here, for the trade in ready-made clothing, the demand for it, and the enormous amount sold of it, increases day by day, whether it be in the department of children's clothing or in the ready-made apparel both of women and men. The shops also of the dealers in secondhand clothing increase and multiply, showing that but little use is made of the half-worn clothes by their original owners, which might be made over for children or altered for themselves again and again. When one hears of the small prices given, one is tempted to ask whether, if instead of selling, it would not be better to bestow it in charity on the many poor governesses and people of gentle birth and manners who cannot afford to clothe themselves.

This question of the making of dress is one of the burning questions of the day. Never were the materials of which dress is composed so cheap, and never was there a time when the dressmakers' bills were so long; and it seems more and more likely that this work, which is peculiarly women's own, will lapse from them; and that the private dressmaker will disappear before the outfitter and the "ready-made clothing" dépôt. Many women will tell you that they infinitely prefer seeing the skirt of the dress made-up before making a purchase, as they know then exactly how it will look, and they are saved much disappointment when things come home. They also enjoy the additional advantage of knowing the exact cost of the dress when complete, of which most shops supply an accurate estimate beforehand.

Of course, many women have not the time needful to spend on the making of a dress at home; and they earn or save the money in many other ways. For example, they teach or take charge of their children themselves; they have an invalid to nurse, or the parish work must be aided; the household, it may be, is large, and the servants few; or the garden and the fruit and the poultry take up their time. Few people lead a more busy life than the female head of the house in England, especially if her home be in the country; and it has been truly said that while the master of the house shuts up his office and goes home to dinner to rest the remainder of the day, women's work is never done until they retire to bed, and a large proportion amongst them not even then, if there be a baby or invalid in the house!

So far as our girls are concerned we are of opinion that they should be carefully instructed in the art of dressmaking, cutting out, and fitting and also in millinery; for with but a small allowance they will require all this knowledge to make things up inexpensively; and by doing so enable them to save something for other purposes, such as charities, gifts to others, and their own small pleasures. A girl of the present day requires a good deal of what may be termed "extra" dress. If she play tennis she needs a special kind of dress and shoes. If she ride she needs a habit and suitable gloves and hat; and the "tailor-made" gown seems to be one of the most useful things in her wardrobe. Ulsters, waterproofs, warm jackets, and the heaviest item of all, boots and shoes, these last being articles in which it is almost impossible to pinch oneself, as most girls in England walk out in all weathers, and therefore a change of boots must be kept, and in the house the feet must be tidy also.

To do all this the utmost care must be given by our girls with moderate incomes. Three pairs of thick boots are generally required, if not four, as requisite in the country; and with careful mending at once when required, one new pair a year should be enough to keep up the stock. Many women consider that boot-trees are one of the most saving of investments, and enable their boots and shoes to stand double the wear and tear that they otherwise would. Certainly wet boots never recover their shape except by the use of boot-trees, and for gentlemen's use they may be almost regarded as one of the necessities of life.

THE PRIZE COMPETITION FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE MISSION TO THE "DEEP SEA FISHERMEN."

HIS interesting and worthy society has, we are glad to say, received a very large addition to its stock of warm woollen articles through our competition. It was both large and successful, though it contained too many cuffs, and we think the girls who sent them in might in many cases have taken a little more trouble, and have made a muffler, or a pair of mittens. A considerable proportion of the work was excellent, the sailors' guernseys being very well knitted, and reflecting great credit on the workers. The same may be said of the heavy sea-boot stockings. The faults in this competition were those to which attention has been constantly called—i.e., knotted ends, cut off closely, and not run in, and tight knitting, especially at the finishing off row. In one case the examiner tried the knot with a slight pressure of the nail, when it immediately came undone and parted. Fancy the trouble of the poor sailor if all the knots were tied in the same fashion. Everyone who knits at all ought to know that knots are inadmissible, and that the two ends of wool should be laid side by side, and knitted in together. But it was evident, from the ages of those in whose work these faults occurred, that they were entirely the result of ignorance. The number and variety of the articles in the competition proved that its object commended itself to the sympathies of our girls. One competitor's wool was home-grown, and also home-spun by her mother, and, being undyed, it will certainly have the best chance of wearing well, and of affording warmth. Several of our girls knitted with crippled hands, and two of them had been called to a happier home of rest and peacefulness before they had completely finished the work they had commenced for the benefit of the poor toilers of the sea. In both cases the work laid down by the poor lifeless fingers was finished by the sorrowing mother, and sent in to the competition.

Of our blind girls, their many labours, and their excellence in finish, it is difficult to write. One of our competitors of 21 years writes:—"I have been blind from birth." But, though sightless, her work takes a first-class certificate worthily in seventy-one competitors of her own age. The industry shown in their painstaking work is very beautiful, and demonstrates how careful and godly has been the training of the English home and parents.

We have also one boy competitor, to whom we offer our thanks and congratulations, and a first-class certificate. Now that needlework and knitting are taught in our schools, we hope to welcome more industrious young people into our competitions on those subjects.

In spite of the clear directions given for the generality of the articles in this competition, there were some mistakes, one of which the Editor has illustrated. This sea-boot stocking had been decreased at the seam along the sole of the foot instead of making the proper decreases at each ankle, with the queer effect of producing a kind of bag where the heel ends. Others of our girls had sewn up the helmets wrongly, making a wide square of knitting instead of a long narrow bag. These the Examiners unpicked and carefully altered into the right shape. One of them, however, nothing could alter except unravelling, and that was out of the question, so it had to be sent in, hoping some clever sailor would find a use for it.

Age Six.

Two competitors.—Work very excellent; the muffler being especially good.

Age Seven.

Two competitors.—Work not quite so good.

Age Eight.

Two competitors.—Muffler and cuffs; but, perhaps owing to more lessons, the work at six is better.

Age Nine.

Nine competitors.—The pair of stockings sent in by Agnes Knight are quite wonderful for her age.

Age Ten.

Twenty-six competitors.—Work better, and showing much care.

Age Eleven.

Twenty-seven competitors.—Work good.

Age Twelve.

Thirty-three competitors.—Work excellent and painstaking.

Age Thirteen.

Thirty-nine competitors.—The finishing off in this class not so good.

Age Fourteen.

Thirty competitors.—Knots in many cases.

Age Fifteen.

Sixty-one competitors.—Eight pairs of sea-boot stockings, and the prize a seaman's guernsey, beautifully knitted. Work excellent.

Age Sixteen.

Sixty-four competitors.—The prize excellent work; but otherwise the work shows many knots and some carelessness.

Age Seventeen.

Seventy-four competitors.—Work not so clean in many cases as it should have been. Eleven pairs of sea-boot stockings in this class, all fairly well done.

Age Eighteen.

Eighty-three competitors.—Thirteen pairs of sea-boot stockings, but some of these too tightly knitted. The prize pair of stockings in this class excellent, evenly knitted, and well finished.

Age Nineteen.

Sixty-four competitors.—The guernseys in this class beautifully knitted. Eleven pairs of sea-boot stockings. Most of them fairly well knitted, though the knots are too numerous.

Age Twenty.

Eighty-seven competitors.—Work in this class shows a falling off; the knitting too tight, and the gussets of the foot generally carelessly knitted. Throughout the whole competition it has been curious to notice the varying numbers of stitches taken at the ankle gusset, varying from 5 to 10, 15 to 18 and 20, and then falling to none at all. Twenty-one sea-boot stockings.

Age Twenty-one.

Seventy-one competitors.—Work better, but many knots visible, though the knitting is good. Fifteen sea-boot stockings.

Age Twenty-two.

Eighty-five competitors.—Work getting better and more artistic.

Age Twenty-three.

Sixty-one competitors.—Work not so good.

Age Twenty-four.

Eighty-one competitors.—Knitting of jerseys excellent.

Age Twenty-five.

Fifty-three competitors.—Work not so good. In several cases the tops of the helmets not sewn up; this occurred not only in this class but in all, so the Examiner, for love of the poor sailors, went through the day's work with a needle and wool to make the helmets complete.

Age Twenty-six.

Fifty-nine competitors.—Ten sea-boots. Work excellent in this age; some crochet in it quite beautiful.

Age Twenty-seven.

Thirty-four competitors.—Work not perhaps quite so good. One competitor had very cleverly embroidered M.D.S.F. on the front of her guernsey, a very good thought.

Age Twenty-eight.

Fifty-eight competitors.—Eleven sea-boots. Work improved.

Age Twenty-nine.

Thirty-one competitors. Work not good. Nine sea-boot stockings.

Age Thirty.

Sixteen competitors. One pair sea-boot stockings. Work not so good.

Age Thirty-two.

Two competitors.

A large number of articles were sent in "Not for Competition," which the Examiner looked over carefully, and found that the needlework was in most cases excellent, and in all respects it compared favourably with the rest of the work sent in. The number of competitors was 1,154.

ART.

LOUISA M. and CHILTENHAM.—Perhaps the Nondescript Sketching Club would suit you. Write for particulars, enclosing stamped envelope, to Miss Wilson, Manor House, Tatchbury, Totton, Hants; or else the Tom Thumb Drawing Society—hon. sec., Mrs. James Paine, Uplands, Harrow on the Hill. Or Miss Winder's drawing, etching, and painting clubs. Write to Belle Vue House, Ulverstone, Lancashire. If you were to procure the little Directory of Girls' Clubs, before recommended, you might choose from among the Educational Societies for yourself. The principal rules of many of them are given. You might paint upon a kind of thick mill-board prepared for the purpose, which can be had at any artists' colourman's shop. A few of the clubs named in the directory have changed hands or broken up; but at the cost of a card this can always be ascertained.

AMATEUR.—Yes, Marie Anna Angelica Kauffmann, R.A., was married. At the age of forty she espoused Antonio Zucchi, A.R.A., in England. He was an Italian decorative painter, a Venetian by birth, and was much employed in this country by Robert Adam as a decorator. He left England with his wife and settled in Rome, where he died 1795, aged about seventy.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BARBARA. The marriage of first cousins is regarded as objectionable when there is some hereditary taint in the family, such as consumption. In this case it would be intensified in its effects by the united taint in the blood of both parents. But we must remember that the Jews have always married much closer relations (uncle and niece), and they are the most healthy people, we believe, in the world, not forgetting, however, that they are exceptionally moral. Can you not be guided by the advice of your parents?

ANNIE D.—We do not know of any help in such a case as yours. Why not make your affliction a stepping stone to higher things. Think how many sins of the tongue you are saved from by it. Think also how Christ "sighed" when He restored the gift of speech, and make up your mind steadfastly to forget it, and "go forward," that His "strength may be made perfect in your weakness" (see 2 Cor. xii. 9). Inquire about the possibility of wearing an artificial palate.

JOAN D'ARC.—You do not mention the size of your shells; if small, you can use them to cover boxes, fastening them on in patterns with strong glue.

MARY MONICA.—Paraffin oil for the hair is now generally used in the form of vaseline only, we think; and is generally considered good.

GOOSIE must not blame religion, but a mistaken way of demonstrating it, to which her father objects. Poor "Goosie," she seems to be between two stools, and we can only recommend good temper and a constant and patient "following after peace." An unselfish gentleness of disposition will often win over the most difficult people, and will be sure to benefit one's own soul.

ANXIOUS INQUIRER must "follow after peace," and remember that as her parents have given way to her desire, so she must give way a little to their wishes in return. October 13th, 1865, was a Friday.

HERO had better get some one to come and find out the rat holes, and stop them up first, if the place be so infested with them.

WHITE VIOLET had better go to the nearest nurseryman's or florist's and make the inquiry for herself.

DOROTHY MAY.—We sympathise much with you in your dreary life, but do not be dreary yourself, in spite of it all. We think, as the first doctor consulted was successful, you had better go to him again.

CONNIE.—We would never advise any woman to marry a man with drinking habits, and marriage, with the hope of reforming him, would be a great and fatal mistake.

AGATHA must get the doctor to interfere, and make the change for her, and induce her mother to consent to have two beds instead of one in the room. It is not good for young people to sleep with old ones.

MRS. CRICK.—We are happy to give you information about the "Judas Tree," obtained at Smyrna, from a resident clergyman. When in full bloom, a blaze of rose-hued flowers, the bees are attracted to it, for it has a luscious honey to present to them, and they indulge in it to repletion. But it holds poison amid its sweetness, and they fall dead round about the tree, which has proved a traitor to them. Tradition, and the fact of its deceptive attractiveness to the bees, may have led to its being named after the arch-traitor of our Lord. There are many traditions about this "Judas Tree;" the fig, tamarisk, wild carob, aspen, dog-rose, and elder have all been named as that on which the traitor hanged himself. In "Piers Plowman's Vision" we read—

"Judas, he japed
With Jewen silver,
And sitten on an ell;
Hanged hymselfe."

And we also find that Sir John Maundeville says that in his day there stood in the vicinity of Mount Zion "the tree of Eldre, that Judas henge him self upon for despayr." But according to a Russian proverb, "There is an accursed tree which trembles without even a breath of wind," in allusion to the aspen (Populus tremula), and in the Ukraine they say that the leaves of this tree have quivered and shaken since the day that the traitor hanged himself upon it. Shakespeare also says "Judas was hanged on an elder."

EVANGELINE must read the articles in the "G.O.P." by "Medicus," which contain all an "outsider," who does not see his patient, can say about a case; page 295, vol. v., "Common-sense Hints for Working Girls." Also page 76, vol. vii., "Healthy Lives for Working Girls." Both are excellent articles.

LASSIE B.—We are sorry to hear of your troubles, and of your mistress's disapproval of your complexion. The simple treatment is to use a lotion of two-thirds vinegar and one-third of water to the spots. Leave off coffee, beer, pastry, hot rolls, and pickles. Bat brown bread and watercress, with fruit and salad; and be careful your bedroom be well aired and ventilated.

SUTHERLAND should consult a doctor for her general health. The lids of the eyes may be bathed twice daily with warm water; and at night a very little lard may be used to the edges of the lids after the eyes are closed.

A. S.—Sympathising as we may, in the object you have at heart, it is a question into which we cannot enter in our columns at present.

TREHITSWAMOT must have a proper pair of spectacles. Many people's eyes are not both alike, and they have to procure a pair with glasses to suit each eye.

ENOR.—Tarts, in the article you mention, are those made in a deep piedish, with a thin crust at the top, and an egg-cup inside them, to retain the juice of the fruit; not the flat tarts, thin and rich, with pastry on both sides.

A GLASGOW GIRL is thanked most warmly for her very grateful and encouraging letter. We send her our best wishes in return, and we think her writing fairly good. But were she to shorten the long tails or dashes at the ends of the final letters of each word, she would improve it.

DAPHNE, LAL, and LAURIE.—You had better leave your moles alone, unless you mean excrescences, which should be treated by a doctor. Lal has done nothing wrong or contrary to the rules of etiquette in the case she names. Get a hairdresser, Miss "Daphne," to singe your hair, but do not have it done by any but a well-practised hand.

LILIAN GITTENS.—We do not send private answers, nor do we make any charge for those we give in the "G.O.P." The editor has nothing to do with the publishing department of the R.T.S. Write for numbers of the "G.O.P.," for the pictures, or for any of their publications, to Mr. Tarn, 56, Paternoster Row.

SUSIE had better accept the proposal if all the circumstances of the case be exactly as she has represented them.

A STUDENT.—We agree with your mother in her disapproval of studying late at night. Better go to bed early and get up early. But if you must work at night for a time, taking a good hot cup of strong tea and a biscuit would be better than risking a cold in your eyes and head, or an attack of neuralgia, by putting a wet cloth round your forehead.

A SUBSCRIBER does not state her age; but we have known instances of young girls who have had a shoulder-blade forced outwards from learning to play the harp, completely restored to straightness across the shoulder-blades by the daily use for an hour, or for a couple of hours, of a back-board and face-board. If for two hours, the time should be divided.

NEVVOUS.—Upper Norwood, or on nearly on the top of the "High Level," is much to be recommended for persons who need bracing and a cheerful, bright locality. Hampstead and Highgate (upon the hill), well removed from the cemetery of the latter, would probably suit you, but from personal experience we can recommend Upper Norwood.

MADGE.—You might perhaps extract the grease occasioned by your hair on the back of your silk dress by the use of French chalk. This should be scraped over it on the wrong side, and gently rubbed on with the finger; otherwise use benzine. Should these fail, try a moderately hot flat iron, putting a piece of clean blotting-paper between.

TIMID had better wear a woollen jersey with long sleeves next the skin. Weatherproof gloves might suit you.

CHEERFUL might send the old music to the P. P. C. Society, for poor clergy, addressed Mrs. Bready, Haddenham House, Worcester; or to the A. F. D. Society, Miss Hinton, 4, York Place, Clifton, Bristol. Books, music, and cast-off clothing, etc., are all thankfully received for these poor families. The giving by our correspondents of their real names is optional.

E.C.—By 29 Char. II., c. 7, it was enacted that no tradesman, artificer, workman, labourer, nor other person whatsoever shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, nor work at their ordinary callings upon the Lord's day, or any part thereof (works of charity and necessity excepted). The Workshop Regulations Act, 1861 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 146, s. 6) provides that no child, young person, nor woman shall be employed in any handicraft on Sunday. In the Factory Acts Extension Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 103, s. 7), the owner of a stage coach is not within the statute, nor are railways. By the 34 Vict., c. 19, Jews are exempted from penalties under these Acts in respect of young persons and females professing the Jewish religion.

SUFFERING ONE.—Apply to B. Mackell, Esq., sec. of the Royal Orthopaedic Hospital, 297, Oxford Street, W. If you should fail to obtain a vacancy there, write to the secretary of the City Orthopaedic Hospital, at 27, Hatton Garden, E.C.

ATA-ATA can procure Tidman's sea salt, though living at a distance from the coast, for the baths recommended. The soap for the face should be very mild, and little scented.

DESIRING FAITH.—To obtain an increase of faith you must ask for it in fervent prayer; and not only so, but be willing to take God at His word, who promised to "give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him;" thanking Him that He will fulfil His promise. At the same time, look for all the passages in the scriptures that have reference to His faithfulness, His tender compassion and sympathy for us, His immeasurable love.

HIGH SCHOOL GIRL.—The Canaanites were the same people as the Etruscans and Phoenicians; the Pelasgi are traced from Tyre or Sidon. The original languages spoken after the Deluge were the Arabian and ancient Celtic, the Arabian being the mother of all the Western languages, and sister to the Celtic. A grand colony is said to have been brought to Ireland from ancient Babylon and the surrounding country by a Magus, living near that city.

THUNDERSTORM.

A FORTNIGHT later Arthur Clifford got into his boat on Saturday afternoon about six o'clock, and pulled himself leisurely down the river to Muck Fleet, where he expected to meet Eve at the heronry at half-past six. It was a lovely June evening, and the river banks were lined with the white feathery flowers of the meadow sweet and masses of red valerian; the magenta bells of the foxglove rang among the sedges; the yellow iris shone brilliantly among its long, pale, blue-green leaves growing luxuriantly all along the shallow borders, while on the river itself the water-lilies growing near the banks were now in bud, and from time to time Arthur stopped to gather some for Eve. The gnats buzzed merrily overhead, dragon-flies flashed like living jewels across the river. Now and then a swallow-tail butterfly hovered over the flower-crowned banks, goldfinches gleamed among the downy tufts of the giant thistles growing in the tangle of reeds and sedges, water-hens started about, uttering their unmusical cry among the rushes, while the songs of birds, too numerous to mention, accompanied Arthur on his journey. All nature was overflowing with joy and beauty; the very fish were flashing and gleaming in silent ecstasy under the warm sunlit water.

Even Muck Fleet looked beautiful, at least to Arthur's eyes, as he turned up it, the top of its high banks crowned with purple mallow and blue forget-me-not, large moon-daisies, and feathery grasses. The tide was so high that on the marshland-side, where the bank was lower, Arthur's head was above the bank, and he had not advanced very far before he saw a tall figure with a long white beard, clad in high leather jack-boots which reached to his thighs, a blue jersey, and the inevitable big-brimmed hat, mowing the reeds, which, tall as Noah, for it was he, towered over him as he bent to his work.

Most of the reeds laid low, only a small patch was left to mow, and Arthur conjecturing that Noah meant to finish that patch before he went home, and knowing Eve would not venture to come till he returned, thought he might as well go and talk to his future father-in-law, who was blissfully unconscious of the honour in store for him; so he landed and splashed across the marshy ground to Noah's side.

"Good-day, Noah; you are hard at work this evening. I thought you had a half-holiday on Saturday."

"So I have mostly, sir; that is to say, I work at the decoy Adam Day and I are making on Saturday afternoons, but I am late with my marsh-mowing this year, so I mean to finish this evening. I shan't be more than a quarter of an hour. Generally, I finish at the beginning of May, but I am a month late."

"I see. Now what is the use of these reeds when mown?" said Arthur, listening to the musical rhythm of Noah's scythe, as at each long powerful stroke it swept down an armful of rushes, which, towering proudly over the reaper one moment, were lying prone at his feet the next.

"We use them for many things, Mr. Arthur. For thatching; most of our marshmen's cottages are thatched with them; we use them, too, to support plaster-work, and I have made most of the screens for the decoy with them," said Noah, mowing away as he spoke.

"I see a good many sedges growing among them; they are no use, I suppose."

Noah smiled as he stood up and wiped his scythe.

"I never yet came across anything the Lord made that hadn't a use, Mr. Arthur, though I don't say I always know what the use of everything is. When we do rightly know the use of everything, I reckon we shall have no more poverty. There is really plenty for everybody, but we waste so much through ignorance. As time goes on, we shall go on growing in knowledge, and we shall learn the use of everything; then when nothing is wasted through ignorance, no one will want. But you asked me about these sedges. We use them for litter; they'll have to be stacked and dried like the reeds first. I shall stack them all next week, I hope. There, I have finished. I'll go home and have some tea, and look into the club this evening," said Noah, shouldering his scythe and walking towards his boat, which was moored close to Arthur's.

As he passed Arthur's boat he noticed the water-lilies and flowers lying at the bottom, and concluded they were for Miss Grace, between whom and Arthur he thought there must be an attachment, or why should this gay young gentleman care to spend so much of his time in a dull place like Windham? He little thought they were for Eve; had he known it, they would probably have shared the fate of those lilies he had thrown away years ago because Eve had disobeyed him. As little did he think that Eve, as she gave him two basins of tea and cut his bread and bacon for him when he got home, was longing for him to finish his meal and go off to the club, leaving the coast clear for her to escape to her lover.

"I saw Mr. Clifford up at Muck Fleet; he was in his boat gathering flowers for Miss Grace," said the unconscious Noah, attacking his second basinful of tea.

"How do you know they were for Miss Grace? Did he tell you so?" asked Mrs. Oldman, curiously watching the bright red blood which had flooded Eve's beautiful face, bent low over her work as it was.

"No, but I feel sure they were. Young gentlemen don't gather flowers for themselves; who else should they be for?" said Noah.

"Ah! who indeed?" ejaculated Mrs. Oldman; while Eve, complaining of the heat, put away her work and went out and ferried herself across the river, fearing lest Arthur's patience should, like her own, be exhausted; thinking, too, she might as well be caught in his society as sit there and betray herself by her guilty blushes. She had not been gone long when Grace Leicester knocked at the door of the ark, saying she had come to ask if Eve would go for a walk with her across the meadows to the heronry to get a peep at Filton Broad, and on hearing that Eve was out, she asked Noah if he would ferry her across the river that she might go alone.

Noah willingly agreed to do so; but on going out they found the boat was on the other side of the river where Eve had left it. Grace looked disappointed, as Noah observed; and feeling sure she was going after Arthur Clifford, whom he had left close to the heronry, he soon solved the difficulty.

"If you'll go into the ark for a few minutes, Miss Grace, I'll swim across and get the boat for you. Eve must be gone in that direction, so perhaps you'll overtake her." And Grace being for some reason bent on walking in the direction of the heronry that night, agreed to Noah's proposal, and waited with Mrs. Oldman till he had fetched the boat.

"Mr. Clifford is up by the heronry in his boat, so you may meet him, and he can bring you back, Miss Grace," said Noah, as he rowed her over the river.

"Is he? Then perhaps I shall see him; he told me he should not be back till late, though, so he may be going much further," said Grace.

"If so you can get my wife to row you across; she'll be at home, and will hear you if you call her, but I think you are sure to come across Eve in some of the pastures."

Grace walked fast on landing, hoping to do so, but it was not till she entered the last field before the plantation that she caught sight of Eve; then she saw a girlish figure in a light dress and a straw hat walking some distance in front of her, and almost the next moment the figure of a man emerged from the plantation. They were too far off for Grace to recognise either; she only concluded the girl to be Eve because she knew her to have gone in that direction; but, unlike the rest of her sex in many things, Grace was like most women in this—she was curious, and she determined to continue her walk and see who this couple could be. Perhaps it was Adam Day; if so she should know for certain what she had often heard said, that he and Eve were engaged. At any rate she would go on to the borders of the plantation into which the lovers had disappeared, and try and see who they were. There could be no harm in this, particularly as the plantation was Mr. Leicester's property.

She accordingly continued her walk until she reached the place where Eve and her companion had entered the plantation; here she paused, for a laugh, which she recognised at once as Arthur Clifford's, fell on her ears, and looking through the trees she saw him and Eve seated side by side on a felled trunk. As anxious to escape detection as the lovers themselves could have been, Grace turned and walked quickly away, shocked, grieved, and frightened at what she had seen. That they stood in the relation of lovers to each other there was no doubt, and young and inexperienced as Grace was, she knew enough of the world to be frightened on Eve's account; for it never occurred to her that Arthur Clifford seriously contemplated marrying Noah's daughter. He was, in her opinion, only amusing himself at Eve's expense, and she grieved for the sorrow that her foster-sister would feel when she woke and found her heart had been the toy of some idle hours, to be thrown away when the player had had enough of the game. She was shocked, too, at the deception both Eve and Arthur were practising on Noah and Mr. Leicester, either of whom would have been horrified had they known what was going on.

But what was Grace to do? Should she go straight home and tell her father what she had seen, or should she stop at the ark and tell Mrs. Oldman? She could not bring herself to do either of these things. She could not be the means of getting Eve, whom she loved almost as a sister, and Arthur, whom she regarded in the light of a brother, into trouble. No, she must keep their secret, but she would remonstrate with them both on their conduct, and she hoped they would listen to her. She had a good deal of influence with Arthur, as she knew; though not of the kind her father, as she also knew, hoped and thought she possessed, for Grace was well aware that her father and Mrs. Clifford both wished the two families to be united by a marriage between her and Arthur, and she considered it one of the blessings of her life that Arthur never evinced anything but a brotherly fondness for her. This she returned warmly, and was thankful to be spared the pain of rejecting addresses of a warmer nature, for she could never feel any but a sisterly affection for Arthur Clifford, and it would have gone very hard with her had she been forced to thwart her father's wishes in this matter.

Suddenly a flash of lightning, which seemed to fall in a zigzag current into the river not half a mile from Grace, and was followed almost immediately by a terrific clap of thunder, startled her out of the reverie into which she had fallen, and looking round she saw thunder-clouds were gathering all round the horizon, though there was still blue sky overhead; but the storm from the river was coming up fast, and her way home lay through it. There was no shelter to be had till she reached Noah's ark, so nothing was to be done but go on until she got there. Fortunately Grace was not nervous, and was accustomed to the heavy thunderstorms which spring up so suddenly in the broads. The first flash was soon followed by another, which appeared to strike the ground a few hundred yards to the left of her, and the deafening peal of thunder which followed seemed as though it would never end; and so quickly did the storm advance that in a few minutes the sky was overcast with heavy-laden clouds, black and lurid, where the centre seemed to be. There were some cattle grazing in the field Grace was passing through, and they stopped feeding and huddled together, trembling with fear, while she took to her heels and ran as fast as they could carry her across the meadows, through what was now a continuous roll of thunder and constant flashes of lightning which played about her path. Grace remembered to have heard that to be killed by lightning was as painless as it was instantaneous; and comforting herself with this thought she ran on. The ark was in sight now; only one more field besides the one she was in separated her from it, when suddenly a sharp crackling sound, followed by a clap of thunder that sounded immediately over her head, caused her to turn, and she saw a poplar tree had been struck and split in two just behind her. At the same moment the rain began to fall, first in big drops, but before the now terrified Grace reached the last field, in torrents, which retarded her progress. Panting she ran on, not daring to hold up her sunshade for fear of attracting the lightning, and to her joy she saw Mrs. Oldman come to the door of the ark, and seeing her approach, go in for a mackintosh, and then row across the river to fetch her. Dripping with wet, trembling with fear, breathless from exhaustion, Grace stepped into the boat, and Mrs. Oldman, speechless from fear—for, as Grace knew, she was so terrified during thunderstorms that she had been known to hide, during a bad one, under her feather bed—now rowed for their lives, and in two minutes they were inside the ark, and, comparatively speaking, safe. And then Mrs. Oldman did a strange thing, though at the time Grace was too much upset by the excitement she had gone through to notice it; she threw her arms round the girl's slight figure, and, kissing her, sobbed out—

"My darling, my darling, I made sure you would be killed by the lightning."

"But there is Eve, Mrs. Oldman; she is out in it. Oh, if anything should happen to her!" exclaimed Grace, rising and going to the door of the ark, but a vivid flash of lightning, as she opened it, drove her back.

"Shut the door, child; for the sake of us both shut the door. It is an awful tempest, and my old man and Eve are out in it; at least Noah would be safe in the club, but I doubt he'll come out to look for Eve, who is gadding about nobody knows where. But, praise His name, you are safe, Miss Grace, at least if the lightning does not strike the ark; but I don't think that last peal was quite so heavy. Did you see anything of Eve in your walk, my dear?"

"Yes, she was in the plantation. I did not go so far, the storm overtook me as I was coming back."

"She ain't afraid, that is one comfort; she is like Noah in that. It isn't so bad as it was, but you'll bide a little longer, the rain is very heavy still." And Grace, guessing Mrs. Oldman didn't care to be left, stayed on, though she longed to go home to her father, who would be anxious about her. Presently the thunder subsided into a low distant rumbling, heard only at intervals, but the rain still continued to fall so heavily that it was almost impossible for Grace to leave the ark, and while she was waiting to go, Noah returned, looking unusually grave.

"Thank God you are safe, Noah! but Eve is not back yet. I hope and trust she has not come to any harm out in such a storm."

"The rain is very heavy, but Eve is strong; a wetting won't hurt her," said Noah.

"The rain mayn't, but, man alive, the lightning may have struck her. I don't know when we have had such a bad thunderstorm. I thought you'd have been home from the club sooner to look for her," said Mrs. Oldman.

"I have not been to the club, and I did not notice the storm; but I'll go and look now," said Noah, quietly.

"Not notice the storm!" interrupted Mrs. Oldman. "Why, where on earth have you been; the thunder was loud enough to wake the dead?"

"Not quite, Mary. I have just come from the death-bed of Mrs. Day, and it did not wake her," said Noah, sadly.

"Mrs. Day! Is she really dead?" asked Grace.

"Yes, Miss Grace. I went to call for Adam as usual, and found she had just had another stroke, so I stayed with him. She did not rally, and passed away quite quietly about half an hour ago. Poor lad, he feels it very much, though it has been hanging over him so long; but I must go and look for Eve. Will you wait till I come back, Miss Grace, and I will see you home? it is getting late for you to go back alone."

Grace gave a hesitating consent to this proposal; but she really wished to hear more about the death of Adam's mother, the news of which startled and upset her, though she gave but little outward sign of how much it affected her, but sat silently listening to Mrs. Oldman's comments on the news.

"Dead at last, and died in a storm after all. Well, her life was like a very rainy day, cloudy and threatening; I don't wonder she went off in a tempest at last. I am sorry for Adam, poor lad, though it is the best thing that could happen to him in a manner of speaking. He was like a caged bird as long as she lived; now he can spread his wings and rise and fly away over our heads, and he'll do it too. He is a rising man, is Adam, but he won't care to stay here, hovering overhead in the same place like a hawk fascinating a bird; no, he'll spread his wings and fly clear away; but he won't take Eve with him, as my old man would like, so it is no use his wishing for it, nor praying for it neither. God Almighty may work miracles, but He doesn't make young people love each other unless they have a mind to do so, any more than He makes them leave off loving when once they have begun."

"Oh, Mrs. Oldman! God can do everything; even that, if we will only let Him," said Grace, blushing.

"Ah, my dear, but that is just it. Young folks won't let Him; they will go their own way in such things as love and marriage; and God Almighty don't stop them, let alone any one else, though Noah would be angry indeed with me if he heard me say so."

But before Grace had time to answer, Noah returned to say Mr. Clifford was rowing Eve home, and they would be at the ark immediately.

"Then I'll get into the boat when Eve lands," said Grace, thinking this would be an excellent opportunity to speak to Arthur about his intimacy with Eve, and secretly rather glad that Noah had caught the culprits together, as it would perhaps open his eyes to what was going on.

But as it turned out, Noah was so pre-occupied in thinking of the scene he had just witnessed that he at once accepted Arthur Clifford's apparently straightforward confession that he had met Eve by the heronry, and as the storm was so heavy he had brought her home in his boat wrapped up in his mackintosh, but little the worse for the wet, though frightened by the lightning.

Frightened, Eve certainly was, though whether by the lightning or not is another matter; but she was pale and trembling as she ran into the ark, while Grace took her place in the boat.

"Why, Grace, you are wet through! Where have you been? My dear child you'll catch your death of cold; I must get you home as quickly as possible," exclaimed Arthur.

The rain had almost ceased, but the sky was grey and sullen, as though nature had not yet recovered her temper, but was sulking after her outburst of passion, and the air was still heavy and oppressive.

"I will change directly I get home. I have been to the heronry and was caught in the storm on my way back, so I sheltered in the ark."

"To the heronry? I did not see you," said Arthur, more surprised than pleased.

"No, but I saw you, and I am very sorry I did; sorry for your sake, but more sorry for Noah, and sorriest of all for Eve. Arthur, dear, you must promise me you will never meet her again, or I must tell father all I saw to-night."

"Tell your father! You won't do anything so cruel and foolish. It could do no possible good; on the contrary, it would only do harm. There would be no end of a row, and I thought you were always a peacemaker, Grace," exclaimed Arthur, vehemently.

"I don't want to have to tell father; I want you to give up meeting Eve. It is very wrong of her to deceive her parents like this. It would almost break Noah's heart if he knew it; and, Arthur, forgive me for saying it, but it is still more wrong of you to play with her affections in this way."

"Play with her affections! I play with her! You don't know what you are talking about, Grace. Play, indeed, when I love her with all my heart and soul; I'd die for her to-morrow if there were any need. Play with her affections, when I mean to marry her as soon as I am of age!"

"Marry Eve! But, Arthur, how can you? She is very pretty, and sweet, and good, and I love her dearly; but she—she is—you know—not a lady; she is only a fisherman's daughter."

"She is one of nature's ladies; and how often have I heard you say Noah Oldman was the greatest saint you ever met? As for his being a fisherman, so were the apostles; and I can't understand how such a good girl as you are, and you are the saintliest woman I ever met, can despise Noah and Eve just because they are not what is conventionally called gentlefolk."

"I don't despise them, Arthur; I have, as you know, the very greatest respect for Noah, and I admire Eve exceedingly, but I don't think her a suitable wife for you. Just imagine what your mother and sisters would say to such a proposal."

"I don't care a rush what my mother and sisters will say. Eve has learnt so much from you by being with you so often, and is naturally so refined and ladylike—to use a word I hate—that a year on the Continent to pick up a few conventional habits is all she wants to fit her for her position as my wife, and that she shall have as soon as we are married."

"But, Arthur, it is impossible. Father will never consent, and he is your guardian; your mother will not hear of it; and I am sure Noah will never sanction such a marriage."

"Leave all that to me; all I ask of you is to say nothing about it to any one till after Monday week. I shall be twenty-one then, and I give you my word of honour Noah and your father and my mother shall hear all about it on that day. Promise me, Grace, to keep my secret till then, will you? You have always been like a sister to me; do this for me. I only ask you to be silent for ten days, for the sake of peace. Nothing any one can say can alter my determination. I loved Eve as a child; I loved her as a boy; I love her as a man; and I mean to marry her, in spite of them all."

"But, Arthur, you are wrong; we are not placed in this world to please ourselves only, we are bound to consult the wishes of our parents in such matters as these. It can't be right to cause your mother such pain as this marriage must inevitably do."

"I can't help it; if she chooses to make a trial of it, she must do so. My misery if anything happened to prevent it would be far greater than any pain it can possibly cause her. But here we are. Promise me, Grace, you will say nothing until my birthday. I give you leave to speak then; only be silent for this next ten days, will you?"

"I am not sure that I am doing right," began Grace.

"I won't meet Eve again till next Saturday, I promise that," interrupted Arthur.

"Very well, then, I will say nothing till your birthday; but mind, if you don't tell father then, I must."

"I promise you they shall all know it by breakfast time on my birthday, so it's a bargain. Thank you, Grace; I can never half thank you for this," and as Grace gave him her hand to help her out of the boat, he raised it to his lips.

They were close to the Rectory, and they walked home in silence after this, Arthur evolving plans for carrying Eve off and marrying her on his birthday, Grace pondering over the events of the evening, and trying to drive the thought of Adam Day, alone with his dead, from her mind. But try as she would, the thought would arise this evening, and long after she had gone to her own room she struggled to banish it. Another time she would have counted it a sin to dwell on the thought of him who was dearer to her than her father, but who for that father's sake she could not accept as her lover, though she knew the wealth of his whole heart's love was hers to take or refuse, as seemed to her best; but to-night his trouble, and the fact that his mother was lying dead in his house, made him almost a legitimate object of sympathy. And yet she could not acquit herself of rebellious thoughts when she knelt down to her prayers, for the thought of Mrs. Day's death was quickly followed by the thought of the change it would make in Adam's life. Now he would be free to go to college after all these weary years of waiting, borne, as Grace knew, so patiently. But for his mother he might now have been in the position of a gentleman, and now she was gone he would not lose a day in working for his degree, and if her father were a competent judge, he would distinguish himself by his talents, which were of no common order. But no matter to what pedestal Adam Day climbed, Mr. Leicester, as Grace well knew, would never consider him a suitable match for her. Fond and proud as he was of his old pupil, good and humble as he was himself, Mr. Leicester was firmly convinced that the Leicesters belonged to one order of creation and Adam Day to another, and for those orders to intermarry was in his eyes not only a sin but a social crime of the blackest dye. And so from the first moment that it dawned upon Grace Leicester that the light in Adam's deep-set grey eyes when they rested on her was the light of love, and at the same time she was conscious that light kindled a fire in her own pure girlish heart, her inner life had been one continual struggle to quench that fire, and every time she met Adam the embers were rekindled, to be subdued again by prayer and a firm determination to add no fuel to the flame in the shape of day-dreams and airy castles.

To-night the fire was burning clearer and brighter than it had ever done, for she saw in the future Adam a member of the university, perhaps a fellow of his college, probably well off and headmaster of some good school, admired and sought on account of his learning and talents; how much more difficult it would be to banish such thoughts then, when his poor old peasant mother dead and buried, the memory of his humble past was forgotten in the brilliant prospects of the future! And falling on her knees, her golden hair streaming over her shoulders and reaching to the ground, her pale, sweet face raised to heaven, the hot tears filling the upturned blue eyes, she prayed long and earnestly that He who had helped her so far would strengthen her to bear the still greater trials which lay before her in the future. And as she prayed it seemed to dimly dawn upon her that there was one thing in creation sweeter than even earthly love, and that is resignation to God's will, even when that will is demanding the sacrifice it costs most to make.

And Grace never doubted that to make a marriage which would almost break her father's heart would be a wrong and selfish thing to do, and therefore, cost her what it might, must be given up, though she knew she should love Adam Day all her life.

SYMPATHY.

By SYDNEY GREY.

SWEET sympathy—
Methinks 'twere hard to measure
The outgrowth of thy mighty influence;
That subtle spell, proclaiming kinship, whence Life wins its purest pleasure.

Making of self
Most full and free surrender,
That so another heart may rest unpained,
Or grief be soothed, or feeble folk sustained
By ministration tender.

Weary our lot
Without thy gentle presence;
As turns the steadfast needle to the pole,
We turn to thee, dear sunshine of the soul,
Of love itself the essence.

Widespread my power,
And glorious thy mission;
'Tis thine to rouse endeavour, sow the seed,
Which haply in some wise and noble deed
Shall find at length fruition.

Deprived of thee
Hope loses half its sweetness,
And joy must barren and imperfect be;
Each needs the answering smile of sympathy
To round it to completeness.

PART III.
HOW A FRENCH COOK DRESSES FISH.

HERE is a great difference in the English and French methods of cooking fish; the latter take much more trouble over it than we do, for where we should boil a fish in salt and water, they generally cook it in a broth made for the purpose, and fish to be broiled is prepared by being laid in a marinade; oil, parsley, onions, herbs, lemon juice, and vinegar are used for this purpose.

Then fish is not fried as we ordinarily fry it, with a little fat in the pan; there is enough oil or fat put in to cover the fish, so it is literally boiled in it; this obviates the necessity of turning the fish as it cooks. It is best fried in a wire basket or on a wire strainer that fits the pan, which should be a good depth. The fish not being in direct contact with the frying-pan, cooks better, and when done the strainer can be raised and the fat drained from it.

I have not thought it necessary in the following recipes to give all the usual directions for cleaning and preparing fish for cooking.

Wine is often used in cooking fish in France. Cider is a good substitute for the light, white wine, and sometimes lemon juice or vinegar can be used. The two first recipes are for broths in which to boil fish.

Court Bouillon au Blanc.—Boil a bunch of herbs, a bay-leaf, parsley, half an onion, some peppercorns, and salt, in water until it is flavoured; then strain and add half or one-third the quantity of milk, and then put the fish in to cook. This bouillon is much used for cooking turbot and some other flat fish in.

Court Bouillon au Bleu.—Slice two onions and two carrots, put them in the fish kettle with a small clove of garlic, a bunch of parsley, thyme, basil, a bay-leaf, some salt and peppercorns, half a tumbler of vinegar, and a tumbler of red wine (vin ordinaire), or some use a light white wine. Add sufficient hot water, boil a few minutes, skim, then put the fish in to cook; as soon as it is done throw in a glass of cold water and leave until the moment of serving.

Salmon au Bleu.—Make enough court bouillon hot to cover the salmon, put the fish in, let it boil, then draw to the side of the stove and let it simmer gently—for four pounds of salmon about forty-five minutes. It is served with parsley round and with vinaigrette, white sauce with capers, maître d'hôtel, or other sauce, according to taste.

Salmon Cutlets.—Place the slices of salmon in some oil with sprigs of parsley, a slice of onion, and some salt; let them remain an hour or more according to their thickness, turn them once or twice, then dip some papers in the oil in which they have been soaked, wrap the cutlets in the papers, and broil them over a slow fire. They will take about half an hour to cook, longer if very thick (or they are taken out of the oil and broiled without the papers). Serve with tartare or caper sauce.

Salmon à la Rémoulade.—Cook some slices of salmon in court bouillon, drain them, and remove the skin, place them on a dish, cover them with remoulade sauce. They can be served while the fish is hot, or eaten cold.

Salmon Cutlets à la Béarnaise.—Take some slices of salmon, sprinkle them with salt, then dip them in oil, cover with fine breadcrumbs, and broil about twenty-five minutes. Serve with Béarnaise sauce.

Mayonnaise of Salmon.—Cut in small dice some cooked potatoes, carrots, celery-root, and beetroot, season and mix with a few spoonfuls of mayonnaise; spread a thick layer of this salad on a small dish, raising it a little in the middle; take a piece of cold salmon, remove the skin and bone, and cut it in nice slices, all as nearly as possible the same size; season these with oil, vinegar, and salt, and place them on the cut vegetables; fill in the interstices with more of the salad; cover the whole with a thick mayonnaise; decorate the top with fillets of anchovies and with olives and sliced gherkins, place round the edge alternately quarters of hard boiled eggs and cabbage lettuces.

Turbot, to boil.—Wash the fish in several waters, then rub it all over with a lemon that you have cut in halves; put milk and water, parsley and salt in the fish kettle; let it get hot, put the turbot in, let it boil, then draw on one side to simmer. Time according to size. It is served with caper, oyster, or other sauce. Turbot is also cooked au bleu.

Turbot à la Crème.—Cook together an ounce of butter and an ounce of flour, add half a pint of milk, boil, then add a little cream. Warm some cold turbot in some of the broth or water in which it was cooked; remove the skin and bones, and break it into flakes, put in a flat dish in layers, covering each layer with the white sauce; heap it in the centre, let the top layer be sauce; cover with dried bread-crumbs; pour a little oiled butter over, and brown in the oven. Another way is to mix the turbot with the white sauce, make all hot, and put in a vol-au-vent case.

Turbot, Sauce Hollandaise.—Cook a piece of turbot in court bouillon au bleu, and serve sauce hollandaise over it.

Turbot en Coquilles.—Cut some cold turbot in small pieces, cook a few mushrooms, chop them small, add a truffle if you have one, and mix all with some good béchamel sauce; butter some scallop shells, fill with the mixture, put a few breadcrumbs over, and a little butter; brown and serve.

Turbot en Croquettes.—Chop some cold turbot (without skin), put it in a saucepan with some thick béchamel or other white sauce, let it cook a few minutes, stirring it until it is rather dry; then turn it on to a buttered plate; when quite cold form it into little rolls, egg and breadcrumb them, and fry a pale brown.

Turbot Gratin.—Boil one pound of potatoes, mash them with two ounces of butter, add the yolks of three eggs, salt, a little nutmeg, and two tablespoonfuls of grated Parmesan cheese; butter a border mould, put the potatoes in it, and stand in a saucepan of boiling water to poach. Cut some cooked turbot in small pieces, warm it in some good béchamel sauce, season with salt and nutmeg; turn the potato border out of the mould on to a dish; fill the centre with the fish, put grated Parmesan cheese and a little butter over the top, brown with a salamander or before a quick fire, and serve.

SWEET SYMPATHY.

Fillets of Turbot à la Béarnaise.—Take some fillets of turbot, lay them in oil with a chopped onion, salt, and parsley; turn them now and then; when wanted, drain them, dip in egg and breadcrumbs, then moisten on both sides with oil, and broil for about twenty minutes, turning them as they cook; put on a dish with cut lemon, serve sauce béarnaise in a tureen at the same time.

Turbot au Riz.—Take a piece of turbot, remove the skin and bones, and put on to boil in a quart of water. Cut the fish in small pieces, chop two onions, put them in a stewpan with a small lump of butter, cook them five minutes without letting them brown, then put in the fish, season, and leave it two minutes; then strain the water from the skin and bones, add it to the fish, let it boil, then throw in a small cupful of rice, and boil until the liquid is absorbed. Fry two or three ounces of butter until brown, pour over the rice, put the cover on the stewpan, and let it stand on the side of the stove a few minutes; then chop, and add two hard boiled eggs and a little piece of butter into which some cayenne has been worked. Serve immediately.

Brill à la Hollandaise.—Boil some water with salt and parsley in it, draw it to the side of the fire, and let it stand a few minutes; rub the fish over with a cut lemon, put it on the strainer and in the hot water, and place over the fire; as soon as the water bubbles, pull the fish kettle a little back, so that the fish will cook gently; when done, drain, and serve on a serviette with parsley round, and a tureen of sauce hollandaise.

Brill Grilled, Sauce à l'Huile.—Wipe the fish quite dry, lay it in oil with pepper and salt until it is wanted, then grill it, the dark side first, taking care that it neither sticks or burns, brush it over with oil and turn it; take care that the white side is broiled a nice colour; serve it garnished with lemon, and send sauce à l'huile to table with it.

Barbue (Brill) à la Normande.—Butter a dish, spread over it some finely-chopped onions and mushroom trimmings, add a glass of white wine (or a little white stock and lemon juice), put the brill on the dish, the white side uppermost, salt it and brush it over with butter, cover with a buttered paper, and then cook in the oven, basting from time to time. When done remove the paper and put the fish on a fresh dish; have ready cooked some button mushrooms, oysters, and mussels; garnish the fish with these and keep it hot while you make a little rather thick sauce by adding butter and flour to the liquor in which they have been cooked; strain the liquor from the fish to it, boil for some minutes, then add the yolks of three eggs, and pour the sauce over the fish and the garnish; hold a hot shovel over for a few minutes, ornament with some crayfish, and send to table.

Fried Soles.—Remove the dark skin, beginning at the tail; wash and dry the soles, and lay them in milk until they are wanted, then drain and flour them; have ready in a pan sufficient boiling fat to cover them, put them in and fry until they are firm; drain, put a little salt over them, and serve with cut lemon.

Broiled Soles.—Remove the dark skin, wash and dry the soles, dip them in beaten up egg, breadcrumb them, then dip in oiled butter; broil over a moderate fire, turning them and brushing them over with oiled butter. Serve with cut lemon or with sauce.

Sole au Gratin.—Butter a dish well, put on it some chopped mushrooms and parsley, and a little pepper. Remove the dark skin from a sole, dry it and place it on the dish; pour a few spoonfuls of good gravy over it, and a glass of light white wine or a little lemon juice, then sprinkle with more chopped mushrooms, parsley, pepper and salt; sift some pale raspings over, and then a spoonful of oiled butter; bake about eighteen minutes, and serve in the dish in which it is cooked.

Fillets de Soles à la Horly.—Take the dark skin off the soles, cut to the bone back and front, then remove the flesh in four pieces, soak for an hour in lemon juice with pepper and salt, then flour and fry. Serve with tomato sauce, or stew the bones of the fish in a little stock with a small quantity of white wine or lemon juice; reduce sufficiently for it to have a nice flavour; strain and serve as a sauce round the fillets.

Soles au Four.—Take two soles without the dark skins, slip a knife along the bone at the back under the flesh, and push in a piece of butter, into which pepper, salt, and chopped parsley have been worked; egg and breadcrumb the soles, then dip them in oiled butter or oil, place them side by side in a buttered dish, bake them from fifteen to twenty minutes, basting them with the butter in the dish.

Soles au Plat.—Melt some butter on a dish, season it with salt, pepper, chopped shallots and parsley, and nutmeg; place the soles (without the dark skin) on the dish, sprinkle with a few sweet herbs, some chopped parsley and fine raspings, add a little white wine or a squeeze of lemon, pour some butter over, and bake.

Plaice, Dabs, and Flounders are cooked in the same way as soles.

Smelts, to Fry.—Dry the smelts and lay them in milk until they are to be cooked, then thread them on to skewers, running the skewer through the heads, four or six on each skewer, according to the size; flour them well, and fry a few at a time in a pan of boiling fat; when a nice gold colour drain, salt, and serve with fried parsley.

Whiting are prepared and fried like smelts.

Whiting or Smelts au Gratin are cooked the same way as soles.

Whiting Broiled.—Sprinkle salt over the whiting, dip them in oil, and broil over a quick fire. Serve with maître d'hôtel butter on them.

Whiting aux Fines Herbes.—Put the fish in a deep dish with a lump of butter, salt, pepper, nutmeg, chopped parsley, and sweet herbs, a little white wine or lemon juice; cover the dish and bake. When half done turn the fish; when done enough place them on a hot dish; thicken the liquor from them with butter and flour, add a squeeze of lemon, pour over the fish, and serve.

Fillets of Whittings.—Bone two or three whittings, sprinkle the fillets with pepper, salt, and finely chopped onions, mushrooms and parsley; roll each piece of fish up, and fasten with a little wooden skewer; egg and breadcrumb and fry; take out the skewers and serve. Small haddocks are dressed in the same way as whittings.

Skate, to Boil.—Put the skate in hot water with one or two slices of onion, some parsley, vinegar, and salt; when done draw from the fire, but leave the fish in the water five minutes, then take it out and remove the skin with a knife; drain the fish, serve with white caper sauce, sauce hollandaise, or beurre noir and fried parsley over it.

Fried Skate.—Take some pieces of skate, soak them in vinegar mixed with parsley and salt; before frying dip them in a paste made with one tablespoonful of oil, one egg, and sufficient flour to give it the consistency of batter. Fry a pale brown and serve with sauce poivrade and fried parsley.

Raie (Skate) Sainte Menehould.—Put some milk into a stewpan with salt, pepper, parsley root and onion, thyme, a bay-leaf, very small piece of garlic, and a little butter and flour; when it boils put in some pieces of skate; as soon as done take them out, dip them in oil and then in breadcrumbs, and broil. Serve them with mustard sauce made thus: Strain the liquor you have just boiled the pieces of skate in and add some mustard to it; boil it up and serve.

Raie au Fromage (skate with cheese).—Take some skate that has been boiled with onion, vinegar, parsley, and salt, remove the bones from it and break it into pieces; put a layer of it on a buttered dish, cover it with bechamel sauce, sift grated Parmesan cheese over it, then another layer of fish with sauce and Parmesan over it; put in the oven and bake about a quarter of an hour.

Cod is put in hot water with plenty of salt in it. It is allowed to come to a boil and then cooked at the side of the stove without boiling again. It is served with a garnish of parsley and potatoes, and hot maître d'hôtel, caper, mussel, hollandaise, or some other sauce is served with it.

Slices of Cod au Beurre Fondu.—Take two or three slices of cod, sprinkle them with salt, and leave them for an hour, then put them into salted boiling water; let them boil, then draw to the side of the stove, and leave them twenty minutes with the lid on the stewpan; then drain them and serve on a napkin with parsley; send a tureen of oiled butter to table with them or shrimp or oyster sauce. The French almost always serve potatoes with boiled fish.

Slices of Cod with Egg Sauce.—Cook two slices of cod as above. Heat in a stewpan three ounces of butter until it begins to brown, then mix three finely-chopped, hard-boiled eggs with the butter, season with pepper and salt, add some chopped parsley and another ounce of butter, into which one tablespoonful of mustard has been mixed; stir and make all hot, but do not let it boil; put the slices of cod on a dish and the egg sauce over.

Cod au Fromage.—Like skate.

Cod au Blanc.—Make a sauce by cooking one ounce of butter and one ounce of flour together, and adding some milk or cream, salt, pepper, and chopped parsley; take a tail of cod, fillet it, put the fillet in the sauce, and simmer about fifteen minutes; serve very hot, with the sauce over the fish.

Cod au Vert Pré.—Boil some slices of cod in a little milk with a small lump of butter; when done place the fish on a dish and cover it with finely-chopped parsley; squeeze the juice of a lemon over it, and serve at once without sauce.

Cod au Gratin.—Take some remains of cooked cod, remove the skin and bones, and break the fish into flakes; put it in a stewpan with some white sauce, salt, chopped mushrooms and nutmeg; make hot, then add an equal quantity of hot mashed potatoes, a lump of butter, and the yolks of two or three eggs; put in a buttered dish, cover with pale raspings, put a little butter over, and brown before the fire.

Fried Cod.—Season some slices of cod with pepper, oil, and lemon juice; leave them for an hour, then egg and crumb them, and fry in oil. Serve with cut lemon and tomato sauce, or covered with onions that have been finely chopped and cooked in oil or butter.

Salt Cod (soaked twenty-four hours and the water changed once or twice) is dressed the same way as fresh, except that the salt is not added in cooking.

Shad is rather an insipid fish, and is oftenest served broiled. Dry the fish, make cuts in each side of it, rub with a marinade of oil, salt, pepper, nutmeg, chopped onion, and chopped parsley; let it remain an hour, then broil it; brush it over with oil before turning it. Serve with caper or maître d'hôtel sauce, or with a purée of sorrel, or eat cold with sauce à l'huile. Sometimes shad is cooked au bleu, and served with sauce verte in a tureen.

Broiled Mackerel.—Rub the fish over with oil, pepper, and salt, wrap it in oiled or buttered paper, and broil; when cooked, remove the paper, serve the fish with maître d'hôtel butter inside, and the juice of a lemon squeezed over the outside, or with persillade and lemon juice, or beurre noir over.

Fried Mackerel.—Rub fillets of mackerel with salt, pepper, and lemon juice; let them remain an hour, then wipe, and dip them in oil, flour them, and fry; put a little salt on the fillets, and serve with fried parsley.

Maquereaux aux Petits Oignons (mackerel with little onions).—Take three dozen little onions, put them in a stewpan with some butter and a little white sugar, put over a quick fire, and shake them until they are a good brown; add a little broth, and cook them until they are nearly done, and the gravy is good. Take the heads and the ends of the tails off three small mackerel, then put the mackerel in a stewpan with a lump of butter, and brown them slightly; add a glass of white wine or a little lemon juice, cook a few minutes, put in a small lump of butter with flour worked into it, stir the sauce, add the onions and gravy, and finish cooking the fish over a slow fire.

Red Mullet.—Put the mullets in a marinade of oil, salt, chopped onion, and parsley; let them remain an hour, then take them out and broil them; they will require about fifteen minutes. When done take out the livers, pound them in a mortar with oil, lemon juice, and chopped parsley, put on the mullets, and serve.

Red Mullet en Papillotes.—Dip the mullets in oil, sprinkle with salt and breadcrumbs with a little chopped fennel, cut some heart-shaped pieces of paper, oil them, put the fish in, fold the edges neatly together, broil over a slow fire, or bake the fish for about 20 minutes; serve in the papers.

Rougets (red mullets) au Plat.—Well oil a dish, and cover it with very finely-chopped onions; dip the fish in oil, place them close together on the dish, and cover them with fine breadcrumbs and chopped parsley, sprinkle a little salt over them, and bake for about a quarter of an hour, squeeze some lemon juice over them, and serve.

Grey Mullet.—Put the mullet in a fish kettle, cover it with cold water, add salt, a tablespoonful of vinegar, chopped onion, carrot, and parsley root, let it boil, then draw it to the side of the stove, and let it cook gently (time according to size), drain it, and serve surrounded with small potatoes (boiled) and sprigs of parsley. Send white caper sauce to table with it.

Fresh Herrings.—Make two or three cuts on each side, sprinkle with salt, and broil them about seven minutes over a quick fire, serve with maître d'hôtel butter, or white sauce, thickened with mustard and flour.

Fried Herrings.—Soak fresh herrings in milk until they are wanted, salt and flour them, then fry in a pan full of boiling fat; serve with cut lemon only.

Stewed Herrings.—Cut the heads and tails off three herrings, put the fish in a stewpan with some finely-chopped onion and parsley, a little shalot, salt, black pepper, and a small piece of butter; turn them, leave a few minutes, then add a tablespoonful of vinegar, and the same of water, cook gently; serve garnished with fried bread.

Harengs en Papillotes.—Chop together onions, mushrooms, and parsley, add pepper and salt; dip the herrings in oil, then roll them in the chopped onions, etc. Wrap them in buttered papers, put them on a dish, and bake them in a moderate oven for about twenty-five minutes, and then serve.

Moules (mussels) à la Poulette.—Put the mussels in a stewpan with pepper, nutmeg, and chopped parsley, add some butter and flour mixed together, and moisten with half white stock and half liquor from the mussels. Before serving add the yolk of an egg and some lemon juice.

Oysters are also dressed in this way.

Mussels Fried.—Thread the mussels on to wooden skewers, but not quite close together, dip them in a very thick white sauce, to which has been added the yolk of an egg, let them cool, then dip them in breadcrumbs, then in beaten-up egg, and again in breadcrumbs, put them in boiling fat, fry a nice colour, remove the skewers, and serve.

Anguilles (eels) à la Poulette.—Take an eel that has been skinned and cut in pieces, put it in salt and water for an hour, then drain well; put two ounces of butter in a stewpan over the fire, put in the eel, and leave it a few minutes, but do not let it brown. Add one tablespoonful of flour; when the flour is cooked stir in sufficient water and a glass of light white wine, add salt, a small bunch of sweet herbs and some mushroom trimmings; stir till it boils; skim the sauce. Let it cook slowly about half an hour, add the yolk of an egg to thicken the sauce, put the eel on a dish, strain the sauce, finish with a little lemon juice or a few drops of vinegar, and pour over the eel.

Eels aux Croutons.—Mix together chopped parsley, shalot, and onion; add pepper and salt; skin and cut a large eel in pieces, dip each piece in oiled butter or in oil, then cover them well with the chopped mixture. Cut rounds of bread the same size as the pieces of eel, one for each piece, dip them in hot butter or oil, put a piece of eel on each piece of bread, wrap up in buttered papers, and broil or bake; when done remove the papers, and serve the eels on the crusts with a thick piquant sauce.

Trout, Sauce Hollandaise.—Put the trout in the fish-kettle, pour a little hot vinegar over it, then cover with hot water with salt in it; let it boil, then draw to the side of the fire, and keep it there twenty-five minutes, when the fish should be done; drain it and dish it up on a serviette. Send sauce hollandaise to table with it.

Truite (trout) à la Gênoise.—Put some chopped onion and shalot, some parsley, thyme, two cloves, a bay-leaf, mushroom trimmings, pepper, salt, and a small piece of butter in a stewpan over the fire for a few minutes; then add some water and a little red or white wine; put in the trout. When the fish are done take them out and serve them on a layer of parsley; add a little flour and butter to the sauce, stir it and boil it as fast as possible to reduce it a little and make it stronger; then strain and serve. Trout cooked in this way are also served with caper or anchovy sauce, or are eaten cold with sauce à l'huile.

Bream are sometimes broiled and served with caper sauce, or upon a purée of sorrel.

Bream boiled, Shalot Sauce.—Lay the bream in salt for half an hour, wash it and put it in the fish kettle with cold water, a little vinegar and salt; let it boil, then draw back so that it simmers gently about half an hour, time depending on size of fish; serve with shalot sauce.

Pike (jack) au Persil.—Cut the fish in pieces, and put it in a stewpan with parsley roots, salt, pepper, chopped parsley, half a pint of fish broth or water, and a little white wine or lemon juice, cover close and cook. When the fish is done take it out, boil the liquor quickly for a few minutes, take out the parsley roots, pour the sauce over the fish, and serve.

Pike, Sauce Raifort.—Put the pike in court bouillon; let it boil, then simmer gently until done; serve on a serviette with small boiled potatoes and parsley round, and send to table with a tureen of horseradish sauce.

Carpe à la Tartare.—Dry the carp and put in the body a piece of butter mixed with chopped shalots, parsley, salt, and pepper; sew up the fish, rub it over with a clove of garlic and some oil, oil two pieces of paper and put the carp in the two papers; broil over a clear fire or bake; when done remove the papers and serve the fish dry. Serve with remoulade sauce in a sauce boat. Remoulade can be served with almost any broiled fish.

Perch are cooked in court bouillon and served with caper sauce, or some of the broth in which they have been cooked is strained, reduced by boiling, a little lemon juice added to it, and then it is poured over the fish.

Tench are broiled and served with caper or anchovy sauce; they are also served au gratin.

A MODERN MONTAGUE.

By EGLANTON THORNE, Author of "My Brother's Friend," "Ida Nicolari," "The Two Crowns," etc., etc.

CHAPTER II.

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

HILST Mr. Denning was talking to his daughter, the young men he was so anxious to shun were lounging in the smoking-room of the hotel and discussing him.

"What could have made the old fellow's manner stiffen so strangely when he looked at my card?" asked Stuart Rowcroft, rather indignantly. "There can be nothing in my name to offend him. I took it for granted he would know something of the Rowcrofts of Wivescombe Hall. They are well-known people in Hampshire."

And the young surgeon unconsciously drew himself up with the air of one who does not think meanly of the name he bears.

"Perhaps he does know them," suggested Martin Smith; "and his relations with them are not of the friendliest. Your cousin may be a neighbour whom he does not love."

"Well, that is not unlikely," replied the other. "To tell the truth, I am afraid the old Squire is rather given to quarrelling with his neighbours. He has lately been at law with someone living close to him, and has won the day, I am told; a result which I fear will tend to encourage his love for litigation. It is a pity he is so pugnacious, for he is really as good-hearted an old chap as you could wish to know."

"Hot tempers and warm hearts not seldom go together," remarked Martin, sententiously.

"What was the name of the other party to the lawsuit? It did not happen to be Denning, I suppose?"

"I cannot remember," said Rowcroft; "it may have been. I had a fancy that the name was familiar to me somehow. I tried to learn from what part of Hampshire they come, but could not get an answer to my question."

"Hum," murmured Martin. "I wonder if Miss Denning will have stiffened by to-morrow morning, and contrive to keep us at a distance, as her father evidently now desires to do."

"He need not be afraid that I shall intrude myself upon him," said Stuart Rowcroft, proudly; "but it is difficult to imagine Miss Denning becoming stiff."

"You think her such a free and easy young person?" said Martin, interrogatively, assuming a gravity which the merry twinkle in his eyes belied.

"Free and easy!" exclaimed his friend, with a touch of indignation in his tone; "those words are not in the least applicable to Miss Denning. There is no lack of dignity in her bearing, although she is so simple, so transparent. It is refreshing to meet for once with a girl who does not put on airs and graces as soon as a gentleman speaks to her, but lets you make acquaintance with her real self."

"Don't be too sure that you have made acquaintance with Miss Denning's real self," said Martin, looking curiously at his companion. "My pet philosopher, O. W. Holmes, says somewhere that 'there is nothing in all this world that can lie and cheat like the face and the tongue of a young girl.'"

Whatever reply Stuart Rowcroft might have made to this assertion was checked by the entrance into the room of several gentlemen. He threw away the stump of his cigar, rose, stretched himself, and decided to go to bed.

The young men rose later than the Dennings the next morning, for as they crossed the hall on their way to breakfast, Olive stood at the water-entrance, drawing on her gloves and awaiting her father's appearance to go forth in their gondola. Perhaps she was glad he was not by her side as she returned the gentlemen's courteous salutations. Her bow and smile were certainly not stiff, yet her manner did not encourage them to linger. A couple of minutes later, sitting at their breakfast, they saw the gondola glide past the window, and followed with their eyes its course down the Canal, easily distinguishing it for some distance by the gleam of rose-colour at its stern. They caught other glimpses of the rose-coloured gown during the day; now on the steps of Santa Maria della Salute, now flitting amidst the busy buyers and sellers on the Rialto, and now on the Piazza San Marco, with the pigeons flocking about her and taking corn from her hand. On this last occasion they were near enough for recognition, but Mr. Denning's manner forbade them to approach him. Each glance Stuart Rowcroft stole at the girl showed her gay and happy, making the most of the pleasure of the hour. How she seemed to enjoy everything! A feeling of discontent stirred within him as he watched her. He was conscious that his own enjoyment was less complete.

"Well, he cannot prevent me from talking to her at dinner," thought the young man, picturing to himself the round table occupied as on the previous evening, and imagining that the evening's history would so far repeat itself.

But when the gong summoned him to the dining-room, lo and behold! all was changed in the arbitrary manner that distinguishes hotel arrangements. An American father and mother, with two precocious children, were established at the round table. Mr. and Miss Denning had places at the upper end of the large table, and the waiter was drawing out chairs about midway on the same side for him and his friend. Martin smiled as he caught the look of disappointment that passed over Rowcroft's face.

Perhaps he was not the only one who felt aggrieved by the change. Certainly Olive Denning, seated between her father and a German stranger, did not find the meal pass very agreeably.

When it was over she would have liked to join the people who were streaming into the reading-room, but she saw the two Englishmen lingering by the door and she hesitated. Was it a foolish fancy of hers that they were waiting to see if she went in?

"I have letters to write, Olive. What are you going to do?" asked her father, peremptorily.

"I must write to mamma, too," she said. "I think I will go to my room and write there."

"You had better; it will be quieter there," he said.

Olive went upstairs with somewhat of the feeling she had had as a little girl when banished to her room for misbehaviour, and Mr. Rowcroft and his friend retired to the smoking-room.

On the following day Mr. Denning and his daughter were rowed to the Lido, where they landed and walked across the island. Olive was delighted to find herself on the shore of the lovely blue Adriatic. The change from the still waters of the lagoon to the buoyant, foam-crested waves breaking on the yellow sands was charming. For a while Olive busied herself in gathering some of the pretty wee shells that were to be found on the shore, then at her father's suggestion they started for a good walk along the sands. Having reached the extremity of the long island, they turned, to find themselves face to face with Mr. Rowcroft and Mr. Smith, who, fresh from a swim in the sea, were also taking a brisk walk.

It was an awkward encounter. No one knew who was the first to halt, but a halt was made, very unfortunately as it seemed to Olive, for she was ashamed of the cold, constrained politeness with which her father received the gentlemen's remarks on the beauty of the place. Involuntarily she did her best to atone for her father's hauteur, and the few words she uttered were spoken with a charming kindness for which one of the gentlemen was most grateful.

"It is detestable that we have to meet that fellow at every turn," burst out Mr. Denning almost before Mr. Rowcroft had passed out of hearing. "I suppose you have no idea how long he intends to remain here?"

"Whom do you mean, father?" Olive thought fit to ask, though she must have known perfectly well.

"That Mr. Rowcroft, of course. Ugh, how I hate to say the name! But I believe you like him, Olive, although he is one of that family."

"Indeed I see nothing to dislike in him," said Olive, candidly; "he seems a perfect gentleman and very pleasant. It is not his fault that he is named Rowcroft."

"There, there, that will do; I have heard enough of the name, and shall hear, no doubt," said her father, irritably; "I want no fresh acquaintance who bears it. I wish the fellow would leave Venice. However, we need not stay much longer ourselves. I think we can see all that remains to be seen to-morrow, and get off on Saturday. What do you say, Olive?"

"Just as you like, father," she replied, though she was conscious of considerable disappointment at the thought of their stay at Venice being thus cut short.

"Very well then, we will go on to Verona, and spend the Sunday there. You are sure to be delighted with Verona, Olive. It must be a most interesting old place."

"I daresay it is," said Olive, absently, as they walked back across the island.

She was feeling rather depressed, an unusual circumstance with Olive. She half wished that they had never met Mr. Rowcroft, since her father was so disturbed by the meeting. And yet she could not wholly regret that he had crossed her path, even though her visit to Venice must be spoiled thereby. He seemed to her so good and true that she fancied she should always be glad to have had even so slight an acquaintance with him. She thought it unreasonable of her father to decree that Mr. Rowcroft must be shunned because his cousin was a disagreeable neighbour. Cousins were not necessarily alike in character, she reflected.

On the following afternoon Olive was sitting alone before Titian's grand picture of the "Assumption of the Virgin." Her father had promised to join her at the Academy within half an hour, but that period had more than expired, yet he had not come. Olive was not impatient as she waited. She felt as if she could never weary of gazing at the noble woman's face which is the central object of the picture, and the lovely cherub faces upturned to it. The painting had a strong fascination for her, and she cared little in comparison for the other pictures in the room.

At the sound of a step behind her Olive turned, expecting to see her father; but it was Mr. Stuart Rowcroft who entered the gallery.

Olive's cheek flushed at seeing him so unexpectedly, and she could not quite conceal her embarrassment as she responded to his greeting. It was impossible to ignore him, as he came and stood beside her in the best position for seeing the painting.

"Is it not lovely?" she asked, timidly. "I have been here for nearly an hour, and yet I feel as if I had not looked at it enough."

"That I can well understand," he replied; "it is a picture of which one could never weary. There is so much in it. Look at that group of the Apostles—what splendid life-like forms, what character and expression in their faces! And then the exquisite colour, so many hues; yet all blend harmoniously. Are you going?" For Olive rose as he was speaking.

"I had better," she said, quietly. "I cannot think what is detaining my father. He said he would be here in half an hour. I must go and look for him."

"Will you allow me to come with you to seek him?" asked Mr. Rowcroft, kindly.

"Oh no, thank you," said Olive, shrinking back and colouring anew; "he would not like that." Then as she realised what an awkward thing she had said, her face grew crimson. "I beg your pardon. I should not have said that," she faltered in confusion.

"Why not, since it is the truth?" he asked, gently. "Do you suppose I have not perceived that for some reason or other my society is unwelcome to your father? I should like to learn how I have been so unfortunate as to displease him."

"Oh, it is not you—I mean you have not displeased him," Olive found it hard to explain. "It is only because you are a Rowcroft."

"A Rowcroft!" he repeated; "what has that to do with it?"

"Oh, you cannot know, of course, but at home Squire Rowcroft and my father are not at all good friends. There was a lawsuit about the right to Love Lane, and it worried father dreadfully, and when it was decided against him it made him ill. We came abroad that he might forget it, and recover from the nervous excitement it caused him."

"Ah, I understand!" exclaimed the young man. "So that makes him detest the sound of my name. Well, I am very sorry. But it is rather hard lines, don't you think, that I should have visited on me the sins of my cousin once removed? I had nothing to do with the lawsuit."

"Of course not," said Olive. "But yet, if you knew all, you would not wonder that my father feels as he does. I cannot help thinking that Squire Rowcroft has behaved very badly."

"I daresay he has," returned the young man, with ready sympathy. "I do not need to be told that my cousin is hot-tempered and obstinate; but yet, if you can believe me, he has a kind heart. 'His bark is worse than his bite,' as they say of dogs."

"I can easily believe it," said Olive, ready in her turn to be persuaded of the goodness of Squire Rowcroft's heart; "but I fear my father will never regard the Squire otherwise than as an enemy."

"And everyone who bears his name must share the enmity, it seems," said Stuart Rowcroft. "Miss Denning, you will not be so unfair? You will not look upon me as your enemy because I have the misfortune to be named Rowcroft?"

"Oh, how could I?" Olive exclaimed. "That would be very wrong."

"I am glad you think so," he said. "Can you concede a little more? Would it be possible for you to regard me as a friend, although my name is Rowcroft?"

Olive's eyes drooped beneath his earnest gaze.

"I should hope so," she said, in some confusion. "I don't see that the name makes any difference."

"Nor I," he responded, with a smile.

"What's in a name? That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet."

Then, as he suddenly recollected from what he was quoting, the colour deepened in his cheek, and he stole a quick shy glance at her, as if anxious to mark the effect of his words. But Olive was passing on with a farewell bow and smile, and the next minute he saw her slight figure pass out of sight beneath the doorway. He wished she had not hurried away so, but he looked forward to seeing her again ere the day ended.

Olive walked through the galleries and down the staircase in rather dreamy fashion.

But on the pavement in front of the Academy she came to herself, and began to consider what she should do next. Her father was not to be seen. When he had landed her at that spot, and asked her to wait for him in the gallery whilst he went across to the Piazza to attend to some business connected with their journey on the morrow, he had promised to rejoin her by four o'clock; now it was more than half-past, and he had not come. What could have happened to detain him?

There was no gondola waiting by the steps. Olive hesitated whether to wait awhile where she was, or to cross the Canal by the bridge, and try to find her way on foot to the hotel. She knew that the distance was short, but she had some fear of losing her way in the turns of the narrow calles. Whilst she lingered, undecided what to do, she saw the gondola which her father had hired coming rapidly across the Canal. Her father was not in it, but the gondolier, as soon as he caught sight of her, saluted her in his graceful Venetian fashion, and made it plain that he was coming to fetch her. Olive felt some wonder, but supposed that her father found himself obliged to spend the afternoon in a different manner from that he had planned, so had sent the gondolier to bring her to the hotel. But when the man began to explain in a mixture of French and Italian, which was very difficult for her to follow, the cause of her father's non-appearance, Olive became alarmed. The signor had met with an accident; he had fallen; he was not able to walk for the pain. The signorina must not agitate herself; it was nothing. The signor said he would soon be better, but it was impossible for him to come to meet the signorina.

Olive inquired anxiously where her father was.

"At the hotel," the gondolier replied. He had conveyed him there after the accident, and had then hastened to fetch the signorina.

Olive sprang into the boat and needlessly urged the man, who was putting forth his best efforts, to take her with all haste to the hotel. There was time for many distressing visions to cross her mind during the brief passage to the other side. The gondolier's attempts to explain how the accident occurred only bewildered her. Was her father very seriously hurt, she wondered? Would this prevent their quitting Venice on the morrow? Olive was ashamed of herself that she was conscious of a momentary sense of satisfaction at the thought of this possible result of her father's accident.

She remembered that she had not told Mr. Rowcroft that they were to leave Venice on the following day. And she had said she would regard him as a friend! Well, friend or enemy, it could make little difference after to-morrow—they were not likely to meet again. And yet it did make a difference, for Olive was undoubtedly the happier at that moment because Stuart Rowcroft had shown a desire to be her friend.

Hurrying into the hotel, Olive found her father resting on a settee in the hall. He looked pale, but he smiled and spoke cheerfully as he saw her anxious face.

"Don't be troubled, child. It is nothing worse than a slight sprain. I slipped on a piece of orange peel, and fell down five steps just as I was about to get into the gondola and come over to you. I never knew such a place as this is for orange peel; they throw it everywhere. It is disgraceful the way in which the streets of Venice are kept."

"Had you not better let a doctor see your foot?" Olive asked.

"Oh, there is no need for a doctor. I shall be all right when I have rested awhile. Besides, I have no opinion of Italian doctors. I will try to get upstairs now you have come."

And by-and-by, with the help of two of the waiters, he managed to hop as far as his room; but the effort cost him considerable suffering, and he felt very faint after it. However, in a short time he revived, gave orders for dinner to be served upstairs for himself and daughter, and spoke of their departure on the following morning.

"You will have to do all the packing, Olive," he said, as she was engaged in bathing the injured foot. "I must keep as quiet as possible."

"Do you think you ought to attempt the journey to-morrow?" she asked.

"Oh, yes, yes; my foot will be better by to-morrow; and it is not a long journey to Verona. I mean to get away from here if I possibly can."

Olive said no more, and when she had done all she could for her father, she began to pack.

CHAPTER X.

COULD you care to see my dogs, Miss Lambert?" asked Richard, and Bessie only hesitated for a moment.

"Very much. That is, if it will not trouble you."

"Not in the least;

they are only just outside in the stable-yard. Leo, our big mastiff, who gained the prize last year, is over at the farm. He is a splendid fellow, but a trifle fierce to strangers. He pulled a man down once, a tramp, who was lurking about the place. Leo had got loose somehow, and he was at his throat in a moment. The poor fellow has the scar now; but I made it up to him, poor wretch."

"I should not care to go near Leo's kennel," returned Bessie, with a shudder.

"Oh, it would be all right if I were with you. I should just put my hand on your arm and say, 'A friend, Leo,' and he would be as gentle as Mac, here. Leo is my faithful servant and guardian at the farm. I always take him out for a walk on Sunday afternoon. Leo knows Sunday as well as I do. Now we must be quick or the gong will sound. There is no need to go through the house; this door leads to the kitchen garden. And we can reach the stables that way," and talking in this easy, friendly fashion, Richard quickly conducted Bessie down the trim gravel walks, under the apple and plum trees, and then unlocking a green door in the wall, Bessie found herself in the stable-yard, where the groom was rubbing down a fine brown mare. The mare neighed as soon as she heard her master's voice, and Richard went up to her, and patted her glossy sides.

"That is Brown Bess," he observed. "She is a skittish young thing, and plays her pranks with everyone but me; but you and I understand each other, eh, old lady." And the mare rubbed her nose against him in a confiding manner. Bessie looked on with an air of interest.

"Do you ride?" asked Richard, presently.

Bessie shook her head.

"I have never been on horseback in my life; but I can imagine what a pleasure riding must be."

"What a pity," he returned, briefly. "There is nothing like it." And so saying he unlatched a gate and ushered his guest into a small paved yard, and then, opening a door, he uttered a prolonged whistle, and in a moment there was a chorus of delighted barks and yelps, and a number of dogs, small and large, rushed out upon him.

"Hi, there, Gelert! down, Juno; down, down, good dogs all." And Richard threatened them with his dog-whip.

"Is this Gelert?" asked Bessie, pointing to a fine black retriever.

"Yes; and that is Brand," patting the head of a handsome pointer. "That brown setter is Juno, she is the mother of those three puppies—fine little fellows, aren't they? Look at this curly-haired one; two of them are promised to friends; they are a capital breed. Do you care for terriers, Miss Lambert? because Spot is considered a perfect beauty; look at his coat, it is like satin!"

"And that knowing little fellow, what is his name?" And Bessie pointed to a very small black and tan terrier, who sat up and begged at once.

"Oh, that is Tim; he ought by rights to be a house dog, but he has taken a fancy to Spot, and insists on sharing his straw bed at night; they both have the run of the house by day—at least, as far as the hall and smoking-room are concerned. My mother hates dogs, and will not tolerate one in the drawing-room."

"Surely that is not one of your dogs," exclaimed Bessie, looking with some disfavour on an ugly white mongrel, with a black patch over one eye; her attention was attracted by the creature's ugliness. Evidently he knew he was no beauty, for, after uttering a short yelp or two in the attempt to join in the chorus of sonorous barks, he had crept humbly behind Richard, and sat on his haunches, looking up at him with a pathetically meek expression.

"Oh, you mean Bill Sykes; yes, he is a pensioner of mine. Come along, Bill, and say good morning to your master."

It was impossible to describe the change that came over the dog as Richard spoke to him in this kindly fashion; his whole body quivered with pleasure as he sprang up and licked Richard's hands.

"What do you think, Miss Lambert? I found Bill one day tearing through Melton with a tin kettle tied to his tail, hunted by a pack of rascally school-boys; one of the little wretches had thrown a stone at him, and poor Bill was bleeding. I managed to stop him, somehow, and to free the poor beast from his implement of torture, and left him licking his wound by the roadside, while I caught two of the boys and thrashed them soundly. I reserved thrashing the others until a convenient season, but they all caught it. I read them a pretty lesson on cruelty to animals. Bill followed me home, and I have never parted with him since. The other dogs disdained his company at first, but now they tolerate him, and, on the whole, I think he leads a pleasant life. He knows he is of humble extraction, and so he keeps in the background, but he is a clever dog; he can walk across the yard on his hind legs—the gardener's boy taught him the trick. Now then, Bill, walk like a gentleman." And Bill obediently rose on his hind legs and stalked across the yard with an air of dignity, followed by a fat rollicking puppy, barking with all his might.

Bill had just received his meed of praise when the gong sounded, and they had to hurry in to breakfast. They found Edna in a bewitching white morning dress.

"I hope I am not late," observed Bessie, apologetically. "Mr. Sefton took me to see the dogs. I did so enjoy looking at them; they are such beautiful creatures."

"Yes, especially Bill Sykes," returned Edna, sarcastically. "Well, there is no accounting for tastes," with a critical look at Bessie's neat blue cotton. "I never venture in the yard myself, unless I have an old ulster on. I could not put on my dress again if all those scratchy paws had been over it. Richard does not train them properly; they all spring up and nearly knock me down in their clumsy gambols."

"They are like their master, eh, Edna?" returned Richard, good-humouredly. "Mother, shall I give you some ham? What time do you mean to bring Miss Lambert to the lower meadow, Edna? We shall be carrying this evening."

"Oh, you need not expect us at all," returned Edna, to Bessie's disappointment. "I quite forgot the Athertons are coming this afternoon, to practise for to-morrow."

"I thought Miss Lambert wanted to see us make hay," observed Richard, looking at Bessie as he spoke; but she replied hastily—

"Not if your sister has other plans, Mr. Sefton, thank you all the same; I would rather do as she wishes."

"Yes, and you are fond of lawn-tennis, are you not? We have a garden party to-morrow, and you ought to practise, you see. I want you to know the Athertons; they are such nice girls, Florence especially; plenty of go in them, and no nonsense."

"Yes, Florence is a sweet girl," assented her mother. "Mrs. Atherton is a sad invalid, and they are such devoted daughters. Edna, it is your day for writing to Neville, is it not? I want to send a message to Mrs. Sinclair; don't you think it would be a pretty attention if you were to write to her as well? She seems very poorly again."

"I am not inclined to pay pretty attentions to anyone this morning," returned Edna, with a little laugh. "Bessie, can you amuse yourself while I do my duty to my fiancé? There are plenty of books in the morning-room, and a deliciously shady seat under that big tree."

"Oh, that will be delightful," replied Bessie, to whom a book was a powerful attraction. She was some time making her selection from the well-filled book-case, but at last fixed on some poems by Jean Ingelow, and "The Village on the Cliff," by Miss Thackeray. Bessie had read few novels in her life; Dr. Lambert disliked circulating libraries for young people, and the only novels in the house were Sir Walter Scott's and Miss Austen's, while the girls' private book-shelves boasted most of Miss Yonge's, and two or three of Miss Muloch's works. Bessie had read "Elizabeth" by Miss Thackeray, at her Aunt Charlotte's house, and the charming style, the pure diction, the picturesque descriptions, and the beauty and pathos of the story made her long to read another by the same author. As Bessie retraced her steps through the hall, Mac lifted himself up slowly, and followed her out, and in another moment Spot and Tim flew through a side door and joined her.

Bessie never passed a pleasanter morning; her tale enthralled her, but she laid down her book occasionally to notice her dumb companions. A white Persian kitten had joined the group; she was evidently accustomed to the dogs, for she let Tim roll her over in his rough play, and only boxed his ears in return, now and then. When he got too excited, she scrambled up a may tree, and sat licking herself in placid triumph, while the terriers barked below. Bessie was almost sorry when the quiet was invaded by Edna. Edna, who never opened a book, by her own confession, unless it were an exciting novel, looked a little disdainfully at the book Bessie had chosen.

"Oh, that old thing," she said, contemptuously; "that is not much of a story; it is about a Breton peasant, is it not? Reine, I think she was called; oh, it was amusing enough, but I prefer something more thrilling."

"I think it lovely," returned Bessie. "It is all so sweet and sunny, one can smell the flowers in that studio, and the two Catherines, one so happy and charming, and the other so pathetic. All the people are so nice and good, they seem alive somehow; in other books there are wicked people, and that troubles me."

"You would not like the sort of books I read," returned Edna, shrugging her shoulders; "there was a murder in the last; I could hardly sleep after it—someone thrown out of a train; oh, it was deliciously horrible. I have not sent it back to Mudie; you can read it if you like."

"No thank you," returned Bessie, quietly; "it would not suit me at all. Father is very particular about what we read, and mother too; he will not let us touch what he calls 'the sensational literature of the day'—oh, you may laugh," as Edna looked amused; "but I think father is right. He says it makes him quite unhappy to see books of this description in the hands of mere children; he is a doctor, you know, and he declares that a great deal of harm is done by over-stimulating the imagination by highly wrought fiction. 'A meal of horrors can nourish no one,' he would say."

Edna chose to dispute this point, and a long and lively argument ensued between the girls until the luncheon bell silenced them.

Richard did not appear at this meal; he was taking his bread and cheese under the hedge with the haymakers, Edna explained, or in other words he had desired his luncheon to be sent to him.

"He does not favour us much with his company, as you will soon see for yourself, Miss Lambert," observed Mrs. Sefton; "my stepson is not a society man."

"So much the better," was on Bessie's lips, but she prudently refrained from speaking the words. She was beginning to wonder, however, if Mrs. Sefton or Edna could mention his name without adding something disparaging; Edna especially was for ever indulging in some light sarcasm at her brother's expense.

They sat in the cool drawing-room a little while after luncheon, until the Athertons arrived with their rackets, and then they all went down to the tennis lawn.

The Athertons were nice looking girls, and Bessie was rather taken with them, but she was somewhat surprised when they opened their lips. She was walking across the grass with Florence, the tallest and prettiest of the sisters, and, indeed, she was rather a sweet-looking girl.

"Is it not a lovely day?" observed Bessie.

"Awfully jolly," replied Miss Florence, in a sharp, clipping voice; and the next minute Bessie heard her call one of her sisters a duffer for missing the ball.

"What would mother say?" thought Bessie. She was not much used to the typical girl of the period; after all, she was an old-fashioned little person.

The Athertons were really nice girls, although they talked slang like their brothers, and conformed to all the foolish fashions of the day, disguising their honest, womanly hearts under blunt, flippant manners.

"What a pity," said Bessie to herself, when she came to know them better. They were good-natured, clever girls, very fond of each other, and devoted to their mother and brothers. "Reggie's examination—exam. Florence called it—for Sandhurst; Harold's new coach, and Bertie's score at cricket," were the theme of their conversation. "I am afraid Harold won't pass," observed Sabine, sadly. "His last coach was such a muff; but the man he has got now seems a good old sort. Harold can get on with him comfortably."

"Well, what do you think of the girls?" asked Edna, when she and Bessie were left alone at the close of the afternoon.

"I think they are very nice, Florence especially; but it is such a pity that they talk slang; it seems to spoil them, somehow."

"I agree with you that it is bad style; but you see they have learnt it from their brothers."

Bad style, that was all! Bessie's gentle-looking mouth closed firmly with the expression it always wore when politeness forbade her to air her true opinions, but in her own heart she was saying—

"Bad style. That is how worldly-minded people talk. That is how they palliate these sins against good taste and propriety. I like these girls; they are genuine, somehow; but I suppose our bringing up has made us old-fashioned, for I seemed to shrink inwardly every time they opened their lips. Surely it must be wrong to lose all feminine refinement in one's language! There were no young men here, happily, to hear them; but if there had been, they would have expressed themselves in the same manner; that is what I cannot understand, how girls can lay aside their dignity and borrow masculine fashions. What a little lady Christine would have seemed beside them. Chrissy has such pretty manners."

The dinner hour passed more pleasantly than on the previous evening. Richard talked more, and seemed tolerably at his ease. He followed them into the drawing-room afterwards, and asked his sister to sing, but, to Bessie's vexation, Edna declined under the pretext of fatigue, and could not be induced to open the piano. Bessie felt provoked by her wilfulness, and she was so sorry to see the cloud on Richard's face, for he was passionately fond of music, as he had informed Bessie at dinner-time, that she ventured to remonstrate with Edna.

"Do sing a little, just to please your brother; he looks so disappointed, and you know you are not a bit tired. But Edna shook her head, and her pretty face looked a little hard.

"I do not wish to please him; it is just because he has asked me that I will not sing a note this evening. I intend to punish Richard for his rudeness to me. I begged him to stay home for our garden party to-morrow; but, no, he will not give up his stupid cricket; he says he is captain, and must be with his boys; but that is all nonsense; he does it to spite me."

"Oh, very well," returned Bessie, good-humouredly, for she would not quarrel with Edna for her perversity.

"If you mean to be so obdurate, I will sing myself."

And Bessie actually walked across the room and addressed Richard, who was moodily turning over his sister's music.

"Edna does not feel inclined to sing to-night, but, if you can put up with my deficiencies, I will try what I can do. My music is rather old-fashioned, but I know one or two pretty ballads, if you care to hear them."

"Thanks, I should like it very much," was all Richard said, as he opened the piano; but his face cleared like magic. It was not the song he wanted, but that someone should care to please him. All his life long this had been his longing; and the cold indifference with which his expressed wishes had always been met by his mother and Edna had chilled his affectionate nature. Bessie had a pretty voice, though it showed want of training, but she could sing a simple ballad with much sweetness and feeling, and Richard, who had a fine ear for music, avowed himself much pleased.

"You ought to have some good lessons," he said, frankly. "Your voice has great capabilities, but it has not been properly trained. I hope you do not think my criticism rude."

"No, indeed; I am too much aware of my own faults; I have only had a few lessons. Miss James was not much of a teacher, but I cannot help singing, somehow. Now, have I tired you, or do you want another song?"

"I want more than one," returned Richard, growing bold. Bessie's readiness to please, her good-humoured reception of his criticism, charmed him. She was so amiable, so willing to be friendly; she was so different from the other girls who came to the Grange. Richard had no patience with them, their airs and graces, their evident desire for masculine admiration, disgusted and repelled him. They seemed always seeking for him to pay them little compliments and attentions, and in his heart he despised them.

"Thank you, my dear," observed Mrs. Sefton, graciously, when Bessie had finished. "She sings very nicely, does she not, Edna?"

"Charmingly," replied Edna, but her smile was hardly as pleased as usual, and she bade Bessie a somewhat cold good night when they parted an hour later.

VARIETIES.

OF AN ILLUSTRIOUS HOUSE.—Pope Sixtus V., on his elevation from the condition of a swineherd to the tiara, used to say, in contempt of the squibs that were made upon his birth, that he was "domus natus illustri," born of an illustrious house, because the sunbeams passing through the broken walls and ragged roof lighted up every corner of his father's hut.

LOOKING ROUND.—The more wit one has the more originality one finds among men. The common run of people see little difference between one man and another.

SELF-EXAMINATION.—Nothing will make us so charitable and tender with regard to the faults of others as thoroughly knowing our own.

AN ANTIDOTE TO ENVY.—"When I walk about," says Bishop Berkeley, "I use the following natural maxim, viz., that he is the true possessor of a thing who enjoys it; and not he that owns it without the enjoyment of it. In this way I have no difficulty in fancying myself one of the richest men in Great Britain."

A SIGN OF MEDIOCRITY.—It is a great sign of mediocrity to be always reserved in praise.

WASTED TIME.—A Hungarian who had been fifteen years making a coat of mail entirely of wood, wherein not a single link was wanting, carried it to Hunniadee, the warlike king of Hungary. The monarch, instead of praising his ingenuity, as he had expected, sentenced him to be confined in prison for fifteen years for wasting so much time and ability in so useless an employment.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

BASS NOTES.—We do not know of any advertised Home for Governesses at Lausanne, but there may be one for native Swiss governesses, of which no notice is sent to English papers. We recommend you to apply to some local authority for the information you require, as, for example, to the English chaplain or the Swiss pasteur of the Evangelical Free Church.

A. H. P.—We thank you for your obliging letter and the historical information supplied with reference to the inscription in front of the old Tabard Inn, put up by Sir Jeffrey Chaucer in 1388—temp. Richard II. You are quite right—Chaucer was born A.D. 1328, and died A.D. 1400.

A. B.—You might apply to M. S. S. Dipnal, Esq., Christ's Hospital, Newgate Street, E.C., for particulars of a pension granted to blind persons upwards of sixty-one years of age, whose income is under £20 per annum. Also apply to Miss Danvers, hon. secretary of the Blind Female Annuity Society, 3, Abbey Road, N.W.; the secretary lives at 251, Fairfax Road, South Hampstead, N.W. Also to T. Clarke, Esq., hon. secretary of the Christian Blind Relief Society, 59, Burdett Road, E. All these give relief in money. But there is also the Phoenix Home for Blind Women, 10, Alma Square, Hill Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.; secretary, Miss Gill.

BERTHA.—You should apply direct to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission, Westminster, S.W. A notice of the coming examinations may be seen in the London papers six weeks in advance, and continues to appear on every successive Thursday until the time for receiving applications has expired. The subjects for examination for a telegraph clerkship are—writing from dictation, simple arithmetic, and writing with a style or pencil. The salary rises from £1 10s. a week in this department. Clerkships in the Post Office are better than those in the above-named department. You would do well to gain any further information respecting the best books for preparation from a small "Guide to Female Employment in Government Offices" (Cassell and Co.). For a telegraph clerkship the applicant's age should be between fourteen and eighteen years.

WOULD-BE NURSE (Paris).—Certainly you are eligible as a probationer nurse in one of our hospitals. The council of the Nightingale Fund have a Training School for Nurses. Pupils are trained for one year as Nightingale probationers, receiving board, lodging, uniform, and £12. Afterwards they are required to take situations as hospital nurses during three years, usually commencing with a salary of £20. Ladies who wish to qualify for superior appointments may be trained, upon payment, under two scales, viz., £30 and £52. They are expected to take a situation for two years (or one) after their training, and will obtain salaries from £35 to £60 and £100. You should write to the secretary, Henry Bonham-Carter, Esq., 5, Hyde Park Square, London, W. Of course you should speak English fluently, and to be able to do this you should engage some English educated person to converse with you.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A LITTLE MOTHER.—Write to the Girls' Friendly Society—central office, 3, Victoria Mansions, Westminster, S.W., for all information and a list of the suburban offices, with their respective addresses. The society has about fifty-two lodges or homes in London and the provinces, one hundred and sixty-four clubs and recreation-rooms, and five homes of rest. 2. There are several lives of the composer Mozart. In English there is a translation by Lady Wallace, in two volumes, 1877, and of his letters, 1865. Holmes' "Life of Mozart," 1845. In all he wrote about 800 separate works. We may add that the "Life and Works of Mozart," by A. Whittingham, are also to be had. Possibly you might find one of these books secondhand, but we do not know of any "cheap" edition.

CINNA LLAGRA.—We feel for you in your distressing condition, and wish your verses were suitable for publication, although we could not have promised their insertion.

ORCHID.—We are very sorry to find the scales as printed are inaccurate, but as the proportions of the drawings are correct, and the original size is given, the inaccuracy is not of much importance. Fig. 1. Width of drawing is 5-18 of width of original. Fig. 2. The drawing is fifteen times smaller than the quilt is to be. Fig. 3. The drawing is 1-6 of real size of cushion. Fig. 4. The drawing is 1-9 of original size. The design of cushion is an "all over" pattern, as drawn.

W. F. M.—The author of "Stories of Famous Songs" offered no personal opinion as to the authorship of "There is nae luck about the house," beyond suggesting that, perhaps, as in the case of so many ballads, both the alleged authors had had a hand in the song, to which it seemed distinctly admitted that a third—Dr. Beattie—contributed one verse. Mrs. Mayo simply stated the facts concerning the controversy with the arguments on both sides; such controversy being an undoubted episode in the literary history of the verses. Mrs. Mayo has an immense admiration for "Cumnor Hall," and feels that its author could write anything. Still, it remains true that his claim to this particular song has been disputed.

LAURA ALEX SMITH.—The American war song referred to must be "John Brown's body lies mouldering in the grave, but his soul goes marching on."

A WOULD-BE COMPETITOR.—We think you will see that by leaving the choice of material and style of making up the articles mentioned in our Art Needlework Competition to the competitors, we do away with the difficulty you complain of, since every girl is at liberty to use as inexpensive material as she pleases for each and all of the four designs given.

MONA.—We think an application of ammonia to the nose or mosquito bites might relieve the poisonous effects if applied at once. Your writing would be good if sloped from right to left in the proper way.

RHODA M.—The address of the secretary of the Thimble League, which supplies poor women with employment, is Mrs. Robertson-Aikman, 7, Queen's Gate, S.W.

FRANK.—It depends on the health and idiosyncrasies of the individual whether it be well to keep a window partially open at night or not; for many a ventilator would be preferable. To the majority of persons (in good health), to take half a tumbler of cold water before breakfast is a beneficial habit.

J. M. PAMMENT (secretary of the Missionary and Evangelistic Bureau, 186, Aldersgate Street, E.C.).—We are glad to direct attention to your work, more especially in promoting "self-supporting missionary enterprise," under the conviction that private individual efforts should supplement the work of the great missionary societies.

ALLIE.—"What to do with Christmas Cards" is a question not infrequently put to us. Make a scrap-book of them, leaving spaces for very careful writing in of riddles, anecdotes, proverbs, and curious epigrams, etc., and send them, for example, to the care of Evan Franks, Esq., for the St. Andrew's Waterside Church Mission. This excellent institution supplies them to ships' libraries and foreign stations, for the benefit of sailors, fishermen, and emigrants. And if you can collect any old books, together with Bibles, hymn-books, and prayer-books, to send with your scrap-books, you will render a very valuable service to many.

SALE.—The term "City" was introduced in the time of the Norman Conquest. The derivation is from the Latin Civitas, and it is not restricted to episcopal towns. It applies to those subject to municipal government. The term is synonymous with burgh. At the great council assembled in 1072, to settle the claims of two archbishops, it was decreed that bishops' sees should be transferred from towns to cities; these latter existing before the sees were transferred to them. Incorporated towns, governed by a mayor and aldermen, are cities; and these are sufficiently important, as a rule, to possess a cathedral or abbey church.

PERPLEXED ONE.—You are justly suffering for your undutiful conduct. How could you have been so rash as to carry on a clandestine correspondence with your father's young cashier—a mere boy who was not old enough to know his own mind nor what was due to his employer and host. His extreme youth was his only excuse for his presumption and dishonourable breach of trust. Of course he is free, as a minor, to break off his fancied, but illegal, engagement to you, and we hope you will begin to show a little more dutiful feeling and self-respect.

MAY had better send the pearls to a jeweller's to be restored to a good colour. When clean, she should keep them well wiped, and in a dark, cool place, just as the pale amber should be preserved.

HILDA CLARE has written a long, crossed letter. We decline reading such, as a rule, but have read hers. She had better consult a doctor, as she seems to be in a hysterical condition or morbid state of mind.

ELLA HAMILTON, unless a kind of female "Orson," had better leave her face alone; and even were she such, we could only give the same advice. We certainly never recommended "the use of tweezers all over the face!"

IMMORTAL.—We thank you for your grateful letter, and are glad our paper and answers to correspondents have proved so useful. The skin of an English snake is of no use except as a curiosity.

M. GREEN.—We cannot assist you in taking a step which we regard as full of temptation and danger to any young girl, and, at best, is not calculated to help her on her way in her spiritual life. Many may have become seriously-minded persons since embracing such a vocation, but a religious person could scarcely pray, "Lead us not into temptation," and yet voluntarily run into it.

ONE OF THE GIRLS.—The Correspondence Society for religious intercourse to which you refer would have to be formed by girls themselves. Choose a president and secretary, and form it on the lines of one of the prayer or scripture reading unions, or other of the girls' clubs, which are now so well known and popular.

CHAPTER XI.

EVE'S WICKED
DISLOYALTY TO HER PARENTS.

PAUL HARDY

NOAH OLDMAN was certainly a very simple-minded man, for he at once accepted Arthur Clifford's explanation, and it never occurred to him to suspect that Eve and he had met by appointment, or that they were more than the merest acquaintances. He was very busy all the following week, bobbing for eeis in the early morning and late evening, tickling trout, and stacking his reeds during the day, working hard early and late, living constantly in the presence of God, thinking high and noble thoughts, lifting up his heart in prayer as he worked—not with any conscious effort, but as simply and naturally as he breathed the fresh salt air which swept over the marshland. Busy as he was, he made time, every day, to spend an hour or two with Adam, and when Mrs. Day was buried he followed her to the grave, and that same night he and Adam sat up very late together.

It was a lovely night; the sunset had been very fine, and streaks of gold and silver light still faintly tipped the purple clouds of the northern skies. It was very warm, so they moved a bench outside the ark, and sat smoking and talking under the clear starlit sky, the river rippling like an undercurrent of gentle sadness at their feet, the otherwise solemn silence of the night only now and then disturbed by the cry of some night bird as it passed.

"Do you ever fear that death will be simply annihilation, that we shall go out like a candle, as some of our would-be clever thinkers believe, Father Noah?" asked Adam, recurring, as he often did, to his old childish name for his friend.

"No, my lad, no. I should be sorry indeed to fear that."

"But there is nothing really to fear in it, after all. If we are annihilated we shall simply cease to be, cease to think, cease to exist consciously at all; consequently cease equally to suffer or to enjoy," said Adam.

"But we should lose the vision of God. We should never see the King in His beauty; even the dim vision of Him vouchsafed to us here would be withdrawn. I can hardly think of anything so terrible as that would be. No, Adam, no; I can't believe that it is possible," said Noah, earnestly.

"I hope it isn't; from the depths of my soul I hope it isn't; but there are times when it seems to me probable."

"Adam, my lad, they tell me it is much harder to believe in Christianity in these days than it was when I was young, and I have no doubt you will have to pass through the furnace of doubt, if you have not already entered it, when you are at college; but cling to the Lord, hold fast your personal love for Him, and then you will pass through the fire as unscathed as the holy children of old, but with your faith purified, all the dross purged away. I don't fear for you, Adam, though I see plainly the trial of your faith must come. To such as you, a faith that had never known doubt would not be worthy the name of faith; only remember, though for a time your faith may flicker and tremble, don't let your love grow cold; if the lamp burns dim don't let the fire out, lest you be left in the dark."

"I will remember, and if I am torn by doubts and difficulties it will be a comfort to me to know I have your prayers, and that you will not judge me harshly."

"God forbid that I should do that, knowing as I do that the rock on which Christianity is in most danger of splitting is not that of science, or of worldly wisdom of any kind, nor of criticism, nor even of reason, but of the inconsistency of Christians themselves. I am not learned enough for the questions of the day to disturb my faith, but I have nothing but respect and sympathy for honest doubters."

"Ah! if all Christians were like you, Father Noah, there would be fewer doubters. I thank God that I have known you; you have been more than a father to me ever since I lost my own father."

"He was a good man, though he would not like to hear me say so, for he was very humble, and for aught we know he may be very near us now. I never think of the dead as far off, any more than I think of God as far off. I believe we are surrounded by such a cloud of witnesses that, for aught I know to the contrary, I cannot open and clasp my hand, thus, without grasping the skirt of an angel's robe; and I believe the journey of the departing soul is inward rather than outward; the deeper our thoughts, the nearer we are to them. I don't know if have expressed myself clearly; it is difficult to an uncultivated mind like mine to put such thoughts into words."

"Quite. You think of the dead, not in another world, but in a kingdom which underlies this outward world, just as a sleeping man is still in the world, but above and beyond it."

"Exactly so. I think when we close our bodily eyes in death, we shall open our spiritual eyes on the kingdom of the departed, and shall be amazed to find how near we have been to them all our lives."

"Do you think the departed suffer in the intermediate state?"

"Yes; I believe it will be a time of rest and inaction, the night when no man can work, but a time of remembrance, and it is the remembrance of our past sins which will, I think, cause our suffering, for the best of us will have much to regret. I think, too, the longing for the fulness of the beatific vision will be far keener and stronger than it is now, so the pain of waiting will be ours, though probably intensely sweetened by the sense of nearness to God, though this very sense will increase our longing for perfect union with Him."

There was a pause after this. Noah smoked and Adam tilted his seat back so that his head rested against the ark, and he gazed up into the star depths overhead, and as one star after another became visible he spoke out the thought which was in his mind.

"Noah, doesn't it seem almost incredible to you when you gaze up into the multitude of stars shining in the heavens, and you know untold multitudes exist beyond our sight, and you also know each one of those stars is a sun, many much larger than our own sun, and each the centre of a system—doesn't it, I say, seem almost impossible that God should have selected this one planet among all the millions around us as the scene of His Son's incarnation and sufferings?"

"It ought to overpower us with gratitude to think He did choose our earth, but it does not seem to me impossible even to reason, because we know next to nothing about those other planets, whether they ever have been or ever will be inhabited, whether their inhabitants are like ourselves, or whether they, supposing them to exist and to be like us, have sinned. Still less do we know to what limits the virtue of our Lord's sufferings extend. It may extend to other worlds than ours, so the fact of our earth being so infinitesimally small a portion of the universe only makes one marvel more at the Lord's goodness as having chosen it as the scene of His sufferings. I often think that we forget that God is infinitely small as well as infinitely great. Every drop of water, every grain of sand may contain a world for all our poor finite minds can tell. I may be wrong, but I fancy there is no such thing as small or great with Him; a world is to Him perhaps as a grain of sand, and a grain of sand as a world, just as to Him a thousand years are as but a day; to the Eternal there is no time, to the Infinite no size. But you know more about this than I do; in fact, I know nothing, only as I sit here at night I meditate on all these things; but when you are gone, Adam, I shall have no one to discuss them with."

"I shall come here for the vacation, unless I get a holiday engagement. I shall always look upon this as my home. But what a mist is rising; you ought to go in, and I must be off!" said Adam, as he suddenly became aware that a thick mist was rolling towards them from the marsh.

"Yes, I have seen the water-spout coming for the last half hour, and it won't do either of us any good to sit out till we are wet through, so good-night, my lad. Shall I walk back with you?"

"No, on no account; I may go for a stroll, I am not sleepy," said Adam, as he shook Noah's hand and then walked off in the direction of Muck Fleet, giving the river a wide berth, for the mist was so thick that he might easily have walked into the water, well as he knew every stone of the towing-path.

Presently he saw on his left a light advancing from the direction of Muck Fleet, and apparently following the course of the river. At first Adam was inclined to think it was a will-o'-the-wisp, such as he had often seen in damp weather on the marsh, but he soon saw this light burnt too steadily for a will-o'-the-wisp, and a few minutes convinced him it must be a lantern. But who could be wandering about these meadows towards Noah's ark in the middle of the night? And what could their object be? No good one, Adam decided as he shouted—

"Hulloa! Who goes there?"

No answer was returned, but in an instant the light was extinguished, and in the mist and darkness it was impossible for Adam to give chase or even to discover who the nocturnal wanderer might be; however, he retraced his steps to the ark, and finding that, as he expected, Noah had as usual left the door unfastened, he mounted guard outside and paced up and down in front of the ark like a sentinel till the day broke and mist and shadows fled away. But the incident troubled him; he was certain the wanderer was making for the ark, and equally certain he was up to no good. He strongly suspected it was Jack Farrar, though what his object could be, unless he meditated some personal attack on Noah—and this Adam thought was scarcely possible—he could not conceive.

"Bah! I am as nervous as a woman; the events of this week have shaken my nerves. Perhaps it wasn't Farrar after all; perhaps it was young Clifford come to gaze at Eve's window." But this thought brought no less anxiety than its predecessor to Adam's brain, and finally deciding to see Noah the next day, and warn him to lock the door of the ark at night for the future, he went home to bed.

True to his resolution, he dropped in at the ark the next evening, and telling Noah what he had seen, asked him to fasten the door at night for the future.

"It is Jack Farrar I have no doubt, and he is up to no good, that we may be sure," said Adam.

"I hardly think he'd venture to come inside the house at night though; why, it would be next door to burglary; besides, bad as he is, I don't think he'd murder us in our beds. However, I'll fasten the door to-night," said Noah.

Accordingly for the next two or three nights Noah fastened the door when he went to bed, but on the Sunday night, the Sunday preceding Arthur Clifford's birthday, he forgot all about Adam's alarm, and left it unbarred and unlocked as usual. Had Adam known it he would have resumed his sentinel's duties, in which case he would have seen Jack Farrar steal noiselessly up to the ark soon after two o'clock, without a lantern this time, for it was a clear night, and light enough to see clearly even at this darkest hour. He tried the door, and finding it unfastened he gently opened it, and then listened intently, and hearing the unmistakable sound of Noah snoring in the inner room, he crept inside the kitchen.

Tick, tick, tick, went the clock solemnly, marking the fleeting moments; it was a loud tick, and it came, as Farrar knew, from a large old-fashioned clock which stood in its mahogany case in a corner of the kitchen opposite the door. Towards this clock, guided by its ticking, Farrar very cautiously made his way, till he found himself close to it. Then he listened again, and again the sound of Noah snoring and Mrs. Oldman's deep breathing reached his ears; all was safe. If only he could strike a light without waking them. To do this he pulled a box of fuses out of his pocket, struck one, and by its light quickly opened the glass door of the clock, put it on a good half-hour, closed the door noiselessly, and made his way out of the ark without waking the sleeping, or alarming the wakeful ears of Eve, who lay listening for the clock to strike three, at which hour she was to rise and dress, and be at Muck Fleet by the heronry at four o'clock punctually. There, as Arthur had told her on Saturday evening, he would meet her in his boat and row her up the dyke to Filton Broad, where a wherry he had hired for the occasion was lying to take them over to Yarmouth. Here they were to be married, and then go on board his own yacht, which was lying in harbour ready to take him and his bride over to France, to escape the storm the news of their marriage was sure to create. All this Arthur Clifford had told Eve under the trees of the heronry on Saturday evening, under the impression that she and the herons were his only listeners, and quite unconscious that up in one of the beeches sat Jack Farrar, eagerly drinking in every word of their conversation. There Arthur had shown her the marriage license and her wedding ring and diamond guard, and a letter from a clerical friend promising to perform the marriage ceremony.

Eve never doubted Arthur's good faith, but it was a comfort to her to see this letter and the license, and to know that if all went well she would be Mrs. Clifford before her father and mother knew of her elopement, for she was not likely to be missed till seven o'clock, and they hoped to be married at half-past six, as it was not more than two hours' run to Yarmouth, even if the wind were against them, since the tide was with them. Nevertheless it cost her a great effort to leave her father in this way; her mother she knew would be too much elated by the grandeur of the match she was making to mind the manner of doing it; but Noah would look at it from a different point of view, and had she married a peer of the realm in this clandestine fashion, he would have regarded the act as almost a criminal one; and Eve trembled when she thought of the righteous anger her conduct would rouse in the breast of her noble yet simple-minded father.

Still her love for Arthur was so strong that she never wavered, but lay tossing restlessly through the night, till the clock struck three, when she rose and dressed as noiselessly as possible, and then placing the letter she had prepared over night in a conspicuous place, she looked half-regretfully round the quaint little room which had been hers ever since she could remember.

She listened at the door which opened into her parents' room, and finding they slept soundly, she then gently unfastened the iron bar which held her lattice window open, pushed the window back, got on to the sill, and with some little difficulty squeezed through it and dropped safely to the ground, which, indeed, was only a few feet; she then refastened the window, leaving it open, and crept to the riverside, where her father's boat was moored. Then it struck her it was an unusually dark morning for the time of year; the first streaks of dawn were only just visible in the eastern sky, and according to her calculation it must be more than half-past three, though in reality it was barely three.

"Perhaps it is a cloudy morning; I do hope it will be a fine day, this my wedding-day," thought Eve, as she got into the boat and as noiselessly as possible ferried herself across the river.

The air was chilly and the exercise of rowing was welcome, for it warmed Eve, for she wore only a thin white dress, though she had taken the precaution of wrapping a little shawl round her shoulders. She carried no bag or parcel, as Arthur had told her she would find a trousseau on board his yacht, and everything she could possibly want, all packed in trunks already labelled "Mrs. Arthur Clifford." She landed and fastened the boat, and then set out to walk across the meadows to the heronry, holding up her white dress lest the long dewy grass should spoil it. The walk was not a pleasant one; it was still unaccountably dark, though as she went on the dawning day strengthened. It was chilly, and she was so thinly clad. Now and then one of the sleeping cows started up as she passed, and startled her. Every time the wind rustled in the trees she looked furtively round to see if she were pursued. Visions of Noah more angry than she had ever seen him accompanied her. Fears lest Arthur should be prevented from meeting her troubled her; and more than once she was tempted to turn back and go home to her little bed, but the thought of Arthur and the happy and brilliant future which lay before her as his wife, lured her on; and after each hesitation she quickened her pace.

A harsh cry, followed by several similar ones, greeted her as she approached the heronry, and one after another the group of herons which were standing near the heronry, apparently consulting as to what fishing-grounds to visit that day, took wing, and soared up far overhead, their heads drawn between their shoulders, their legs stretched out behind them. To Eve's excited imagination they looked in the dim dawn like a flock of holy angels, flying away in horror from the sight of her wicked disloyalty to her parents. Still she went on till she reached the spot where Arthur had promised to meet her with his boat, and as she arrived there she found his boat, but in it, instead of Arthur, a strange man, who, touching his hat respectfully, said—

"The master was obliged to go on board earlier, ma'am, but the wherry is lying quite close to the entrance to Muck Fleet. We shall be on board in ten minutes, and he is waiting to receive you. There is not a moment to lose, if we are to reach Yarmouth at six o'clock."

VARIETIES.

THE LONGEST PERIOD OF LIFE.

"Philosophers," said Miss Prime, "disagree as to which period of life seems the longest to mankind. What is your opinion, doctor?"

"Well," said the doctor, "it varies. In women, for instance, the longest generally is between twenty-nine and thirty. I know in my wife's case, according to her own statement, ten years elapsed between her twenty-ninth and thirtieth birthday."

IN THE OLDEN TIME.—Mrs. Herbert, the bed-chamber woman in the household of Queen Charlotte, going in a hackney chair, the chairmen were excessively intoxicated, and after tossing her and jolting her about for some minutes, set the chair down; and the foreman, lifting up the top, said, "Madam, you are so drunk, that if you do not sit still it will be impossible to carry you."

"INDIGO" JONES.—The surname of Inigo Jones, the famous architect, is not easily mistaken, but people sometimes blunder about his Christian name. Lady Northington, who was an ignorant woman, told George III. at a drawing-room that their country house was built by Indigo Jones. To this the king replied that he "thought so by the style." When her ladyship related this conversation to Lord Northington, the latter remarked, to her surprise, that he could not tell which was the greater fool, she or his Majesty.

GOOD AT ARITHMETIC.

"Well, you see," said Ethel, to her father, "Miss Maggie asked the girl at the head, how much was eight and five, and she didn't know, and said twelve; then the next girl said nine, and the next one said eleven, and the next one said fourteen. Such silly answers! Then Miss Maggie asked me, and I said thirteen, and Miss Maggie told me to go to the top of the class. 'Course it was thirteen.'"

"That was nice," said her father. "I didn't think you could add so well. How did you know it was thirteen?"

"Why, I guessed it; nobody said thirteen."

THE COMMON ROUND.—The path of duty is near, yet people seek it afar off. The way is wide; it is not hard to find. Go home and seek it and you will not lack teachers.

CHAPTER III.
"IN FAIR VERONA."

ALL their days at Venice had been bright and beautiful, but when Olive looked forth on the morning of their departure the sky was of a dull, leaden hue, and rain was falling fast. She supposed that it was the dreary weather which made her feel so down-hearted as she prepared for the journey. Breakfast was sent to their rooms, so that they did not descend till it was time to start for the station. Mr. Denning's foot was little better, but he was bent upon getting away, and though every movement gave him pain, he managed to limp downstairs and across the hall to the gondola. The train left Venice about eight o'clock, so that it was too early when our travellers quitted the hotel for many persons to be stirring there. Olive thought it was rather melancholy that there should be no one to say good-bye to them save the proprietor of the hotel, with his overwhelming politeness. She sighed as she crept under the funeral-looking cover of the gondola, and she did not find the view from the side window, of the rain lashing the Canal, at all inspiring. Venice wore an air of gloom which made her look quite unlike the lovely bright city that had fascinated Olive.

"It is well we are leaving to-day," said Mr. Denning, briskly. "We shall escape the dreariness of a wet day at Venice."

Olive said that she thought a wet day was dismal anywhere.

But she was not one to give way to gloom under any circumstances, and her usual animation returned when they were fairly on the way to Verona. Her father had suffered considerably in making the change from gondola to railway carriage, and the pain in his foot seemed to increase rather than diminish as they went on. Olive did all she could to give him ease; but she saw with concern that the injured part was swelling anew.

After an hour or two the rain cleared off, and it was in bright sunshine with a blue sky overhead that they first saw the interesting old city of Verona. But Mr. Denning could with difficulty get across the platform to a carriage, and on their arrival at the hotel he allowed himself to be carried upstairs to the room on the first floor which fortunately they were able to secure.

"I am afraid I shall be a prisoner here for a time, Olive," he said, ruefully, as she settled him as comfortably as she could on the hard, old-fashioned sofa. "This foot will not get right in a day, I can foresee."

"If only we could be sure that we were treating it in the best way," said Olive. "I should feel more easy about it if we were following the advice of a medical man."

"That's more than I should if I entrusted it to the care of one of these Italians," replied Mr. Denning.

"Would you let an English surgeon see it, if there were one here?" his daughter asked.

"Of course I would," he returned, almost impatient of the question; "but there is not the least likelihood of our finding one here."

Olive made inquiries and found that her father was right. There was no English doctor at Verona. Indeed, a more essentially Italian city there cannot be. Traversing its quaint, narrow streets and picturesque market-places, passing beneath ancient gateways or by old brown palaces, gazing on the yellow Adige and the old bridges with their feudal battlements, one feels as if one were transported to the Middle Ages. Olive had to wander forth alone to make acquaintance with the grand old city, yet even so it delighted her. She was a girl of quick imagination, and all the poetry in her was kindled as she went to and fro the streets of Verona, gleaming from guide-book and story the romantic legends associated with various spots, and trying hard to realise in some degree the lives of the old noble families which have left such traces of their magnificence everywhere in Verona. The amphitheatre was a great wonder to her. She had not visited Rome, but had she been acquainted with the Coliseum, in imitation of which some suppose the Veronese amphitheatre to have been constructed, she would hardly have felt less interest in this grand old memorial of ancient Roman life. It is in a better state of preservation than the Coliseum, being, indeed, so perfect that the grand spectacles of Roman times might take place to-day in its arena. Olive longed to see her father's delight when he viewed the immense oval. But he would hardly be able to climb as she did to the highest step of the interior, and from thence gaze first down into the vast arena, and then beyond over the housetops of Verona to the distant, snow-touched mountains. Each day she tantalised him, whilst hoping to amuse him by descriptions of what she had seen. When two days of inaction had passed and his foot seemed hardly any better he began to show signs of depression. Olive heard with dismay each heavy sigh he drew. She would not have left him had he not insisted on her doing so, for she knew that in her absence he would be brooding over past annoyances, and cherishing anew the bitter feelings which she had hoped were passing away.

Olive was naturally desirous of seeing the house of the Capulets. There was no difficulty in finding a place to which so many tourists gravitate. On the afternoon she set out to visit it, the first person she spoke to in the narrow street pointed out to her the ancient portal with the family badge, the cap, carved in stone above it, with the inscription—"From this house went forth that Juliet sung by so many poets and bewailed by so many hearts."

Olive's heart throbbed more quickly as she read the words. The girl whose tragic love-story had never failed to touch her feelings, seemed near to her here. The next moment Olive was picturing to herself the garden scene; but when the words—

"What's in a name? That which we call a rose,

By any other name would smell as sweet," came to her mind, bringing a flush of colour to her face, it was not of Romeo that she was thinking. But, alas! for poetic illusions. There was nothing romantic in the appearance of the dirty, gloomy courtyard into which Olive passed through the archway. Her eyes wandered round, searching for the balcony. There was one, but it was far too high above the ground to be that from which Juliet leaned to catch her lover's words. Marks were visible on the wall at a lower height, however, which might indicate the place where there was formerly a balcony. Olive turned away with a sense of disappointment. A boy, who had been watching her, came forward and volunteered to show her the way to Juliet's tomb. With the hope that this would prove more satisfactory, she suffered him to guide her thither. He led her for some distance, till they came to two large wooden doors set in a high wall, and closely barred as though they gave admittance to a monastery. The boy pulled the rusty chain attached to a large, old bell, and as it clanged loudly an uncouth-looking man opened one of the doors and invited the lady to enter. Dismissing her guide, she stepped in, and having paid the fee demanded of her, was led along a covered passage to a large garden or orchard lying beyond.

A rough path, bordered with rank grass and running between apple and pear trees bowing beneath the weight of ripe fruit, brought them to a corner of the garden where, beneath a rude shed, was to be seen the sarcophagus which had held the living, lovely Juliet. But here Olive's imagination received a fresh shock. The famed tomb looked more like a roughly-hewn horse-trough than anything else. In vain the man explained that this garden had been the burial-ground of the Capulets, and that the genuineness of the tomb was proved by a hollow formed for the head to rest in and a breathing hole. Olive found it impossible to believe in it. She regretted that she had wasted her time in coming to see the tomb. She had already perhaps left her father too long. Turning to go, she saw that the sky had grown black and there was every appearance of a thunderstorm. At the same moment she heard voices close at hand. Other visitors were coming to see the so-called tomb of Juliet. The voices had a familiar sound, and with a thrill of pleasant surprise Olive recognised in the two tourists who came in sight along the winding path, Mr. Rowcroft and his friend.

"Miss Denning!" said Stuart Rowcroft, hardly surprised, since it was with the hope of seeing her that he had come to Verona; "this is a pleasure."

Olive's bright looks seemed to own that the meeting was a pleasure to her as she shook hands with the gentlemen.

"And so you have been romantic enough to come to this out-of-the-way spot for the sake of fair Juliet of undying memory?" said Martin Smith. "But surely you do not pretend to believe that she ever reposed in that thing?"

Olive smiled and shook her head.

"I am afraid I cannot believe in it," she said.

"I told Stuart I was sure it was a fraud," remarked his friend; "but he would not be dissuaded from coming, though now we are here he does not seem over anxious to look at the tomb, does he? Come, old fellow, gaze and admire and let's be off, for it is going to pour. Miss Denning, I hope you have an umbrella, if I may mention anything so prosaic in this poetic spot."

"I have not, alas!" said Olive. "It was very careless of me to come out without one."

A brief glance at the tomb satisfied Mr. Rowcroft. He turned back and walked beside Olive across the garden.

"How is it Mr. Denning is not with you?" asked Martin Smith. "Does he disdain to interest himself in anything so trivial as the loves of Romeo and Juliet?"

Olive laughed, but the next minute her face grew grave.

"How I wish he could have come!" she said; "but he cannot move from the sofa." And she told the story of his accident.

Mr. Rowcroft listened with concern.

"You are sure he has not broken a bone, I suppose?" he said.

"I am sure of nothing," Olive replied, "except that the foot is terribly swollen and painful."

"But a surgeon has seen it?"

"No," said Olive; "I could not persuade my father to consult one. He has a horror of Italian doctors, and there is no English medical man here."

"Do you think he would allow me to look at his foot?" Mr. Rowcroft asked. "I should be most happy to do what I could for him."

Olive's face flushed.

"I do not know," she said; "but, oh! I wish he would, for indeed I am very troubled about him. But really, I do not know what to say." She lifted her eyes to his with an anxious, perplexed look, and met in response a glance which expressed such perfect comprehension and such sympathy that her trouble melted away before it and she was conscious of a strange, new gladness.

The next moment they were startled by a blinding flash of lightning, followed by a close and awful peal of thunder. Instinctively all three ran for the house which was but a few steps from them. As they gained its shelter a tremendous shower began to fall. There was nothing for it but to wait as patiently as they could till the fierce storm subsided. Perhaps the delay put no great strain on the patience of Stuart Rowcroft. Nor did Olive find it altogether tiresome, though she was anxious to get home and allay her father's anxiety.

Martin Smith seemed the most restless, but presently he sauntered off to the further end of the loggia under which they had taken shelter, and sought consolation in a cigar.

"Now we must enter into a conspiracy for your father's good," said Mr. Rowcroft to Olive; "I am quite aware that he would rather receive help from almost anyone than from me; but his foot must be attended to, and I think he will believe that I have had experience of such cases. Now how can we surprise him into letting me look at his foot? Shall I call upon him unexpectedly this afternoon?"

"I think that will hardly do," said Olive, fearful of the kind of reception her father might accord him in that case. "I had better tell him that I have seen you and that you propose calling this afternoon."

"Very well, then; if you think that best," said Stuart; "but be sure to tell him that it was my own proposal to come, and that I shall come with the hope of using my surgical knowledge for his benefit. And now please tell me what you have been doing since you came to Verona. You cannot think how surprised—may I say how disappointed?—I was when I learned that you had left Venice."

This was the beginning of so interesting a talk that when Martin rejoined them a quarter of an hour later he found them unaware of the fact that the rain was over.

"My dear, where have you been all this time?" her father asked, when at length Olive appeared in his room. "I have been so uneasy about you."

"You need not have been alarmed about me, father," she said. "I was under shelter during the storm."

"How was I to know that?" he returned. "It was imprudent of you to stay out so long, when a storm threatened."

"Yes, it was," Olive admitted, meekly; "but I wanted to see Juliet's tomb, which, however, is really not worth visiting."

Her father seemed so out of humour that she did not dare to say a word about Mr. Rowcroft till they had taken luncheon, and the excellence of the cooking was exerting a soothing influence on Mr. Denning's nerves. Then she inquired if his foot had been less painful during the morning. He answered with a sigh in the negative.

"It gets worse instead of better, I believe," he said.

"It ought to have proper surgical attention," Olive observed, gravely.

"What is the good of saying that when you know it cannot have it?" he returned.

"I do not know that it is impossible," she said, coolly. "Father, if you were told that there was a London surgeon staying in Verona, would you ask him to come and look at your foot?"

"Certainly I should," he replied, with eagerness. "Why do you ask me? Have you heard of a surgeon who is here?"

"Father, I met Mr. Rowcroft and his friend this morning. Mr. Rowcroft, you know, is a surgeon."

"That man!" exclaimed Mr. Denning, with something between a snarl and a groan; "the last man I should wish to receive assistance from! Did you speak to him, Olive?"

"It was impossible to avoid doing so," said Olive, quietly. "They came upon me suddenly at Juliet's tomb. And when they inquired for you I mentioned your accident. Mr. Rowcroft is coming to see you this afternoon."

"What, Olive!" exclaimed her father, angrily. "You asked him to come without consulting me!"

"No, indeed," replied Olive, "it was his own proposal. He said he should be happy to attend to your foot if you would let him. I could not answer for you, but of course you can refuse his help when he comes, if you like."

"I have a great mind to do so," said her father, hotly. "I would rather suffer than be indebted to a Rowcroft."

"I do not think I should feel so in your case," said Olive, quietly. "It seems to me that if you refused this chance of cure you would be guilty of the folly vulgarly described as 'cutting off one's nose to spite one's face.'"

"I daresay you cannot enter into my feelings," said her father, bitterly. "It is impossible you should understand how I hate everyone who bears the name of Rowcroft."

Olive was leaning on the window-sill, gazing across the piazza at the quaint, frescoed houses opposite, with their stone balustrades and deep loggias. Though her attitude and manner were careless, her heart was strangely stirred within her.

"Oh," she exclaimed, suddenly, in a tone full of sadness, "how slowly the world changes! Is it after all so much better now than in the days when the retainers of the Montagues and Capulets could scarce meet in the narrow streets of this Verona without fighting? People hate each other still, it seems."

"What do you mean by that, Olive?" asked her father in an offended tone.

Olive was spared the necessity of replying, for just then a servant opened the door and ushered in Mr. Rowcroft.

Olive waited only to see him seated by her father's couch, and then slipped from the room. She felt too nervous to stay and mark how her father would receive Mr. Rowcroft's advances. She acted impulsively, but the finest tact might have prompted her retirement, for Mr. Denning would probably have shown himself less flexible had she been present.

As it was she was soon called back to find Mr. Rowcroft certain things he needed. Mr. Denning's common-sense had triumphed, and he had not declined the help the surgeon so courteously tendered. Olive found him meekly submitting to Mr. Rowcroft's careful examination of the injured part, and bearing bravely the pain which resulted. Happily, the surgeon was able to assure him that there was no fracture. The ankle had received a severe and aggravated sprain, but there was nothing to cause permanent lameness. Still, it was an affair of time. The cure could not be hurried. Mr. Denning must resign himself to inaction for a while.

"How long?" asked the patient, anxiously.

Mr. Rowcroft replied that it was impossible to say how long; perhaps a week must be passed on the sofa.

Mr. Denning's countenance fell. The idea of spending a week in that unhomelike Italian hotel was most unwelcome.

"I shall be staying here for a few days," said Stuart Rowcroft, carelessly, as if this had been his original intention. "You must let me look in on you and do what I can."

Mr. Denning could not refuse. Already his foot felt easier for the surgeon's skillful bandaging. It was with no feigned gratitude that he thanked Mr. Rowcroft as they shook hands. The young man went off to find a chemist who could prepare a lotion for his patient's use. Olive had said scarcely anything to him, but the look he caught from her ere he went away thanked him more eloquently than words could have done.

"Do you mean to tell me that you are going to spoil your holiday for the sake of that stiff, stuck-up old gentleman?" exclaimed Martin Smith, an hour later, when his friend informed him of his intention to spend several days at Verona; "his ankle will get right enough in time, without your dancing attendance on it."

"Very likely," returned the other; "but I do not consider that I shall spoil my holiday by remaining here. Verona is a most interesting old place. I am looking forward to making a thorough acquaintance with its antiquities."

"I daresay," replied Martin, sceptically. "Of course it is pure love of antiquarian research that keeps you here. Well, I never saw such a clear case of—"

"Of what?" asked Rowcroft, as he paused.

"Oh, I won't attempt a diagnosis," said Martin; "the malady is common enough, but not one that I should have imagined you would succumb to so easily."

"What rubbish you are talking!" said Rowcroft, colouring. "It is surely a simple thing that I should wish to be of service to a fellow-countryman and his daughter whom an accident has placed in such trying circumstances in a foreign land. I am sorry if my decision vexes you. I thought that as you were going to join your cousins at Milan, my staying behind for a few days could not matter much."

"Oh, I don't mind going alone; but I fancy they will rather regret your absence. I shall not get much of a welcome when I appear without you."

"Nonsense!" returned Stuart, laughing. "You won't get me to believe that. Come, if we are going to see the tombs of the Scaligers we had better be off."

Whoever regretted it, Olive Denning had cause to be glad that Mr. Roweroft remained behind at Verona. Her father's foot improved surely, if slowly, under the surgeon's care. And Mr. Roweroft's visits were so pleasant, he was so helpful in devising expedients for the comfort of his patient and so clever in entertaining him, that Mr. Denning found it impossible to keep the young man at a distance, and unconsciously began to count upon his visits. He even allowed him to take Olive to see the old church of San Zenone with its quaint bronzes and sculptures. And more than once it happened that Stuart Roweroft meeting Olive in her walk ventured to join her. When Mr. Roweroft went away for a few days to visit Padua and Mantua he was missed by both father and daughter, though neither acknowledged the fact. Olive knew that her father missed his visits because he became so nervous and irritable, so ready to take up old grievances and harp upon them.

"When does he return?" Mr. Denning asked his daughter one evening, using the pronoun in preference to uttering the name which was so disagreeable to his ear.

Olive understood.

"To-morrow, I believe," she said, colouring a little as she spoke. "Do you not remember his saying that he hoped to see a decided improvement in the foot after three days?"

"Hum," muttered her father; "I suppose he will say it is my foot brings him back. A pretty sum I shall have to pay for all these comings and goings."

"Father!" exclaimed Olive, in astonishment.

"Why do you exclaim like that? You surely do not suppose that I shall not pay him for attending to this foot?"

"Pay him! Oh, father!" exclaimed Olive, flushing hotly; "I do not think he meant it in that way."

"It would be very impertinent of him to mean anything else," said her father, angrily. "He is accustomed to be remunerated for his services, and of course I shall remunerate him. I will not allow a Roweroft to place me under an obligation if I know it."

Olive was silent; her face wore a troubled look.

"Mr. Roweroft has been very kind," she ventured to say, after a few minutes; "I think he would be hurt if you offered him money for what he has done."

"He has been kind, I know," said Mr. Denning, relenting a little. "Do not think me ungrateful, Olive. I admit that he has behaved well, that he is a gentleman, but you must see that it is impossible that I can make a friend of him. Our acquaintance must cease when I am able to continue my journey, which I hope will be the case in a day or two. It must all come to an end then."

"Yes," said Olive, faintly, for her father's tone seemed to demand a reply. "Yes, I understand."

"It must all come to an end!" How drearily the words echoed through her mind.

Presently she slipped away to her own room. It was at the back of the hotel, and had a little stone balcony, commanding a paved courtyard, in the centre of which, surrounded by orange trees planted in large wooden tubs, a fountain played.

As Olive stood leaning on the low balustrade she seemed to hear through the soft splashing of the fountain those dreary words, "It must all come to an end." Well, what had she expected? She had known all along that it must be so. Yet within the last few days Mr. Roweroft's manner towards her had awakened in her heart the sweetest hopes. She had dreamed of a friendship that should not cease, but grow stronger and truer with the testing of the years. And now her father had virtually forbidden her to look upon Stuart Roweroft as a friend. Their acquaintance with him was to cease when they quitted Verona.

It was hard, Olive thought, that he must be shunned only because he was allied to the Rowerofts of Wivescombe. Her father had no other reason for disliking him. A sad smile quivered for a moment on Olive's face as she perceived the analogy between her trouble and that of the world-famed Juliet. She, too, loved—with a deep blush she owned it to herself—one whose family name was hateful in her father's ears.

Ah! she could enter now into the feelings of that poor, unhappy Juliet. The young Italian girl, over whose tragic fate many a one has wept on seeing it represented on the stage, seemed a very sister to Olive at this hour. Tears gathered in her eyes, and she found herself sobbing, and scarce knew whether she were grieving for herself or for the fair, ill-fated girl, whose tears had been all shed and sorrows ended so many, many years ago.

"Oh!" cried Olive to herself, with passionate earnestness; "that was long ago—in the dark ages as they are called. No one thought it wrong then that men should hate each other, or that feuds between families should be cherished for years. But now, when the world calls itself Christian, when we profess to be guided by the teaching of the loving, all-forgiving Saviour, it cannot be right to feel such hate. Christ teaches us to forgive those who injure us, and to love even our enemies." Then with shame Olive remembered that but a short time before her own feelings towards Squire Roweroft had been almost as bitter as her father's.

When Mr. Roweroft came in the next day he pronounced the ankle decidedly better, and gave Mr. Denning leave to begin to use it with caution. He managed to get Mr. Denning downstairs and into a carriage and took him for a drive round Verona. Two days later it seemed possible to accomplish the journey to Milan. Mr. Roweroft was also about to travel thither, and when he offered to escort Mr. Denning so far that gentleman was fain to accept the offer, for he felt that in his rather helpless state it would be a comfort to have the surgeon's company.

Although Mr. Denning had spoken so confidently to his daughter about remunerating Mr. Roweroft, he found some difficulty in approaching the subject with him. At last, on the eve of their departure, when Olive was not present, he asked Mr. Roweroft, more abruptly than he had intended, to be so good as to tell him the amount of his debt. Mr. Roweroft stared at him, not understanding for a moment. Then he flushed, but laughed, choosing to treat the matter as a joke.

"My dear sir," he said, lightly, "you cannot suppose that I practise during my holidays. I have only given you such help as one traveller may surely render another without any thought of remuneration arising. You are more than welcome to anything I have been able to do for you."

"You are very kind," said Mr. Denning, with some embarrassment, feeling it impossible as a gentleman to further urge his wish. "You place me under a great obligation."

"Not at all; do not let that weigh on you," said the young man, with eagerness. "Who knows? Some day it may be in your power to lay me under an infinitely greater obligation."

Mr. Denning looked the surprise he felt, and the unwelcome suggestion that they might possibly be brought together in the future caused his manner instantly to stiffen.

"I am thankful to be leaving Verona," said Mr. Denning the next morning, as they drove to the railway station, accompanied by Stuart Roweroft; "but I believe you are sorry, Olive."

"I am," she said, with a little sigh. "I have stayed here long enough to grow very fond of the quaint old place." Her eyes met Mr. Roweroft's as she spoke, and there was something in their expression which brought the colour to her cheeks. Was he, too, sorry that the days at Verona had come to an end?

"You will enjoy the lakes," he said to her, the next minute. "If you have never seen Como, you have a great pleasure before you."

"And you are going on to Lucerne?" said Mr. Denning.

"Yes, to-night. Smith, who has been making the round of the lakes with his cousins, will meet me at Milan, and we travel on together."

So the parting was to take place almost sooner than Olive had expected. Very short seemed the run to Milan, and once landed in the bustle of the railway station, there was scant time for words. Martin Smith was there with some girls in pretty travelling dresses, whom Olive supposed to be his cousins. They greeted Mr. Roweroft with evident pleasure, and seemed anxious to monopolise him; but he turned from them to secure a cab for Mr. Denning and his daughter and see them off to their hotel. His good-bye to Olive had to be hastily uttered.

"I shall see you again," he murmured. "We shall be sure to meet again, for I shall be coming some day to my cousin's at Wivescombe."

Olive's only response was a rather doubtful smile. It was impossible to explain that when at home she could hold no intercourse with one who was a guest at Wivescombe Hall. There was a strange, sore pain at her heart as the cab drove off, and looking back she saw Mr. Roweroft join the group of girls, who welcomed him with their brightest smiles.

"It has all come to an end," she said to herself, drearily. "It has all come to an end." And never afterwards could Olive recall her first vision of the beautiful, white cathedral of Milan, with its countless pinnacles piercing the cloudless sky, without a momentary sense of the desolating pain which had made her look on it with such dull, hopeless eyes.

(To be concluded.)

THE APPROACH TO EYAM.

EYAM AND ITS MEMORABLE WOE.

PART I.

AMONG the examples of Christian fortitude, self-sacrifice, and resignation to the will of God which have blessed modern times, few will be found to be more remarkable than those offered by the history of the plague at Eyam, or, as it is sometimes called, the "Memorable Woe;" and we feel sure that the subject is one which will interest our girls, the more so because it is intimately connected with the story of a woman's heroism and devotion.

To few women, indeed, has been given a chance of exhibiting such marvellous fortitude as to Catherine Mompesson; and by few women has the noblest form of self-sacrifice been carried out even unto death, not only without complaint, but with readiness—nay, even cheerfulness. The history of the plague of Eyam is probably known to many of our readers, but we think that a carefully detailed account of the scenes of this "Memorable Woe," illustrated by sketches made on the spot, expressly for this journal, will serve to impress the tragedy more firmly and more vividly in the minds of those who are already acquainted with it, and will bring it before those to whom the subject is new, in an intelligible and interesting form.

It is not our intention to enter into any lengthy or circumstantial history of the plague at Eyam, as this has been most carefully done by a local historian, Mr. W. Wood, in his "History of Eyam," but we propose to give a short and concise account of the terrible events which almost depopulated this charming little village in the autumn and winter of 1665, and the spring and summer of 1666.

Eyam is situated in the peak district of Derbyshire, about twelve miles from Sheffield, and six from Bakewell.

Few villages in England, or perhaps in Europe, present a more romantic and picturesque appearance. It is surrounded on every side by lofty hills and rocky defiles of the wildest and most fantastic description; mountain streams force their way through gorges, here breaking through the rocks which they seem to have torn asunder, and there falling over vast boulders and craggy precipices; sometimes rising suddenly up out of the earth from some natural but hidden cavernous cistern; and again disappearing with a rush and a roar into a concealed abyss. The approach to Eyam from the strange-looking village of Stony Middleton is guarded by gigantic rocks, one of which is like a vast tower with huge angle buttresses rising abruptly from a grassy slope with a precipitancy which almost startles one. Connecting this turreted mass with a huge craggy cliff called the "Lover's Leap" (from a foolish love-sick maiden who in 1760 attempted to throw herself from the top, and succeeded in rendering herself a cripple for life), is a series of rocks so fantastic and strange in form that it would seem as though nature had been making a parody on the works of man. At first sight they might be a series of ruined castles torn and riven from summit to base by storms or earthquakes, here flung back as if by some violent concussion, and there projecting forward and overhanging the road as if they were momentarily about to fall from their base, block up the gorge, and carry ruin and desolation all around. No one can look at these without being impressed with solemn thoughts or without feeling that their divine builder could at one instant destroy this world and reduce it to a mass of chaotic confusion. What agents of providence or of nature were the immediate causes of this strange and weird scene we must leave to scientific men to determine. Whether some violent convulsion of the earth's surface, or the bursting forth of vast and buried torrents, has torn through the hills and rent them asunder, it is not now our purpose to discuss, but we can only say that in the sight of such prodigies of nature we are not surprised to find that men could be found capable of noble heroism and self-sacrifice. At the opposite end of the village rises the huge hill, we might almost say mountain, called "Sir William," and a perfect amphitheatre of craggy eminences with bleak and weather-worn hills shuts out the village from the rest of the world. The village itself does not disappoint one on a nearer approach, as places which have an eventful history so frequently do. It consists for the most part of a wide, almost serpentine street, with a triangular open space at its eastern termination, a bridge at its western, and midway a small irregular village green, with a fine old manor-house on one side, and picturesque cottages, many of which date from the Middle Ages, on the other. In the centre of the small green are the stone pillars which formerly supported the stocks. The church, which is close at hand, is a venerable structure, but has suffered considerably in antiquarian interest from alterations effected chiefly at the beginning of the present century; and the very extensive restoration, which was undertaken a few years ago for the purpose of reverting it to its original form and appearance, has, as is usual in such cases, shown too deliberately the no doubt good intention of its authors, and has resulted in that "modern antique" look which, however desirable from an architectural point of view, naturally deprives a building of all poetry and romance.

THE HOUSE IN WHICH THE PLAGUE HAD ITS START.

From what we are able to gather, this restoration was rendered necessary by the neglect of past ages, and the pressing call for increased accommodation. The tower, however, south side of the chancel, and the clerestory of the nave are all ancient; though the first-mentioned was partially rebuilt in 1615.

The long lancet windows and elegant clergy door are undoubtedly works of the close of the twelfth or the commencement of the thirteenth century; and the sturdy pillars and arches of the interior date from the same period. Attached to the walls are many incised slabs with elegantly designed floral crosses carved on them, some of which may be of a still earlier period; but the greatest object of architectural interest by far is the fine carved stone cross in the churchyard. It is evidently a work of very early date, though not of the eighth century, to which it is sometimes ascribed. It is covered with a mass of interpenetrating and knot-work patterns similar to those seen in manuscripts of the tenth and eleventh centuries. There are also small subjects quaintly carved, such as angels playing upon instruments. Unfortunately one stone of the stem of this beautiful cross is missing, which somewhat injures its otherwise elegant proportions. There is a tradition in the village that when Howard the philanthropist visited Eyam, the top of the cross was broken off, and lying by the side covered with nettles; it is said that Howard had the upper portion replaced at his own expense.*

We have no hesitation in saying that in addition to being one of the most ancient, it is the most beautiful example of a churchyard cross existing in this country; and owing to its being executed in very hard stone it is in an extremely good state of preservation, notwithstanding the seven or eight hundred severe Derbyshire winters which have passed over it. It is a symbol round which such associations as those of Eyam seem rightly to centre; and the many ancient and interesting graves of those who sleep beneath the sacred sod of this churchyard, many of them victims of that heroic struggle against pestilence, form a group of memorials of the past which for interest can scarcely be exceeded anywhere in this country.

We must now say a few words upon the introduction of the fearful pestilence into Eyam; its duration; the frightful sufferings and fearful mortality which it inflicted upon the inhabitants, and the noble and Christian resolve to sacrifice their own lives rather than risk spreading the infection amongst their neighbours, which these good people made at the instigation of the rector, the Rev. William Mompesson, and the ex-rector, William Stanley. We should here, perhaps, explain that Stanley had been placed in possession of the rectory by the Commonwealth, but that at the Restoration the Rev. Shoreland Adams, who had been previously rector in Charles the First's days, was reinstated. Very fortunately, however, this man was removed from Eyam in 1664. We say fortunately, because, from what is known of the character of Shoreland Adams, there would have been little chance of any heroic action having been taken towards preventing the spread of the plague by him. The character of the man may be judged from the fact that he said of himself, that sooner than give up his living for conscience' sake, he would have "sworn that a crow was white!" We shall soon see what a blessing it was that he was succeeded at Eyam by William Mompesson, a man of the most opposite character. Stanley, after having been deprived, still remained in Eyam as a Nonconformist minister, preaching from house to house, and apparently supporting himself as a law-writer. It would seem that the majority of the inhabitants preferred the administrations of Stanley to those of Mompesson, a state of things probably brought about by the personal character of the latter's immediate predecessor. A short time before his arrival in Eyam, Mompesson had married a daughter of Randolph Carr, of Cocken, in the county of Durham, a beautiful and refined woman, whose character as brought out and developed by the sufferings surrounding her, was one that it is impossible too greatly to admire.

At the commencement of September, 1665, a tailor residing at Eyam, in a house to the west of the churchyard, received a packet containing tailors' patterns. Upon opening the box he discovered that the goods were damp, and, proceeding to dry them, he was almost immediately seized with a violent sickness, and a few hours afterwards symptoms of the plague appeared upon him. He and every member of the household died within a few days, and by the 28th of October twenty-six of the inhabitants of Eyam had fallen victims to the fatal malady. There can be little doubt that many of the better class of inhabitants immediately left the village. In November there were seven fresh cases, and in December nine. January, 1666, added five more victims to the fatal list, and hope began to revive that the visitation was at an end, and in all probability many returned to the village who had previously left it.

Sad, however, must have been the disappointment of these unfortunate people, for in February the number of deaths rose to eight. March, however, added only six to the fatal list; in April it again rose to eight, and in May it fell to four.

Although the sufferings of those whose families and households had been infected by the plague at its early stage—and the painful and terrible fact remains that they were abandoned and most scrupulously avoided by their fellow-creatures, owing to the superstitious dread with which people regarded this fearful malady—may be easily imagined, yet they were as nothing compared with the horror and dismay which fell upon the people when in June nineteen persons died from the plague out of a population of little more than three hundred. Under this state of things it is not astonishing that nearly every person in the village meditated flight; and even Catherine Mompesson, with a wife's and mother's anxiety for those nearest and dearest to her, appears to have besought her husband, for the sake of their two infant children, to leave the doomed village. Mompesson, however, convinced her that his duty was to be with his afflicted flock during their terrible suffering, and immediately this heroic woman was convinced of the fact, she insisted upon remaining with her husband, sharing his danger and his labours. The children were sent away to a friend in Yorkshire, and Catherine appears to have had a sad foreboding that she was never again to see those so dear to her; therefore her parting with them was indescribably sad and tender, but the imaginary scene which Mr. Wood suggests as having taken place at this parting, "the mother uttering a piercing shriek and refusing to withdraw her gaze from the spot where they last met her view," seems to show that he does not quite realise the character of Catherine Mompesson. Such women do not utter piercing shrieks; "theirs is the love which suffers in silence."

Having seen her children safely disposed of and out of harm's way, Catherine became the faithful and constant ally of her husband through all the scenes of suffering, desolation, and death which surrounded them on every side.

It was about this time, that is to say in the month of June, that either Mompesson or Stanley hit upon the extraordinary and heroic expedient of stamping out the plague in the village itself, and of suggesting to the villagers that they should sacrifice themselves to their neighbours by remaining in the place and cutting off all communication from without. Mompesson pointed out to them that unless this were done contagion might be spread far and wide; and there can be no doubt that it is entirely owing to the action then taken by the pastors and people of Eyam that Sheffield, Derby, and other towns in the North of England were not, like London, decimated by this appalling calamity.

That the influence of Mompesson or Stanley or both over the terror-stricken people must have been extraordinary is proved by the fact that there appears to have been little or no opposition to the carrying out of this most wise and most noble scheme.

When we think that it was little less than a whole community voluntarily and willingly risking their lives at the sacred call of duty, rather than carry suffering amongst their neighbours, it is strange indeed that not a single act of cowardice appears to have disgraced this band of heroes.

Mompesson having arranged his plan, the details were soon settled; an imaginary cordon was drawn round the village, over which no one was allowed to pass either from within or without. No goods of any kind were to be carried out of the village under any pretence whatever, and any articles which were required by the inhabitants of the village were to be left at certain specified places in the outskirts, and only removed by persons especially appointed for that purpose, and that only at stated hours of the day. Mompesson wrote to the Duke of Devonshire at Chatsworth, pointing out the necessity of carrying out this scheme, and obtained from his Grace at once the offer of such assistance as was necessary to the plan. Amongst other things it was arranged that such articles of food or clothing which were necessary should be deposited at certain fixed places on the extreme confines of the village, from which they could be removed by persons appointed for that purpose by Mompesson or Stanley, and from this time we may date the history of "the memorable woe." The plague spread with fearful rapidity; fifty-six victims fell beneath its stroke in the month of July. The passing bell was given over, the churchyard for the most part abandoned as a burial place, the church was closed, and Mompesson assembled the people for religious worship in a wild and desolate valley called "the Delf," where there exists a remarkable kind of natural archway or cavern, known as "Cucklet Church," from the entrance of which he read the prayers of the Church of England and preached to the people who sat about the place, partly within the cave and partly on the grass at its foot. Of course anything like trade or agriculture was abandoned, and it is said that hares and rabbits ran about the streets of the village. As August approached all thought of escape seems to have been given up by the wretched people, who simply sat down waiting for death, not knowing whose turn was to come next. The only person who seems to have had anything like an eye to business, at this time, was a hulking fellow called Marshal Howe, who went about burying the victims of the plague and rather treating the whole matter as a joke. When, however, at last his wife—to whom he appears to have been attached, rough as he was—died of the plague, he gave way to an extravagant outburst of grief; and when her death was followed by that of his son, his character became as gloomy as it had previously been merry.

The dead were buried within fields and woods surrounding the village, generally by their nearest relatives and friends; or when they had none Marshal Howe performed the office, taking as his pay the money, clothes, or other effects left in the house of the deceased. And now approaches the most fatal month of all, August, 1666. By the end of this month fully three-quarters of the inhabitants of Eyam had fallen beneath the terrible pestilence. Two families who lived a quarter of a mile from the village, in a place called Riley, were entirely destroyed, all but one person; and this shows how necessary was the isolation enforced by Mompesson; for although these people lived a quarter of a mile outside the village, on the top of a hill, in a most healthy situation, yet on the 6th of July, 1666, Bridget and Mary, the daughters of Richard and Catherine Talbot, were carried to the grave. They are said to have been very lovely girls, and were buried by their father's own hands, close to his house. He performed the same office, on the 7th, for the third and last of his daughters, on the 10th for his wife Catherine, on the 24th for his son Robert, and on the 25th he was himself buried by his only surviving son, who himself fell a victim to the terrible malady on the 30th, and was buried by one of the Hancocks. An old monument near the spot marks the place where they were buried. Having completely destroyed the Talbot family, the pestilence found its way into the adjoining house of the Hancocks. On the 3rd of August died John and Elizabeth, two children; on the 7th, Ona Hancock, and on the same day her husband William Hancock; on the 9th Alice, and on the 10th Ann Hancock. All of these are said to have been buried by the unfortunate mother, who, strangely enough, survived this terrible grief. Nor, alas! have we come to an end of the melancholy catalogue, for in the old register book, still kept at Eyam, we find, under the date August 25th, the following entry—"Katherine, ye wife of Mr. William Mompesson, Rec."

We will not attempt to describe this sad event in our own words, or to write a record of the virtues of Catherine Mompesson, but we will simply give a few extracts from the letter in which the afflicted husband announces the sad intelligence to his beloved children, for we feel that any words of ours would be weak and trivial, and any sentiments we might indulge in would be vapid and shallow, in comparison with the impression which will be conveyed to our readers by the perusal of this simple but touching narrative.

"Eyam, August 31st, 1666.

"Dear Hearts,—This brings you the doleful news of your dear mother's death—the greatest loss which ever befell you! I am not only deprived of a kind and loving comfort, but you also are deprived of the most indulgent mother that ever dear children had. But we must comfort ourselves in God with this consideration: that the loss is only ours, and that what is our sorrow is her gain. The consideration of her joys, which I do assure myself are unutterable, should refresh our drooping spirits.

"My dear hearts, your blessed mother lived a most holy life, and made a most comfortable and happy end, and is now invested with a crown of righteousness. I think it may be useful to you to have a catalogue of your dear mother's virtues, that the knowledge thereof may teach you to imitate her excellent qualities.

"In the first place let me recommend to you her piety and devotion, which were according to the exact principle of the Church of England. In the next place I can assure you she was composed of modesty and humility which did possess her dear soul in a most extraordinary manner. Her discourse was ever grave and meek, yet pleasant withal; a vaunting or immodest word was never heard to come from her mouth. Again, I can set out in her two other virtues—i.e., charity and frugality. She never valued anything she had when the necessities of a poor neighbour required it; but had a bountiful heart to all indigent and distressed persons. And, again, she was never lavish, but commendably frugal. She never liked tattling women, and abhorred the custom of going from house to house, thus wastefully spending precious time. She was ever busied in useful work, yet, though prudent, she was affable and kind. She avoided those whose company could not benefit her, and would not unbosom herself to such; still, she dismissed them with civility.

"Further I can assure you, my sweet babes, that her love to you was little inferior than to me, since why should she so ardently desire my continuance in this world of sorrows, but that you might have the protection and comfort of my life?

"Now I will give you an exact account of her death.

"For some time she had shown symptoms of a consumption, and was wasted thereby. Being surrounded by infected families, she doubtless got the infection from them; and her natural strength being impaired, she could not struggle with the disease which made her illness so very short. She showed much contrition for the errors of her past life, and often cried out, 'One drop of my Saviour's blood to save my soul!'

"At the beginning of her sickness she entreated me not to come near her, lest I should receive harm thereby; but, thank God, I did not desert her, but stood to my resolution not to leave her in her sickness, who had been so tender a nurse to me in her health. Blessed be God, that He enabled me to be so helpful and consoling to her, for which she was not a little thankful.

"A little before her dear soul departed (I was gone to bed) she sent for me to pray with her. I got up and went to her, and asked her how she did. The answer was, that she was looking when the good hour should come. Thereupon I prayed, and she made her responses, from the Common Prayer Book, as perfectly as in her health, and an 'Amen' to every pathetic expression. When we had ended the prayers for the sick, we used those from the Whole Duty of Man; and when I heard her say nothing, I said, 'My dear, dost thou mind?' She answered, 'Yes,' and it was the last word she spoke.

"My dear babes, the reading of this account will cause many a salt tear to spring from your eyes; yet let this comfort you—your mother is a saint in heaven. I could have told you of many more of your dear mother's excellent virtues, but I hope that you will not in the least question my testimony, if in a few words I tell you that she was pious and upright in her demeanour and conversation.

"Now to that blessed God, who bestowed upon her all 'those graces,' be ascribed all honour, glory, and dominion, the just tribute of all created beings, for evermore. Amen.

"WILLIAM MOMPESSEON."

That fatal August added seventy-seven deaths to the terrible roll of destruction. In September it sank to twenty-four; but when we think that over three-fourths of the inhabitants of this ill-fated village had already been carried to the grave, it is a frightful list. The first days of October showed little signs of abatement, for by the 10th it had carried off fourteen out of the few who had lived to that time. Suddenly, however, on the 11th of October the plague ceased, and has never since visited this country. So that the self-sacrifice of the people of Eyam not only saved the surrounding country from the awful visitation, but seems absolutely to have annihilated this terrible pestilence. How much do we not owe to these noble sufferers! But for their heroic conduct this most terrific of all maladies might still visit this land! But if we want to know what this sacrifice and this devoted heroism cost the little village, let us think over the following passages. The Rev. W. Mompesson, writing to a friend in November, 1666, says—

"The condition of the place has been so sad that I persuade myself it did exceed all history and example. Our town has become a Golgotha—the place of a skull; and had there not been a small remnant left we had been as Sodom and like Gomorrah. My ears never heard such doleful lamentations, my nose never smelled such horrid smells, and my eyes never beheld such ghastly spectacles. There have been seventy-six families visited within my parish, out of which 259 persons died. Now, blessed be God, all our fears are over, for none have died of the plague since the eleventh of October, and the pest houses have been long empty."

In the same letter Mompesson seems to upbraid himself for not having been sufficiently thankful to providence, and to look upon the loss of Catherine as a kind of judgment upon himself.

"Had I been as thankful as my condition did deserve, I might have had my dearest dear in my bosom; but now farewell all happy days, and God grant that I may repent my sad ingratitude."

We must, however, recollect that good and holy men always take a very severe view of their own shortcomings, and a most charitable and merciful view of those of others. It is natural enough that after losing such a wife as Catherine, Mompesson may have supposed that he had not been sufficiently grateful to God for the blessing of such a companion.

ART NEEDLEWORK.

By HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

FIG. 1.—WALL POCKET.

In this and successive papers on the subject of Art Needlework we hope to tell you much which will indirectly help your work for the forthcoming Art Needlework Competition, and at the same time show you how the result of your labour can be made up by yourselves into beautiful and useful articles for home decoration.

The wall pocket, Fig. 1, can be made in almost any material or colour you please. The sketch we give is taken from one of terra-cotta coloured plush and satin; the front part is of plush, having a spray of pale pink chrysanthemum embroidered on it. This it would be best to work in a frame, to avoid dragging the plush. The leaves should be done in shaded crewel—solidly, of course—and the flowers in such delicate shades of pink silk as will harmonise well with the plush; the lights must be picked out with white, and a few stitches of pale green silk should also accentuate the lights of the leaves. When taken from the frame, the back of this embroidered panel should be stiffened with embroidery paste; it is then mounted on a stout piece of millboard, and backed or lined with sateen; the piece forming the bottom of the pocket is covered on both sides with sateen (which can be got in all art shades, exactly matching the more costly material). The back is of satin, which matches the plush exactly in colour, and is gathered rather full on to its foundation of millboard. The three divisions are very carefully fitted and sewn together, and are edged with silk cord. Such a wall-pocket as this can be easily made by clever fingers in a few days. The cosy, of which we give a sketch in Fig. 2, is of olive-green velveteen—any scraps of velvet, serge, satin, and plush which you may happen to have by you can be utilised for this style of appliqué. The design must be traced rather shades are introduced in the leaves. The mount may be of brass, ebonised, or painted wood, if you are ambitious enough to attempt mounting it at home, which is quite possible with the aid of some deft carpentering; paint will be best. The work must be stiffened at the back with embroidery paste, and carefully nailed into a light frame which will fit into the mount; you must then back this frame with some suitable material; the mount can be made of deal, painted with Aspinall's enamel, in black, dead white, or some delicate colour. It will require three coatings; and if you paint smoothly, and rub over each coat, when perfectly dry, with pumice stone, the result will give exactly the same appearance as if the wood were enamelled, and we think the accomplishment throughout of so uncommon and dainty a piece of handi-smaller than it really is on the ground material, which must be stretched in a frame, corresponding leaves and fruit being traced on the scraps of plush and satin, etc., of the real size; these are carefully cut out and pinned in their places on the velveteen, with small pins, till the whole is arranged. The stems are then worked solidly and rather coarsely in shaded browns, outlined with Japanese gold thread; each leaf and apple is sewn down all round, the apples, which should if possible be of plush, or velvet of various shades, being raised by means of cotton wool inserted underneath; the leaves are of satin, from olive to the palest apple-green. The whole is outlined with Japanese gold thread, which is used also for the markings of both leaves and fruit. Both sides of the cosy can be treated in the same manner, and finished at the seam with a trimming of silk cord. It is an effective and truly "cosy"-looking article, which can be manufactured at home at very little expense.

Fig. 3 is a fire-screen, which shows a revival of a very old shape, and the design is an adaptation of an old style of needlework to match. The material, which must be stretched in a frame, is of cream-coloured silk, and the pattern is worked solidly in feather-stitch, in a variety of delicate shades of silk, no two flowers being the same colour. A great number of greens and dead-leaf work would be no small credit to the home-decorators.

"There is nothing new under the sun," and in Fig. 4 we believe our girls will recognise a modernised substitute for an old friend, not of their own, but of our grandmothers. We ourselves remember to have seen gorgeous objects covered with stripes of knitting in vivid hues, dangling by woollen cords and tassels from the backs of the easy chairs of a former generation, together with their contemporaries, the no less gorgeous and hideous "antimaccasars" of old; but modern culture has changed all this.

Nevertheless, the ugly little bolsters were comfortable, and consequently appear in a new form. The necessity of showing the design in our sketch makes its shape appear to be stiff, whilst the original is quite limp. The embroidered part is of Kirriemuir twill, on which the design of ox-eyed daisies is worked in outline only, with two shades of blue crewel, the centres of the flowers being filled up with French knots in dark blue.

The ends of the bolsters are of dark blue silk, drawn up with cord, and soft little plush balls to match. It has a cord to suspend it to the back of the chair, so that it is really a decorative substitute for the old abomination. Sateen might be used for the ends, which would be cheaper; but if you wish to make a really handsome one, this design could be as well worked solid and in natural colours, on silk sheeting, or any kind of soft silk.

Fig. 5 is drawn from a specimen of a wall-hanging in the South Kensington Museum. It is a pattern which could be so well and easily adapted for panels or wall-hangings in transposed appliqué, that we use it as an example. The original is silver brocade on crimson velvet.

By transposed appliqué, we mean that alternate inlaid and onlaid panels may be produced by the simple method of tracing the same pattern on two different materials, such as the crimson velvet and silver brocade of this wall-hanging; both patterns are cut out carefully, and the crimson pattern laid on the silver ground, whilst the silver is placed on the crimson. A very fine effect was thus produced by the Italians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, when wall-hangings and panels were so much used in the decoration of rooms.

The inlaid part is sewn down with thread; the edges are then covered with a couching of filoselle, or with fine cord; the onlaid panel is treated in much the same manner; the small details of both, such as the markings of leaves and flowers, high lights, or necessary bits of shading, are worked with stitches of silk on the surface of the appliqué after it is sewn down.

Much less costly material may be used for this style of work; it is both effective and durable when well done, and is easily and quickly accomplished. It may therefore be applied, with advantage, to many articles of domestic use, by the more clever and industrious of Our Girls.

REPORT ON THE MUSICAL COMPETITION.

ADJUDICATOR: SIR JOHN STAINER, Mus.D.

OUR readers may remember that in the report of the previous musical competition we urged girls to try their hands at composition, and not to be discouraged if their first attempts result in failure.

We repeat this admonition. Even those who are destined to be successful in this art may fail at first, composition requiring practice like everything else in the world. Then those who have not genius gain enormously in musicianship by trying to compose.

We will suppose a dozen girls of average ability are standing round our official desk. They are asked in turn whether they love music, and probably eleven out of twelve will answer "Yes." We do not believe this eleven girls out of twelve are not really lovers of music, and by a little cross-examination we discover that one only cares for modern dance measures, that another answers "yes" because she considers it "the thing" to affect a love for all the arts, while a third likes music only as a means of showing off her manipulative skill or good voice. To these we have nothing to say, but to the remaining eight we address a few remarks.

You girls love music. Why? Because it gives you certain sensations of pleasure which you find it difficult to define. It appeals to your senses, to your imagination, and to your intellect. Now music if bad can be an agent for evil; it can certainly appeal to bad passions, it may fill the imagination with frivolous ideas, it may not appeal at all to the intellect.

But you answer, "When we confessed to a love of music, we meant good music." Are you sure you can distinguish between good and bad music? When you are asked your opinion of a composition you look at the name of the composer and judge from that, and not from his production. You are brought up to revere certain names, and if you practise hard at certain good compositions, their beauty and subtle cleverness will after awhile reveal themselves to you, though at first you considered them dry. If you are to be musicians, you must be able to recognise good music, and the best means of learning to do this is to unravel the works of others (an important study pursued by all who wish to be composers), and attempt to create yourself.

If you are not able to recognise good music you are not musicians, and will not play as such, though your fingers be as supple and strong as Liszt's, and your dexterity is of a not much higher and eminently less useful order than that of a carpenter or plumber.

To this many may object, and remark that there are admirable performers who do not compose, and are they not musicians? Certainly they are. In order to be good players, in the judgment of musicians, it is necessary for us to understand the piece we perform, so that the various "points" may be brought out, that the composition shall be phrased, nay, more, that we shall impart something of our own individuality in our playing, treasure the thoughts of the composer and incase them, so to speak, in a framework of our own which does not alter the picture and yet is in itself a creation.

Yes, readers, it is undeniable that if we are to be good players we must understand something of music, and there is no better way of obtaining this knowledge than learning the science of music and trying to compose.

There were no bad manuscripts this time, and in one way this gave us pleasure; but it showed us that our advice had not been taken, viz., that those girls who had not attempted to compose should take this opportunity of making a commencement.

Do not enter these competitions only because you think it possible you may secure a prize! Let all our musical contributors take these opportunities of working at a noble study, and have the advantage of directing their attention to the form of composition which our very eminent and experienced examiner considers the best for them.

The following is the report of Sir John Stainer, our Adjudicator of the Prizes:—

It is always difficult to give an opinion on the relative merits of musical compositions which differ considerably in style and form. In the present case I have especially felt this difficulty. Some of the works submitted for competition showed considerable technical facility, but were wanting in interest; others seemed spontaneous and pleasing, but lacked originality; others, again, contained charming ideas badly brought together and presented in a form unsuited to the spirit of the instrument.

Having gone very carefully, indeed, through the pieces submitted to me, I award the first prize of Ten Guineas to Fanny Scholfield Petric, and the second prize of Five Guineas to Amelia Corper.

Miss Petric's composition runs smoothly; is thoroughly and naturally expressive of the feelings of joy and sorrow, and lies well under the hand of the performer. Its style is distinctly "Schumannesque."

Miss Corper's composition is slightly uneven in character: the first movement (sorrow) is most melodious, breathing the calm sweetness of Mendelssohn; but the second movement does not quite realise the idea of joy which would best contrast with the sorrow so lately depicted. The readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER will, however, be able to judge for themselves. Of one thing I am certain, both prize compositions will be welcomed.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XI.

EDNA HAS A GRIEVANCE.

ESSIE did not concern herself much about her friend's coldness. She had tried to atone to Richard for his sister's unkindness, and she had succeeded in giving one person pleasure.

"I daresay her conscience tells her that she has been naughty, and that makes her cross with me," thought Bessie, who was too healthy-minded to harbour unnecessary scruples. Hatty would have made herself wretched under the circumstances; would have accused herself of boldness, and love of display, and a want of consideration for Edna; for Hatty, who was a self-tormentor by nature, could spin a whole web of worries out of a single thread; but Bessie never troubled herself with morbid afterthoughts. "Edna will be all right with me to-morrow," she said to herself; and she was correct in her prognostication. Edna came downstairs the next morning radiant with good-humour, and was even civil to Richard. It was a brilliant day; her friends had all accepted her invitation, and she was looking forward to a most enjoyable afternoon.

It was impossible for Bessie to resist the influence of her friend's gaiety and flow of spirits. Edna's example was infectious, and Bessie was soon laughing heartily at her nonsensical speeches. There was no quiet for reading that morning. She had to practise tennis with Edna, and help her arrange the flowers; and finally she was carried off to be made smart.

"I wish you had a white dress too," observed Edna, regretfully; for in her heart she thought Bessie's favourite grey gown very dowdy and Quakerish. "But we must try to enliven you with a few flowers. You are going to wear a grey hat. Wait a moment." And Edna darted out of the room, and returned a moment afterwards with a dainty cream lace fichu. "Look, this lace is lovely! Mamma gave it to me, but I never wear it now; and it will just suit you. Now let me fasten in a few of those creamy roses. Well, you do look nice after all, Daisy dear."

"Yes; but not half so nice as you," replied Bessie, looking with honest admiration at the pretty young creature. Edna's soft white dress just suited her fair hair and delicate complexion, and she looked so slim and graceful, as she stood before the glass fastening a rosebud at her throat, that Bessie said, involuntarily, "How nice it must be to be so pretty!" but there was no trace of envy in her tone.

Edna blushed a little over the compliment.

"Do I look pretty? Thank you, Bessie. Isn't it a pity Neville cannot see me?" and she laughed mischievously over her vain speech. "Now, come along, there's a dear, or the people will arrive before we are ready for them. There, I declare I hear Florence's voice!" And the two girls ran down and joined Mrs. Sefton in the drawing-room.

Well, it was a very pleasant garden party, and Bessie thoroughly enjoyed herself, though it was the grandest affair she had ever seen—so many people driving up in their carriages, and such smart footmen lingering in the hall, and a bevy of officers who were quartered in the neighbourhood. But Bessie was not left out in the cold. Florence Atherton took her under her wing, and introduced some nice people to her. She even took part in one game when there was a vacancy, and her partner, a young lieutenant, was very good-natured, and only laughed when she missed the ball.

"We have won after all, you see," he observed, when the match was over.

"Yes, thanks to you," replied Bessie, honestly.

"Not at all. You played very well. Now shall we go and get an ice? I wonder what's become of Sefton! I don't see him anywhere."

"Oh, he is playing cricket at Melton. He is captain of the village club, I believe. I don't think he cares for tennis."

"I suppose not," was the dry rejoinder; but the young man slightly elevated his eyebrows in a meaning manner. Bessie heard other remarks on Richard's absence before the end of the afternoon. A young lady to whom she had been recently introduced addressed the same question to her.

"Mr. Sefton is not putting in an appearance this afternoon, Miss Lambert."

"No, I believe not; he is otherwise engaged."

"It is very odd," replied Miss Green, significantly; "but Mr. Sefton always is engaged when his sister gives one of her parties. I am told he hates society, and that sort of thing. Isn't it a pity that he should be so different from Edna? she is a darling, and so charming, but her brother——" and here Miss Green shrugged her shoulders; and her keen, black eyes seemed to demand Bessie's opinion; but Bessie made no rejoinder. She was not much prepossessed with Miss Green, and left her as soon as politeness allowed her, to sit with an old lady who was very chatty and amusing, and who called her "My dear" at every word.

It was no use trying to speak to Edna, she was always surrounded by a group of young people. Once or twice the thought crossed Bessie's mind, how Mr. Sinclair would like to see her laughing and talking so long with that handsome Captain Grant. She was not exactly flirting—Bessie would not do her that injustice, but she allowed him to pay her a great deal of attention. It struck her that Mrs. Sefton was uneasy, for she called her to her side once.

"My dear Miss Lambert, I cannot attract Edna's attention, and I want to speak to her particularly; she is somewhere in the shrubberies with that tall man with the dark moustache—Captain Grant. I spoke to her as she passed just now, but neither of them heard me."

"Shall I go and fetch her, Mrs. Sefton?"

"I shall be very glad if you will do so, my dear," and Bessie at once started in pursuit. She overtook them by the summer-house. Edna looked rather bored as she received her mother's message, though she at once obeyed it; but Captain Grant kept his place at her side.

Mrs. Sefton received him rather coldly.

"Edna," she said, addressing her daughter, "I want to speak to you about the Mackenzies; they are sitting quite alone, and no one is talking to them; and that tall brother of theirs has not played a single game."

"That is his own fault; I offered him Marian Atherton for a partner ages ago, but he plays badly; as for the girls, they keep aloof from everybody. I introduced Mr. Sayers and Major Sparkes to them, but they have evidently frightened them away. Mamma, are we engaged for Thursday? Because Captain Grant wants us to go and see the officers play polo."

"That is the day I am going up to town, Edna."

"But you can put it off," she interposed, eagerly. "It will be such fun. Mrs. Grant is to give us tea, and it will be such a treat for Bessie."

"My mother is counting upon the pleasure of seeing you all, Mrs. Sefton. She has been unable to call, but she is hoping to make your acquaintance in this way."

"She is very kind, Captain Grant," returned Mrs. Sefton, stiffly; "but unfortunately, as my daughter knows, I have a very important engagement for that day."

"I am extremely sorry to hear it; still, if the young ladies care to drive over, my mother will chaperone them," persisted Captain Grant; "or perhaps their brother."

"Oh, of course, I forgot Richard," exclaimed Edna, disregarding her mother's evident objections. Mrs. Sefton looked annoyed, but she said civilly—

"I will see what Richard thinks, but you must not take anything for granted, Edna, until I have spoken to him."

"Oh, I will tease him into taking us," returned Edna, gaily. "I do love polo, and I am sure Bessie will be delighted. Now we must start another game, Captain Grant." And before her mother could interpose, Edna had crossed the lawn with him.

"Shall you be very disappointed if you do not see polo, Miss Lambert?" asked Mrs. Sefton, presently.

"No, indeed. But I am afraid Edna will be; she seems to have set her heart on going."

"Richard will not take her," returned Mrs. Sefton; "he has a strong objection to Captain Grant; and I must own I think he is right. He is very handsome, but he has not a straightforward look. I have no wish to see him intimate here. He is forward and pushing, and does not take a rebuff. But Edna does not agree with me," with a quick, impatient sigh.

Captain Grant's unfortunate invitation entirely marred the harmony of the evening. Directly the guests had left, the family sat down to a cold collation, instead of a regular dinner. Richard had only just come in, and taken his place, declaring that he was as hungry as a hunter, when Edna informed him of their plans for Thursday.

"Mamma has to go up to town, so she cannot possibly go with us, and the carriage will have to fetch her from the station, so you must drive us over to Staplehurst in your dogcart, Ritchie. I daresay Bessie will think that fun."

Richard glanced uneasily at his step-mother before he answered, as though he wished for her opinion, and she gave him a significant look.

"I am very sorry, Edna, but I am afraid it is impossible. I have to go over to Fordham on business, and I cannot possibly be back until six."

"On some stupid farming business I suppose," returned Edna, and it was evident her temper could ill brook the contradiction. Her colour rose, and there was an ominous sparkle in her eye, but Richard answered, composedly—

"Yes, I have to meet Medway and Stephenson. I am sorry to disappoint you and Miss Lambert, but Thursday is never a free day with me."

"No, indeed, nor any other day of the week when I want you to do anything," returned Edna, with rising excitement. "Now don't make any more excuses, Richard; do you think I am a child to believe in your Medways and Stephensons? I saw you look at mamma before you answered, and you think she does not wish me to go."

"My darling, why need you excite yourself so?"

"It is you that excite me, mamma, you and Richard. You have got some foolish notion in your heads about Captain Grant, just because the poor man is civil to me. You treat me, both of you, as though I were a baby—as though I could not be trusted to take care of myself; it is very unjust," continued Edna, "and I will not bear it from Richard."

"I confess I don't see the gist of your remarks," returned her brother, who was now growing angry in his turn; "and I don't think all this can be very amusing to Miss Lambert. If my mother has an objection to your keeping up an acquaintance with Captain Grant, it is your duty to give the thing up. In my opinion she is right; he is not the sort of friend for you, Edna, and his mother is disliked by all the officers' wives. I should think Sinclair would have a right to object to your frequent visits to Staplehurst." But Edna was in no mood to listen to reason.

"Neville knows better than to state his objections to me," she returned, haughtily; "and it is quite unnecessary to drag his name into the present conversation. I will only trouble you to answer me one question. Do you absolutely refuse to do me this favour, to drive Miss Lambert and me over to Staplehurst on Thursday?"

"I must refuse," returned Richard, firmly. "It is quite true that my engagement can be put off, but it is so evident that my mother objects to the whole thing that I will not be a party to your disobeying her wishes."

Edna rose from the table and made him a profound curtsy.

"Thank you for your moral lecture, Richard; but it is quite thrown away. I am not going to be controlled like a child. If you will not take us, Bessie and I will go alone. I quite mean it, mamma." And Edna marched angrily out of the room.

"Oh dear," observed Mrs. Sefton, fretfully; "I have not seen her so put out for months; it must have been your manner, Richard. You were so hard on the poor child. Now she will go and make herself ill with crying."

"Did I misunderstand you?" asked Richard, astonished at this. "Did you wish me to take them, after all?"

"Of course not; what an absurd question. I would not have Edna go for worlds. Neville only said the other day how much he disliked the Grants, and how he hoped Edna kept them at a distance. I think he has heard something to Captain Grant's disadvantage; but you know how wilful she is, you might have carried your point with a little tact and finesse, but you are always so clumsy with Edna."

"You did not help me much," returned Richard, rather bitterly. "You left me to bear the brunt of Edna's temper, as usual. Why did you not tell her yourself your reasons for disliking her to go? But no; I am to be the scapegoat, as usual, and Edna will not speak to me for a week." And so saying he pushed his chair away and walked to the window.

Mrs. Sefton did not answer her stepson. Most likely her conscience told her that his reproach was a just one. She only glanced at Bessie's grieved face and downcast eyes, and proposed to retire.

The drawing-room was empty when they entered it, and as Bessie noticed Mrs. Sefton's wistful look round the room she said, timidly—

"May I go and talk to Edna?"

"No, my dear, far better not," was the reply. "Edna has a hot temper; she takes after her poor father in that. We must give her time to cool. I will go to her myself presently. She was very wrong to answer Richard in that way, but he has so little tact."

Bessie did not trust herself to reply. She took her book to the window that her hostess might not find it incumbent on her to talk, and in a short time Mrs. Sefton left the room. Richard entered it a moment later.

"Are you alone?" he asked, in some surprise. "I suppose my mother has gone up to Edna."

"Yes, she is uneasy about her. Shall I play to you a little, Mr. Sefton? It is getting too dark to read." Bessie made this overture as a sort of amends to Richard, and the friendly little act seemed to soothe him.

"You are very kind; I should like it of all things," he returned, gratefully. So Bessie sat down and played her simple tunes and sang her little songs until the young man's perturbed spirits were calmed and quieted by the pure tones of the girlish voice, and presently, when she paused for a minute, he said—

"It is awfully good of you to take all this trouble for me."

"Oh, no it is not," replied Bessie, smiling. "I like singing; besides, you are feeling dull this evening; your talk with your sister has upset you."

"No one ever noticed before if I were dull or not," he replied, with a sigh; "but I am afraid that sounds ungracious. I think we owe you an apology, Miss Lambert, for airing our family disagreements in your presence. I am more sorry than I can say that you should have been subjected to this unpleasantness."

"Oh, never mind me," returned Bessie, cheerfully. "I am only sorry for all of you. I daresay Edna did not mean half she said; people say all sorts of things when they are angry. I am afraid she is bitterly disappointed. I have heard her say before how fond she is of watching polo; but I daresay she will soon forget all about it."

"I cannot flatter myself with that belief. Edna does not so easily forget when her whims are crossed. I daresay she will send me to Coventry all the week, but I can't help that. Nothing would induce me to drive her over to Staplehurst, and she will hardly carry out her threat of going without me."

"Of course not." And Bessie fairly laughed.

"No, it was an idle threat; but all the same it is very vexatious." But Bessie would not let him dwell on the grievance. She began telling him about Tom, and a funny scrape he had got into last term; and this led to a conversation about her home, and here Bessie grew eloquent; and she was in the midst of a description of Cliffe and its environs when Mrs. Sefton reappeared, looking fagged and weary, and informed them that Edna had a headache and had retired to bed.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MUSIC.

MARTHA.—The limits of the human voice, as allowed for by composers, includes four octaves, counting from the highest note of a soprano voice, down to the lowest of the bass. The ordinary compass is about twelve tones only, though many take in two octaves and upwards, and some have even taken in three and a half, as did, for example, the voice of Catalani. The love and cultivation of music in some form, taking into our calculation the mere strumming on a banjo, or producing a popular air on an accordion, has greatly increased of late years, and it is computed that even amongst the poorer classes about four per cent. of the people play some instrument; while amongst the middle and upper classes the average amounts to twenty-four per cent.

LOVER OF MUSIC.—The most ancient song or piece of music of which we have any record would seem to be Lino's "Song of Complaint," which was common to both the Egyptians and the Greeks, but of which we do not know the tune. The most ancient music still in existence appears to be the Hebrew "Blessing of the Priests," which was sung in the Temple at Jerusalem, and is still used in the Spanish and Portuguese synagogues. The chant originally in use for the Te Deum Laudamus of St. Gregory the Great dates from the end of the sixth century.

MISCELLANEOUS.

B.H. sends us a prose account of a Welsh church, "hoping we will see fit to insert it in our columns." This little sketch is well written, and shows considerable skill in the description of scenery. The young writer may feel encouraged to "try again," we think, and will perhaps arrive at something worth having.

DEAF.—You had better go and see the appliance which you desire to obtain for the aid of your hearing. There is a little silver tube which can be put into the ear, and does not protrude beyond the orifice. Some feel it irksome to be worn; and it would need careful fitting, and to be tried for a few days before purchasing it.

E. SHIRKS.—To know anyone "by the cut of his jib" is a seafaring phrase.

FAN.—Perhaps carbolio soap obtained at a chemist's might suit the state of your teeth, and we should think, some stopping by a dentist.

BUFF.—You must obtain permission of the author before you may translate and publish any work. Foreign authors are protected for a period of two years, and then they may be translated. We could not tell you what the painting of a fan or tambourine would fetch.

NELLS.—The longest word in the English language is always said to be the name of Henry Carey's Burlesque Comedy, "Chrononhotonthologos"; it is the name of the hero and king.

A CONSTANT READER.—The Old Testament was originally written in Hebrew, with the exception of the books of Ezra and Daniel, and these were written in Chaldee. With reference to the Holy Gospels, St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew (or the then spoken Syriac), and the MS. was shortly afterwards translated into Greek, but by whom appears to be a disputed point. St. Athanasius ascribes it to St. James "the Just," but another ancient writer (Theophylact) says it was reported to have been done by St. John. The Gospel according to St. Mark was written in Latin; while those by St. Luke and St. John were in Greek.

POLLY-WOG (Melbourne).—Your verses are sadly irregular. You should count the feet in every line, and keep the beat to a special syllable in each line. It should never be changed. You write well when reduced to the smallest size, that in which you transcribed your little poem.

E. P. and O.—You should write to one or more of the great shipping agencies, such as the Allan's of Liverpool (James Street). The rules and regulations in reference to the engagement of a stewardess differ somewhat in the several companies.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER.—Do not watch for results in teaching the children; leave that with Him for whom you work. Remember the words about the planting and watering, followed by the reminders, "but God giveth the increase." Be persevering in your own duty, however "uphill" the work may be, and many the discouragements. Missionaries have laboured for many years without the comfort of seeing any "results," and suddenly their hopes were realised. The prophet Isaiah made a similar complaint to your own (see chapter xlix. 4.) "Then I said, I have laboured in vain; I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain; yet surely my judgment was by the Lord, and my work with my God."

ISMENE, EUTERPE, ANTIGONE.—You send us no less than nine specimens of quick writing in Greek, English, and French, the quickest writers of all accomplishing the transcription of as many as forty-four words in one minute. This is certainly above the average. We have only timed two writers (both authors) much practised in the use of the pen; but they did not attain to your example of speed. Perhaps they are rather slow writers, and scarcely fair examples to show our average speed in this country, still we imagine that you write rather faster than we do. Your English is excellent; and we think your writing is the best. We were amused to observe your friends' acquaintance with our old Nursery Rhymes!

NINNIE.—We thank you for your kind letter. The 6th July, 1866, was a Monday.

A LANCASHIRE LASS and EMILY K. have sent us examples of "poetry," or rather attempts at rhyming prose. We never discourage these girlish attempts, for we know they afford a healthy vent to feelings and sentiments which they would confide to no one, and which become more moderate and sensible when they see the light of day expressed on paper. But our girls must bear in mind that the past masters of poetry were also the best and most careful of workers. Lately, in an Italian library, there has been found a sonnet of Ariosto's of twenty lines, re-written sixteen times, with continual changes of words and expressions, until it reached the degree of perfection which satisfied the writer's cultivated ear. We wish some of our would-be poetesses would take the same pains, and see what the result would be.

KENLEA.—We suppose your question to be merely a silly undignified joke, one of those "jestings which are not convenient." Could any really respectable girl inquire whether it would be "a correct thing for a young lady to go for a day's excursion with a young unmarried gentleman, to whom she was only introduced on the previous day"? She ought to be ashamed of herself.

UNHAPPY ONE.—The nearest answer to your question given in the Bible is the command, "Pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you." We cannot give you a cure for shortness of stature, but we can recommend you gymnastic exercises, in moderation, as conducive to health. Beware of using dumb-bells too heavy for your size and strength.

FAVORITA.—You should consult the clergyman who has been preparing you for confirmation, as to the dress agreed upon for the rest of the young people to be confirmed with you; it should not be a matter of your own private choice. White caps may be worn, not veils. In any case, the plainer the dress the better, as it is not an occasion for display. 2. A gargle of a solution of powdered alum and water might be of service to you, or tannin lozenges.

LUCY HOPE.—The misfortune respecting your nose might possibly be remedied by the use of the machine to which you refer; but it should have been employed before, as you are old enough to have ceased growing. Still, we do not wish to discourage you.

S. S. TEACHER.—It is said that the gifts of the "wise men," or Magi of the East, were symbolic offerings, acknowledging Him as "King" by the gold; "God" by the frankincense, and "Man" by the myrrh.

IN SEARCH OF HEALTH.—We imagine that you need a dry, bright, cheerful, bracing place, and think that the "High Level" at Upper Norwood is likely to suit you well.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FIRST SUNDAY AT THE GRANGE.

THE unfortunate dispute between Edna and her brother had taken place on Saturday evening, and as Bessie went up to her room that night she made up her mind that the first Sunday at Oatlands would be a failure, as far as enjoyment was concerned.

"I never can be happy myself unless I see others happy round me," thought Bessie, rather mournfully; "and Edna has taken this disappointment so badly that I am afraid she will make us all suffer for it." But in this opinion she was wrong. Her acquaintance with Edna had been brief, and she had no suspicion of the intense pride that blended with Edna's wilfulness, nor of the tenacity, strange in such a bright young creature, that could quietly maintain its purpose, under a careless, light-hearted exterior.

Edna had evidently been ashamed of her outburst of temper on the previous evening, for she came down on Sunday morning looking a little pale and subdued, and very gentle in her manner to her mother and Bessie. She seemed to ignore Richard; beyond a cold good morning, she did not vouchsafe him a word or look; and as all his overtures towards reconciliation were passed over in chilling silence, he soon left her to herself. They all went to church together, and as they walked through the lanes Edna seemed to recover her buoyancy. She laughed and chatted with her mother, and made sprightly speeches in her usual way; and no one could have judged from her manner that there was a spot of bitterness under the smooth surface—an angry consciousness that Richard had dared to cross her will.

Ah, well! there are many beside Edna who enter God's house with their darling sin hugged close to their bosom, fondled and cherished as their dearest foe. Truly we may say we are miserable sinners, and that there is no health in us, for the black plague spot is often hidden under the white vesture, undetected by human insight, but clearly legible to the "Eye that seeth not as man seeth."

Once Bessie looked up from her hymn book, as Edna's clear, high notes reached her ear. Edna seemed singing with all her heart, "Oh, Paradise! Oh, Paradise! who does not crave for rest?" Her brown eyes were soft with feeling, there was a sweet, almost angelic look upon her face; a passing emotion possessed her. Alas, that such moods should be transitory! And yet it has ever been so in the world's history. Unsanctified human nature is always fickle, and the "Hosanna" of yesterday becomes the "Crucify Him" of to-day.

After their early luncheon, Edna asked Bessie if she would go with her to see the Athertons.

"Mamma indulges in a nap on Sunday afternoon," she explained, "and as I am not fond of my own company, I run in and have a chat with the girls."

"If you would excuse me," returned Bessie, looking rather uncomfortable, "I should so much rather stay at home. You see I have been accustomed to spend Sunday very quietly. We have never paid visits, as some people do. Church and Sunday-school and a little sacred music and reading, and the day soon passes. If you do not mind, I would rather sit in the garden, or take a stroll through those lovely lanes, than go to the Athertons."

Edna looked exceedingly amused at this speech, and at Bessie's hot cheeks.

"My dear Daisy, don't look so perturbed. This is Liberty Hall, and our guests always do exactly as they please. I would not interfere with your little prudish ways for the world. I do not require your company in the least. You may retire to your own room and read the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' with the blinds down if you please, and mamma and I will not say a word. There are 'Blair's Sermons' in the attic, and 'Hervey's Meditations among the Tombs.' They are a bit dusty, perhaps, but you won't object to that, for they are full of wholesome and cheerful reading."

"Thank you," returned Bessie, undisturbed by this light banter. "But I brought a book from home, in which I am much interested—Bishop Hannington's life—and as you are so good as to spare me, I mean to explore some of those shady lanes; they are so nice and quiet."

Edna was about to make another mischievous rejoinder, but as she looked at Bessie she refrained. Bessie's contented gentle expression, the quiet dignity that seemed to invest her girlishness, closed Edna's mouth.

"She is a good little thing, and I won't tease her," she thought. And she refrained with much magnanimity from one of her droll speeches when Maud Atherton asked where Miss Lambert was.

"She preferred taking a walk," returned Edna, which was the truth, but not the whole truth, for, as she said to herself, "Those girls shall not have the chance of laughing at my dear little Bessie." And she cleverly changed the conversation to a safer topic; for she was quite a diplomatist in her small way.

"Edna is really very good-natured," thought Bessie, gratefully, as she sauntered happily through the leafy lanes.

How delicious the air felt. It was June, and yet there was still the crispness of the spring. She felt as though she and the birds had this beautiful world to themselves, and the twitterings and rustlings in the thicket were the only sounds that broke the Sabbath stillness.

Bessie had just turned into a sunny bit of road when an abject-looking white dog with a black patch over his eye suddenly wriggled himself through a half-closed gate.

"Why, I do believe that is Bill Sykes," thought Bessie, as the creature stood looking at her. "Bill, what are you doing so far from home?" Bill wagged his tale feebly in a deprecating manner. "Why don't you walk like a gentleman," continued Bessie, and, to her great amusement, the dog rose solemnly on his hind legs and commenced stalking down the lane. Bessie burst into a laugh that was echoed by another voice.

"Well done, old Bill." And looking up Bessie saw Richard Sefton leaning on the gate with his dogs round him. "Don't move, Miss Lambert," he continued hastily; "stand where you are till I join you." And as Bessie looked rather surprised at this peremptory speech he walked quickly to her side and put his hand on her shoulder. "A friend, Leo. Excuse my unceremoniousness, Miss Lambert, but Leo needs an introduction," and at his words a huge mastiff, who had been eyeing Bessie in a dubious manner, walked quietly up to her.

"Will it be safe for me to pat him?" asked Bessie, as she looked at the big tawny head and heavy jowl of the magnificent beast; but the brown sunken eyes had a friendly expression in them.

"Oh, yes, Leo will be as quiet as a lamb, and what is more, he will never forget you. You may go within the reach of his chain any day, and he will behave to you like a gentleman. Leo is an aristocrat, and never forgets noblesse oblige."

"He is a splendid animal," returned Bessie, and then she noticed the other dogs. They were all there; Gelert and Brand, and Juno and her puppies, and Spot and Tim.

"We have been for a long walk," observed Richard, as they turned their faces homeward. "The dogs have been wild with spirits, and I had some difficulty with them at first. You see they make the most of their weekly holiday."

"What do you do on a wet Sunday?" asked Bessie, curiously.

"Well, I smoke a pipe with them in the stable, and so give them the pleasure of my company. I do hate disappointing dumb animals, Miss Lambert—they have their feelings as much as we have, and I think we ought to behave handsomely to them. I remember when I was quite a little fellow my mother taught me that."

"Your mother!" in some surprise, for somehow Mrs. Sefton never gave Bessie the impression that her relations with Richard were of the motherly sort.

"Oh, I mean my own mother," he returned, hastily, as though answering her unspoken thought. "I was very young when she died, but I have never forgotten her. She was not a lady by birth, you know; only a farmer's or yeoman's daughter, but there is not a lady living who is prettier or sweeter than she was."

"I am glad you feel like that to your mother," replied Bessie, in a sympathetic voice that seemed to ask for further confidence. Richard Sefton had never spoken of his mother to anyone before. What could have drawn the beloved name from his lips? Was it this girl's soothing presence, or the stillness of the hour and the quiet beauty of the scene round him? Richard was impressionable by nature, and possibly each of these things influenced him. It was a new pleasure to speak to a kindly listener of the memories that lay hidden in his faithful heart.

"Yes, and yet I was a mere child when I lost her," he went on, and there was a moved look on his face; "but I remember her as plainly as I see you now. She was so young and pretty—everyone said so. I remember once when I was lying in my little cot one night, too hot and feverish to sleep, that she came up to me in her white gown—it was made of some shining stuff, silk or satin—and she had a sparkling cross on her neck. I remember how it flashed in my eyes as she stooped to kiss me, and how she carried me to the window to look at the stars. ‘Are they not bright, Ritchie?’ she said; ‘and beyond there is the great beautiful heaven, where my little boy will go some day,’ and then she stood rocking me in her arms. I heard her say quite plainly, ‘Oh, that I and my little child were there now.’ And as she spoke something wet fell on my face. I have heard since that she was not happy—not as happy as she ought to have been, poor mother.”

“And is that all you can remember?” asked Bessie, gently.

“Oh, no; I have many vague recollections of making daisy chains with my mother on the lawn; of a great yellow cowslip ball flung to me in an orchard; of a Sunday afternoon, when some pictures of Samuel, and David and Goliath were shown me; and many other little incidents. Children do remember, whatever grown-up people say.”

“I think it would be terrible to lose one’s mother, especially when one is a child,” observed Bessie, in a feeling voice.

“I have found it so, I assure you,” replied Richard, gravely. “My stepmother was young, and did not understand children—boys especially. I seemed somehow in the way to everyone but my father. A lonely childhood is a sad thing; no success nor happiness in after life seems to make up for it.”

“I understand what you mean; father always says children claim happiness as a right.”

“It is most certainly their prerogative; but I fear I am boring you with my reminiscences.”

“Not at all; you are giving me a great pleasure, Mr. Sefton. I do like knowing about people—their real selves I mean, not their outside: it is so much more interesting than any book. I think, as a rule, people shut themselves up too much, and so they exclude light and sympathy.”

“One longs for sympathy sometimes,” said Richard; but he turned away his face as he spoke.

“Yes, everyone needs it, and most of us get it,” replied Bessie, feeling very sorry for the young man in her heart. He was too manly and too generous to complain openly of his stepmother’s treatment, but Bessie understood it all as well as though he had spoken.

“In a large family there is no complaint to be made on this score. When I have a grievance there is always mother or Hatty, or Christine, and father. We take all our big things to father. Oh, at home no one is left out in the cold.”

“I think your home must be a happy one, Miss Lambert—but here we are at The Grange. I must bid you good-bye for the present, for I have an errand in the village.” But Richard did not explain that his errand was to sit with a crippled lad, whose life of suffering debared him from all pleasure. If there were one person in the world whom Bob Rollton adored it was “the young Squire.” “He is a real gentleman, he is,” Bob would say; “and not one of your make-believe gentry. It is all along of him and Spot and the little ‘un, Tim, that I don’t hate Sundays; but he comes reg’lar, does the Squire; and he brings some rare good books with him; and Tim curls himself up on my blanket, and Spot sits on the window-sill making believe to listen, and we have a good old time.” Other people beside Bob could have cited instances of the young Squire’s thoughtfulness and active benevolence; but Richard Sefton was one who did good by stealth, and almost as though he were ashamed of it, and neither his stepmother nor Edna guessed how much he was beloved in the village. Mrs. Sefton was one of those people who never believed in virtue, unless it had the special hall-mark that conventionality stamps upon it, and Richard’s simple charities, his small self-denials would have appeared despicable in her eyes. She herself gave largely to the poor at Christmas; blankets and clothing by the bale found their way to the East-end. The vicar of Melton called her “the benevolent Mrs. Sefton,” but she and Edna never entered a cottage, never sat beside a sick bed, or smoothed a dying pillow. Edna would have been horrified at such a suggestion. What had her bright youth to do with disease, dirt, and misery? “Don’t tell me about it,” was her usual cry, when any one volunteered to relate some piteous story. That such things should be allowed in a world governed by a merciful Providence was incredible, terrible, but that she should be brought into contact with it was an offence to her ladylike judgment. Many a girl has thought like Edna Sefton, and yet a Royal Princess could enter a squalid cottage, and take the starving babe to her bosom; and from that day to this Princess Alice has been a type of loving womanhood.

Edna had not returned from the Athertons’ when Bessie entered the house, so she went alone to the evening service. As the service was at half-past six, an informal meal was served at a quarter past eight, to allow the servants to attend church. Bessie was rather surprised at this mark of thoughtfulness, but she found out afterwards that Richard had induced his stepmother, with some difficulty, to give up the ceremonious late dinner. She urged as an objection that neither she nor Edna ever attended the evening service; but he overruled this, and carried his point.

Just before service commenced, Bessie was surprised to see him enter the church. She had no idea that he would come, but he told her afterwards that it was his usual practice. Just as they were starting for their homeward walk they were joined by a cousin of the Athertons. Bessie had seen her the previous day. She was a fair, interesting-looking girl, dressed in deep mourning. Her name was Grace Donnerton. Richard seemed to know her well. He had evidently waited for her to overtake them, and they all walked on happily together.

Bessie was much taken with her. She was the daughter of a clergyman, who had a large parish in Leeds, and she interested Bessie very much in her account of her own and her sisters’ work. They had lately lost their mother, and it was surprising to hear of the way in which those young creatures helped their father in his good work.

“When any one is ill, we generally help to nurse them,” Grace had said, quite simply. “There are so many of us, that we can easily be spared, and we are so fond of our poor people. We have all attended ambulance lectures, and Lizzie, that is my eldest sister, is now training for a year at a hospital. She is very strong, and so fond of nursing, and she hopes to be very useful when she comes home. There are five of us, and we take turns in being papa’s housekeeper. Emma, who is very clever, manages the mothers’ meeting, and the rest of us do district work.”

Bessie was so interested by all this, that she was sorry when the walk drew to a close. After they had said good-bye to Miss Donnerton, Bessie said, “What a nice girl! I am sure I should like to know more of her.”

“Yes, I knew she would be your sort; that is why I waited for her,” replied Richard, as he opened the gate.

Bessie wondered over this speech as she ran up to her room. “‘My sort!’ what could he have meant by that?” she said to herself. “I only wish I were like Miss Donnerton, for I am sure she is sweet and good. Well, it has been a lovely day. I have not wished myself at home once. Now I must devote myself to Edna.”

Edna looked a little tired and bored, and Bessie did not find it easy to interest her. She appeared to be quite indifferent to Miss Donnerton’s merits.

“Oh, Grace! so you like her, do you? Well, I must confess she is too good for me. I never found her say anything interesting yet, but then I did not talk to her about poor people,” and Edna sneered slightly in a ladylike way. “I think all the girls were relieved when she went to church, for we could not get her to talk about anything.”

Yes, Edna was decidedly impracticable that evening. She would not be induced to play or sing; she was not in the humour for sacred music; no, she did not want to read; and everything was slow and stupid.

Bessie coaxed her into the garden at last, and the soft evening air refreshed her in spite of herself.

“Don’t you ever feel ennuyée and horrid?” she asked, in a sort of apologetic manner, presently.

“Oh, yes, I suppose so; at least, I don’t quite know what you mean,” returned Bessie; but she was not thinking of the question. The stars were glittering overhead, and Richard Sefton’s words recurred to her. How clearly she could see it all. The little lonely boy in his cot, the young mother coming up to soothe him. She could picture her so plainly in the white shining gown and the sparkling cross, with the tears falling on the child’s face. “Oh, that I and my little child were there now.” Oh, how sad it all sounded; and she had gone and not taken the boy with her. “Poor Mr. Sefton,” thought Bessie, as she recalled the sad, quiet tones and the moved look on Richard’s face.

POULTRY KEEPING :

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

PART III.
FEEDING AND FOOD.

SINCE proper feeding of fowls is an absolute necessity for success in poultry keeping, this question must be most seriously considered. It is really quite depressing to think of the thousands of hens in this country that are daily being hopelessly mismanaged in this matter. These unfortunates are fed on anything and everything, and often on nothing. They pick up what they can one day, and are given far too much the next to make up for it, no one for a moment considering that for a hen to produce eggs, feathers, etc., she must be regularly given the proper materials for doing so.

I went one day in the early spring to see some hens belonging to a lady who never went near them. These hens were taken care of by an old man who has had long experience, but who still had much to learn. It is sad to think, by the bye, that all I am now writing may be considered nonsense fifty years hence. But to return to the old man. I asked him how the hens were doing.

"Eh, badly miss, badly!" was his reply.

I asked him when he fed them and what he gave them, and he told me that he fed them regularly at three o'clock in the afternoon on Indian corn. I suggested that three o'clock was rather early, and that perhaps the hens might like a change; but he did not seem to see it, and said—

"No, no, they get now't but Indian corn, and never a bite after three o'clock; never a bite."

I interfered no further, but wondered how hens could possibly be expected to be prolific layers on such fat-forming diet, besides being allowed to fast sixteen hours at least. Let us hope when the breakfast did come that it was one of good hot nourishing meal.

To keep fowls in good health in close confinement needs a great deal more care and thought than when they have a large grass range, for confined fowls have none of the resources of their more fortunate brethren and sisters, who not being at the mercy of their keepers can wander round, picking up worms to eat and grit to grind with, and herbal medicines to counteract all the bad effects from the ignorance of their feeder.

So no hens must be kept in confinement, for their own sakes or for the sake of their owners, unless they are to be well and thoughtfully cared for. A good poultry feeder must be thorough, regular, economical, and must above all things use all the common sense she possesses.

As we are at present only thinking about adult birds kept for laying, and not about chickens which require quite different treatment, let us consider when fowls should be fed.

A hen, like any of my readers, requires its meal at as regular intervals as possible, not allowing too long fasts, and yet not cramming a lot of meals into too short a space of time.

The first meal, consisting of soft food, hereafter described, should be given as early in the morning as possible, for poultry awake early, as anyone will know who sleeps within sound of a cock's melodious voice.

In summer, if hens have a grass range, they will take no harm first thing in the morning, but will wander off enjoying a splendid harvest of animal life, returning still, however, with unabated zeal for their breakfast.

As it is difficult in most households to get hot food before breakfast, when the kitchen fire is so fully occupied, it is well if the hens are closely confined to put a little corn in their run over-night; and if you can put it in such a position that the hens can fly up to it, but so that the mice cannot reach it, all the better. Always keep a separate pan devoted to the hens, in which request the cook to put all scraps, potato peelings, bits of pudding, odd drops of milk, etc.

If these scraps are well boiled the evening before, and placed on the kitchen fire next day, immediately after the household breakfast is served, they will then be hot and ready afterwards for pouring into either a tin or earthenware dish, and mixing with warm meal.

Comparatively few people mix their poultry food properly. Some throw out a moist, sticky mess, and others throw odd scraps to their hens, big and little together, so that as most hens have the deplorable tendency of grasping at the biggest, the result of such feeding is a rushing, scrambling, bolting and choking sad to witness.

All scraps must be cut into small pieces and mixed with dry meal until they form a "short," firm lump, that will break in pieces when thrown on to the ground; it must neither be doughy nor sticky, nor must it be so dry as to crumble and waste the meal. Having mixed the food quickly, the poultry feeder is ready to sally forth, clad in apron, warm shawl, hat and strong boots; for she must never catch cold, else she will not be able to attend to her duties.

As soon as she nears the yard, and a hen so much as hears a step on the path or a gate creak, or catches sight of a bit of her dress, as surely will that hen run, and in running cause the rest to run, until the feeder stands a truly gratified spectator of an appreciated feast.

Now is the time, if she can tear herself away from their sight, to fill up the water jar, which must first be well rinsed out. Then she must remove all droppings from the hen house, which must be put into a barrel kept for the purpose, and will form excellent garden manure if kept dry, and should be paid for at the rate of about 2s. 6d. per hundredweight.

The eggs laid before breakfast should be collected, and any that have dropped from the perch be cleared away, as broken eggs always cause egg-eating hens.

I should have said that the food must be thrown upon the ground, if clean and dry, otherwise it must be placed in a tin trough, which must be kept scrupulously clean.

It should always be carefully noticed when the hens have had plenty, as an over-feed is very injurious to health and laying, the great rule being never to give hens more than they will eagerly run for. If they become in the least less eager, and begin one by one to walk off, leaving only a persevering few, take the food away at once, and don't mix quite so much next time. To over-feed fowls is a great temptation which must be strenuously avoided by young beginners.

In the cold winter months I keep my hens shut up in their nice dry house for an hour or so after breakfast, which gives them a quiet opportunity for digesting their food in the warmth. I also give them hot water to drink, which latter is a great help to them.

Laying hens must always be kept supplied with clean water, as it is quite surprising what a quantity they drink. Six hens would require at least a quart daily.

If the hens have a grass run they will need no more attention until their evening meal, which must consist of some hard grain; and, as in the morning, no more must be given than the hens will eagerly run for. It has been given as a rule that a woman's handful, taken with the palm of the hand downwards, is a good allowance per head. I have found this plan answer fairly well, but as hens differ so much in size it cannot be taken absolutely. The time of the evening meal must vary with the sun, but the rule is to give as late as possible, allowing twenty minutes' exercise afterwards before retiring to roost.

If hens have only a small run they must have a very scanty meal of corn in the middle of the day, and as the object is to keep them as much occupied as possible, it must be thrown down among the loose earth, or among clean straw laid down for them to scratch amongst.

I think I must also reiterate here that a dry place of shelter, with plenty of fine ashes or road scrapings, is essential for hens in whatever way they are kept; they will then be quite happy, scratching and burying themselves for several hours of the sunny morning.

Hens have no teeth to masticate their food, but it is all ground up in the gizzard by means of sharp stones, gravel, sand, etc.

If fowls be kept short of this grit, as is very often the case, they suffer much, as the food cannot digest properly, and illness is the result.

Fowls with open runs can usually pick up all they need for themselves, but even then it is as well to be on the safe side, and to supply a little now and then.

Grit must be very sharp to do any good, and should consist of any small stone chip-pings, broken oyster-shells, old mortar, cinders, etc. Gravel that has been well rounded with water friction is of no use whatever. I have seen chickens that have been cooped up for a day or two eat hard grit as readily as the daintiest hard-boiled egg.

Cockle-shells broken up are very good, as they supply the lime for the shelling of the eggs, and the grit for grinding the food at the same time. If there be a difficulty in getting this grit near at hand it can be cheaply purchased; and though it may seem rather wasteful to buy stones by the sack, yet it is money saved in the end. All bought grit should be very sharp, and must be placed a little at a time in the run, in some kind of flat vessel, as it gets very much wasted if thrown upon the ground.

I have been giving many rules upon how to feed, but now I must tell you what to feed upon.

"The ideal diet is that combination of foods which, while imposing the least burden upon the body, supplies it with exactly sufficient material to meet its wants."—Dr. Schuster.

The above quotation is the heading to one of Prof. W. O. Atwater's most interesting articles in the Century Magazine, upon "What we should eat."

The editor of Poultry has very aptly applied many of the professor's ideas to our present subject, and has shown very clearly that in order to be a successful poultry feeder, knowledge of the habits and wants of the poultry is required.

All men and animals, and hens in particular, have three great needs which must be regularly supplied if there is to be healthy existence; and here I do most particularly wish my readers to bear with me while I go into what might seem at first sight unnecessary matter, for the whole object of these papers is to enable those interested in the subject to become more interested still, and by showing them a few principles to enable them to think for themselves, and to weigh and utilise facts, so that they may understand the reason why; for she will succeed best who, by knowing why, makes herself independent of those around her, and does not follow blindly any self-constituted guide.

But to return to our point. Every day a hen by living, running, and laying eggs is actually wearing herself out in the exact proportion to the amount of labour she performs and the amount of cold she has to endure. So every day a hen must have sufficient food to keep her body warm, to make up the wear and tear in her own muscles, and to give her strength to walk, run, fly, cackle, etc. A strong, healthy hen requires three different kinds of nourishment.

1. Flesh-forming foods; 2. Fats; 3. Warmth-giving and bone-making material.

Most of the foods have plenty of the warmth-giving and fattening materials; and as hens usually get far too much of these given them, there is little danger of starving them in this quarter. But it is the flesh-formers that are usually left out, and it is these which we shall now consider.

For the morning meal, where potato peelings are used, care must be taken to supply some rich flesh-formers with them, as by themselves they are very poor. So potatoes mixed with equal parts of sharps and barley-meal are good, sharps alone making the mixture too doughy.

In summer, where there are no peelings, the following meals are good:—

1st. Ground oats, i.e., oats ground up with the husk on, not oatmeal.

2nd. Equal parts, sharps and barley-meal.
3rd. Sharps and buckwheat-meal.

By the following table, taken from W. L. Wright's "Book of Poultry," it will be seen that food differs considerably in these various qualities.

There is in every 100 parts by weight	Flesh-formers, Chitin, etc.	Warmth-giving and Fattening.		Bone Material	Husk, Fibre, and Water
		Fat.	Starch.
Beans and peas ...	25	2	48	2	23
Oatmeal ...	18	6	63	2	11
Middlings or sharps ...	18	6	53	5	18
Oats ...	15	6	47	2	30
Wheat ...	12	3	70	2	13
Buckwheat ...	12	6	58	1	22
Barley ...	11	8	60	2	25
Indian corn ...	11	8	65	1	25
Hempseed ...	10	21	45	2	22
Rice ...	7	...	80	...	13
Potatoes ...	6	...	41	2	50
Milk ...	4	3	5	2	86
Requirements of hens, not counting water ...	17	6	77

In glancing over this table it will be seen that very few foods "hit" the ideal exactly; and as house scraps cannot be analysed, we can only come to some approximate diet.

It will be seen that rice is a very poor food for laying hens, as it is the nitrogenous flesh-forming materials that form the richness of the egg.

Bean and pea meal is a very rich food, but cannot be given alone, as it is disliked by the fowls; but mixed with a less nourishing meal may be used for a change.

Oatmeal does not mix well by itself, and is, besides, too expensive to be used alone; but a little put in with the other meals is much liked by the fowls, and where the house supplies a great many potatoes, the oatmeal may be afforded to counteract them.

Milk must be used very sparingly in mixing food where hens are in close confinement, otherwise it is good. Always put salt in the meal, and a little pepper during the winter months.

I have only given a few of the mixtures, but with this table before her each poultry keeper will be able to try for herself any arrangement of foods she likes, for hens appreciate a variety, only let it be remembered that in summer hens do not require so much warmth-giving food as in winter, and vice versa.

Another time I hope to add suggestions upon the use of grains, meat, and green food to the poultry keeper.

A MODERN MONTAGUE.

By EGLANTON THORNE, Author of "My Brother's Friend," "Ida Nicolari," "The Two Crowns," etc.

CHAPTER IV.

"BROTHER MONTAGUE, GIVE ME THY HAND."

IT was late in October ere Mr. Denning and his daughter brought their wanderings to an end. By that time each had had enough of foreign life, and felt that it would be good to have done with the frequent changes from hotel to hotel and settle down once more to their quiet life at home. Mr. Denning was decidedly better for the change. His tone of mind was no longer morbid; he could eat and sleep well; he was looking stronger and brighter than he had looked for many a day. He still walked with a slight limp, and was occasionally reminded by a twinge of pain of the accident which had befallen him at Venice;

but the ankle was much stronger, and would, he believed, get quite well in time. Olive was sure that the foot would not have recovered so well had not Mr. Rowcroft taken it in hand when he did. If Mr. Denning thought the same he did not confess it, and neither he nor his daughter ever spoke of Stuart Rowcroft.

The afternoon was clear and cold on which they drove into Wivescombe from the railway junction, three miles distant. Everything in the little village wore the old familiar aspect. The children with their bags and slates were coming out of the school-house. The girls bobbed and the boys pulled their forelocks as Olive, who knew every child in the place, nodded to them. But Mr. Denning took no notice of the children. A grave, stern look, the meaning of which Olive knew well, settled on his face as they entered the village. The cloud deepened as they drove past the end of Love Lane and saw the tall hedges glowing with crimson berries and the yellow and russet of autumn leaves.

But it lifted as they drove in at his own gate and along the laurel-screened drive to the old ivy-covered porch. They had been unable to say exactly at what hour they would reach home; but Mrs. Denning was on the look-out for them, and her gentle, loving face appeared beneath the porch, radiant with joy at their return. As John Denning sprang down to receive her welcome he could feel nothing but gladness.

She was a frail, delicate little woman, and for a few moments the meeting seemed almost more than she could bear.

"At last! at last!" she half sobbed. "Oh, John, the time has seemed so long! But I do not mind, now that you have come back well and strong. And Olive, too, how well she looks! Dear child, you do not know how I have missed you."

"She has proved a capital traveller," said her father, "as well as a good nurse. I have given her a great deal of trouble."

"Ah, your ankle! I forgot to ask how that was," said Mrs. Denning, looking to see how her husband walked. "It is a little weak yet, I see."

"Oh, but it is much better. This is nothing; you should have seen it a few weeks ago," said Mr. Denning.

"What a blessing it was that you happened to fall in with that nice English surgeon," said Mrs. Denning, fervently. "Oh, John, have you heard about the Squire?"

"What about him?" asked Mr. Denning, his face clouding instantly. "You know I hate to hear anything about him. Has he been doing me any fresh mischief?"

"No, no, not that," said Mrs. Denning, hastily. "Wait, John; don't say anything you may be sorry for afterwards. Poor man! he is lying between life and death. It is very doubtful if you ever see him again."

Mr. Denning stood looking at his wife in grave, startled silence. A few minutes before he would have vowed that he wished nothing more than that he might never see the Squire again; but now a sense of awe checked his bitter feelings.

"Mamma! You don't mean it?" exclaimed Olive. "What is the matter with him? Has he been ill long?"

"No, he was only taken ill the day before yesterday on his way back from London. Some say he had a kind of fit. He has been doing too much, over-exciting himself, it appears. Oh, it makes me feel so thankful that your father's health has been restored!"

Mr. Denning turned away, not caring to hear more then. He knew that there was indeed cause for thankfulness that he had not been struck down like the Squire. He had come perilously near such an illness before he left home. Would the Squire recover? He hoped so. Although he was his enemy, he could not wish the poor old man dead. There had been a time, long ago, when they had lived on friendly, neighbourly terms with each other. They could never be friends again, but for the sake of those old times he wished that the Squire might be restored to health.

"They have sent for his sister," Mrs.

Denning was saying to Olive. "I am afraid the poor old man cannot recover. A physician from London has seen him to-day, and he has a trained nurse; but from what I can hear there is little hope. I felt as if I could not bear to hear your father speak violently against him when perhaps he is breathing his last."

"No, indeed," said Olive, with a deep-drawn sigh.

"You see," said Mrs. Denning, with an air of apology, "when I think of that poor old man lying there so ill, without either wife or child to care for him, I cannot help feeling more kindly towards him, although he did behave so badly to your father."

"Of course you cannot," said Olive, warmly. "Oh, how I wish father could forgive him! In this sad life, where death is always near, people should learn to love each other and forget injuries."

Mrs. Denning looked at her daughter with a glance at once tender and discerning.

"Ah, child!" she said, "you were always good and loving; but we older folks do not find it so easy to forgive." Then with apparent irrelevance she asked: "What sort of man was that Mr. Rowcroft who looked after your father's foot? Did you like him, Olive?"

"Yes; he was very nice," said Olive, vexed with herself that she could not answer the question without blushing; "we are really very much indebted to him for his kindness."

"So I suppose," said Mrs. Denning. "What a pity that he is a Rowcroft! That makes it impossible for us to invite him here or show him any attention."

For several days the old Squire lay to all appearance at the point of death. Mr. Denning inquired every day as to his condition, and suffered no harsh word respecting him to pass his lips. At last to the surprise even of the doctors the old man's hardy constitution triumphed, and he began to recover. Very slowly he regained a measure of health and strength. As soon as he was well enough to be moved he was sent away to St. Leonards for the benefit of sea air. Thus it happened that Christmas came round ere John Denning had once seen the face of his enemy whose look of triumph he had dreaded to meet.

Whatever he felt concerning Squire Rowcroft he kept to himself; but his wife did not conceal that her feelings towards their neighbour had softened. Her pitiful woman's heart was touched by what she heard of the old man's enfeebled condition and the sad change apparent in him as he was wheeled to and fro the esplanade at St. Leonards in his invalid chair. She invariably spoke of him as the "poor old Squire." The Squire absent, nothing occurred to disturb John Denning's equanimity. Everything in his life was as it had been before the disastrous lawsuit was contemplated, save that now no one belonging to the household at the Chase ever set foot in Love Lane. Mr. Denning had not forbidden his family to do so; but it seemed to be understood amongst them that that way was prohibited.

Mrs. Denning fancied that Olive had been rather out of spirits since her return from abroad; but she brightened up as Christmas approached, and looked forward to welcoming her brothers, who were coming, one from Oxford and one from Eton, to spend their holidays at home. They stayed in London on their way, and did not arrive at Wivescombe till two days before Christmas. Olive drove to the station to meet them. There was an unusual bustle at the station when the train came in, half an hour behind its time. It was surprising to see how many passengers alighted; but Olive quickly recognised her brothers, and hurried forward to greet them. The next moment she was startled to perceive behind them, stepping from the same compartment of the train—Stuart Rowcroft! Their eyes met, and she turned from her brothers with heightened colour to greet him.

"Yes, Miss Denning; it is I," he said, his face bright with pleasure as he shook hands with her. "I told you I should be coming to Wivescombe some day, and here I am. I have come to spend Christmas at the Hall."

"But the Squire is away; he has been very ill," said Olive, in her surprise.

"He came home yesterday, I believe. What, am I actually telling you news of your own neighbour? He is better, quite well enough to welcome a cousin, I assure you. But there is the carriage waiting for me, and I must not keep you from your friends, who have been my travelling companions. I shall see you again; I hope to call upon Mr. Denning." And with a bow and smile, which included the whole group, he passed on.

"Who in the world is that fellow, Olive?" asked her brother Herbert, looking after him.

"A gentleman we met in Italy—Mr. Rowcroft," said Olive, hurriedly.

Herbert's face assumed an expression of disgust. No member of the family had espoused his father's quarrel more warmly than he.

"A Rowcroft! Bah! If I had known he bore that name I should not have been so ready to chum with him coming down," he observed. "What relation is he to the Squire?"

"A cousin. His father was first cousin to the Squire, I believe," said Olive, coolly.

"What was father thinking of to let you make the acquaintance of any relative of the Squire's?" asked Tom, her younger brother.

"It was a very good thing for father that we did make his acquaintance," said Olive, with some dignity of manner. "Father owes it to Mr. Rowcroft that his accident at Venice did not lame him for life."

"Phew! So that fellow is the surgeon who doctored his ankle!" exclaimed Tom. "Well, he's not half-bad, and he can't help having such a crusty, cantankerous old cousin. Now then, Olive, jump in, and let's get home. I'm going to drive, Herbert."

Tom liked to drive fast, and he whirled the dog-cart along at such speed that they soon overtook the heavy, lumbering carriage from the Hall. Olive caught a quick, eager glance from its occupant as he courteously raised his hat. There was a lovely colour on Olive's cheek, her eyes were radiant, her smile of the brightest as she chatted away to her brothers, talking so fast that they had no chance of interposing questions concerning the Squire or anyone belonging to him. Olive could not have told why she felt so sure now of a happy Christmas, or why, in spite of every disturbing element, the world had grown brighter for her because a certain visitor had come to the Hall; but so it was.

The decoration of the old church, for which Olive was generally responsible, kept her busy on the following day. Her brothers helped her for an hour or two; but they soon wearied of the work, and when Olive complained of a lack of holly-berries, Herbert proposed that he and Tom should go in search of some.

"All right, it won't take us long; we shall find plenty in Love Lane," said Tom.

"Oh, don't go there for them," cried Olive, anxiously. "Father would be vexed if he knew that you went into the lane."

"What nonsense!" exclaimed Tom, "we have as much right to go into the lane as the Squire himself. And the holly is for the church; it is not as if we wanted it for our own place."

"But don't take it from there, Tom," Olive besought him; "indeed, you had better not."

Tom would not promise, but Herbert had no wish to invade Love Lane, and he took his brother off in another direction. They had a good walk, and did not get back to the church till it was growing dusk. So it happened that Stuart Rowcroft, strolling into the old church early in the afternoon, found Olive surrounded by bundles of evergreens, and somewhat desperately contemplating the work that had to be done with no more efficient help than that of some of the elder scholars who were her companions. She could not refuse the help he offered, and the work went on more rapidly when she had his clever fingers and manly strength at her command.

"Well, are you pleased with our work?" he asked, after a while, as they paused to survey the effect.

"Our work!" it was pleasant to him to say them, and pleasant to her to hear the words.

The afternoon had slipped by so quickly that it seemed to Olive as if barely an hour had passed when her brothers came in, bringing rich spoil of holly-berries. Herbert greeted the Squire's guest with very distant politeness, but it was not in Tom's nature to be cold to anyone, far less to one who had rendered his father timely aid. As he lingered to help his sister put the finishing touches to her decorations, he was soon chatting freely with Mr. Rowcroft. On leaving the church the three walked together as far as the entrance to Love Lane; but there they parted, Mr. Rowcroft hoping in vain for an invitation to the Chase. Gladly would Olive have asked him to come and see her father, but she dared not. Yet Olive went home with her heart more light and glad than it had been on any Christmas Eve before. No word had passed between them that another might not hear, yet something had told her that Stuart Rowcroft liked her, and that knowledge seemed enough for happiness just then. Yes, even though she tried to sober herself with the reflection, "It must all come to an end; when Christmas is over he will go away, and I shall see him no more," she could not but feel glad.

A perfect Christmas morning dawned upon Wivescombe. The air was keen, but the sun shone brightly on roads white with frost, and fields and hedges which looked as if they had been sprinkled with diamond dust. The young men chose to walk to a church some miles off, where there was a more highly-trained choir than Wivescombe could boast; but Olive went with her parents to the old village church. As they walked thither she summoned courage to make an announcement to her father which she felt should have been made before.

"Father," she asked, rather timidly, "have you heard that Mr. Stuart Rowcroft is spending Christmas at the Hall? You know whom I mean—the Mr. Rowcroft who so kindly attended to your foot when we were at Verona."

"I understand," said her father, curtly, "and I do not forget that I am under an obligation to him; but I am very sorry he has come here—I cannot invite the Squire's guest to my house."

"I saw him yesterday afternoon," Olive forced herself to say. "He came into the church when I was there. He inquired about your ankle, and said he was very glad it was so much better."

"Humph! He is not a bad fellow," said Mr. Denning, somewhat mollified. "If only he were not related to that—"

He paused and drew a long breath as if at loss for an epithet sufficiently scathing to express his opinion of the Squire. Ere he could find one his little wife laid her hand gently on his arm.

"Don't, John," she said, with a beseeching look; "don't say bad things of the poor old man. Remember he has just risen from a bed of sickness, and it is Christmas Day too."

"I cannot see that it's being Christmas Day makes any difference," said her husband.

"Oh, I think it should make a difference," she replied, softly; "the day on which our hearts are full of love and gratitude to God for His unspeakable gift. Surely goodwill towards all men should reign in our hearts to-day."

Olive heeded not what her parents were saying. A sore weight had fallen on her heart. All her girlish joy and hope seemed suddenly crushed. Her father would never relent; his prejudice against everyone who bore the name of Rowcroft would yield to no persuasion. A mighty, insurmountable barrier rose between her and the man who had won her heart. So Olive's voice faltered when she tried to join in the Christmas carol with which the service commenced, and she felt a great throb of pain as she saw the old Squire with feeble, tottering step pass up the aisle, leaning on the arm of Stuart Rowcroft.

It was hardly strange that the Rector's sermon that morning should be all about love—"the love which God hath to us," the love with which we should love one another; there could be no theme more suitable for a Christmas Day. Olive thought it a beautiful sermon, but she listened to it without hope. She did not believe that a sermon could change her father's heart. She did not think anything could so influence him as to soften his feelings towards Squire Rowcroft.

Olive had promised to meet her brothers on their walk back from the church to which they had gone, so at the close of the service she left her parents exchanging Christmas greetings with the villagers in the churchyard, and stepped off briskly alone. She was careful not to look about her, lest she should meet the gaze of Stuart Rowcroft, whom she was anxious now to avoid. As she was passing the end of Love Lane she caught sight of a man's hat high up in the thick hedge. Someone was cutting the holly-boughs, and the hasty glimpse she caught made her believe that it was her brother Tom who was thus engaged. Olive stood still; her mind greatly disturbed. To think that Tom should touch the holly in Love Lane! How foolish of him! Her father would be so vexed if he knew. And the Squire might be passing that way presently on his way from church! The next minute, without pausing to consider that she might be mistaken in the conclusion to which she had leaped, Olive hastened towards the spot where she had seen the man. As she approached it someone sprang down from the hedge and confronted her with a glad smile of welcome and an outstretched hand; but it was not her brother—it was Stuart Rowcroft.

"Miss Denning! I was hoping that this was your way from church."

"Oh, Mr. Rowcroft!" exclaimed Olive, colouring warmly in her surprise; "I did not know it was you; I thought I saw my brother here. I came to beg him not to take the holly. We never come this way; I must go back now."

"Oh, please, wait a moment," said Stuart, daring to retain the hand he had taken. "Look at this holly! Did you ever see more beautiful berries? Oh, you cannot be in such a hurry on Christmas Day! Tell me why you never come this way."

"Because this is the lane about which there was the lawsuit," explained Olive, hurriedly. "We none of us like to set foot in it now. Indeed, father would be angry if he knew that I was here at this moment."

"So this is Love Lane, is it?" said the young man, smiling as he spoke. But the next minute his face grew grave and earnest. "What a pity that should cause division between neighbours! Don't you wish that old grievance could be healed?"

"Oh, I do wish it!" exclaimed Olive, in tones that were tremulous with feeling; "but I can do nothing in the matter—I am helpless."

"What if you and I together could heal the breach," he said, softly. "We are not enemies, are we, Olive?"

She did not reply in words, but there was that in her look which encouraged him to continue.

"At least, I know that my own feelings are not those of an enemy. I love you, Olive; I love you with all my heart. Can you love me a little in return?"

As her eyes fell beneath his earnest glance he knew that she loved him more than a little. He waited for her to speak; but the next moment she started back and tried to draw her hand from his grasp.

"Oh, I should not have let you," she cried, in a tone of distress. "It can never be—I know it can never be. Father would not hear of such a thing."

"But you will let me speak to him. I will do my utmost to persuade him. I will never, never give up hope if only you will be true to me."

They were but a few yards from the end of the lane. He still held her hand, when suddenly they became aware of steps and voices close at hand.

Olive drew away her hand in haste, and tried to step back, but the holly he held had become entangled in the meshes of a light, fleecy wrap she wore about her throat, and could not be at once extricated. Ere they could get apart the eyes of the Squire and of Mr. Denning were upon them. Hot, shame-stricken, bewildered, Olive could hardly believe that she saw aright. Was it indeed her father who stood before her, carefully supporting on his arm the bowed, enfeebled form of the old Squire?

Not in vain had the Rector tried to enforce the Divine lesson of love that morning. His words had touched deeply certain hearts amongst his hearers. The Squire had listened, and been moved to wish that he had been a better Christian, and had lived at peace with his neighbours all the days of the life that was now drawing so near to its end. John Denning had listened and felt rebuked for the bitter words he had spoken against his neighbour, the deadly hatred he had suffered to grow so strong within his soul. But the pride of neither would have suffered him to take the first step towards reconciliation, had not a simple incident brought them together.

By noon the half-thawed roads were in a dangerously slippery condition, and when the Squire was returning in his carriage from church, the coachman tried in vain to get his horses up the short, steep hill to the hall gates.

John Denning chanced to come up just as the Squire decided to alight from the carriage and walk round by Love Lane to his house. Perhaps it was because he was startled by catching sight of his neighbour that the old man's foot slipped as he was about to descend, but, whatever the cause, he would have had a bad fall had not John Denning been near enough to spring forward and catch him in his arms. For the moment Denning was conscious only that the Squire was a weak, infirm old man, and he helped him carefully on to his feet and supported him for a moment with his strong arm.

"Ah, Denning, Denning," said the Squire, in quavering tones, so unmanned by the shock that tears were in his eyes, "I am getting old now, a weak old man. I shall never be again the man I have been."

"Lean on me, sir, let me help you," said Denning, touched by the feebleness of his enemy.

"Thanks, thanks, you are very good," said the Squire brokenly; "I believe I must let you help me. We will walk round by the lane, if you do not mind."

Denning said nothing, but turned in the direction indicated. At the entrance to the lane the Squire halted, partly to take breath, partly that he might relieve his mind of its burden.

"Denning," he panted out, "what a fool I have been about this lane! Yes, I'll own to it now. I was an arrant fool. What did it matter whether the lane was yours or mine as long as we both could use it? It was never worth while to break off our neighbourly intercourse for such a paltry cause."

"It is a pity you could not view the matter in that light before," said John Denning, coldly; "it would have saved much toil and trouble."

"Ay, ay, I know it," replied the old man, in a tone of distress. "You have a right to reproach me. I see my folly now. What can I say, Denning? I would make amends to you if I could. I am an older man than you, older by nearly twenty years, and sickness has made me feel even older than I am. I cannot have long to live now. When the parson was preaching I wished so that you would let bygones be bygones, and be friends with me again. For he is right; life is too short for strife and bitterness. We must all die, and what would become of us if God were not more ready to forgive us than we are to forgive others?"

The old man's voice broke. He was at the point of bursting into childish tears.

"True; we all need forgiveness," said John Denning, slowly, as, not without a struggle, resentment yielded to pity; "and Christmas is the time when we should wipe out old scores. I'll try to forget about the lane."

The Squire's grasp of his arm tightened convulsively. They went on a few steps and the next minute Olive and Stuart Rowcroft came into view. The glance which revealed them in such close proximity seemed to reveal a great deal more.

The Squire's quivering features suddenly broke into a smile of satisfaction.

"Ah, see!" he cried, eagerly; "it is as I thought. He did not come down to Wivescombe merely to visit me. Look, Denning—Love Lane justifies its name; for if they are not lovers I don't know what lovers are."

The revelation which thus flashed upon them was less welcome to John Denning. His face clouded, a dull red colour gathered in his cheeks.

"Ah, you do not know my cousin," said the Squire.

But Mr. Denning's fingers were already closing stiffly over Stuart's hand.

"I have that honour," he said, coldly. "I made Mr. Rowcroft's acquaintance under circumstances that I am not likely to forget, since they placed me considerably in his debt."

"You have it in your power now to more than cancel that debt," Stuart Rowcroft found courage to say. "I told you that a time might come when it would be so. The happiness of my whole future depends on you."

"And the happiness of someone else's future, too, I suspect," said the Squire, in a very audible aside. "Denning, you will have to give your consent. I tell you what. I have no child, as you know, and my property's mine to do what I like with. I shall leave my land to this young man, and if you give him your daughter there's not likely to be any quarrelling in the future, when you and I are lying in the churchyard, as to who owns Love Lane."

John Denning did not know how to reply to this. It was as hard to oppose as to yield. And so ere the talk ended the happiness of the lovers seemed tolerably secure, though the father's consent was not formally given till some weeks later.

[THE END.]

A WHITE WINGED HOPE.

By HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

IN skies of dusky red the year was dying,
As in the west the wintry sun went down;
I heard the rising wind above me sighing
Sad farewells through branches bare and brown.

Oh, when this year was young a hope I cherished,
Which made all life to me divinely sweet;
But as the months went by, it drooped and perished,
With the leaves that rustle at my feet.

Only faded fern and russet heather,
Where the bluebells rang their fairy peal;
Only faint, dank scents of leaves that wither,
Where the woodbine's perfume used to steal;

Only silence for the stir and gladness,
Where the song-birds used to flit and dart;
Only loneliness and aching sadness,
Where joy's fount once sprang within my heart.

Thus to myself I murmured as I wandered
.. By the brake this quiet New Year's Eve:

Must time for ever steal away, I pondered,
That to which most tenderly we cleave?

With my foot I turned the dead leaves over
As I leant against an oak tree's stem;
And lo! close nestled in the russet cover,
Grew a snowdrop, gleaming like a gem.

Through the cerements of the dead year shining,
Hope's fair symbol, newly born from heaven;
Clearer answer to my weak repining
Surely angel's tongue had never given!

Good-bye, old year! all wearily and sadly
An hour ago I thought to part from thee;
Now in my heart behold I hide so gladly
The white winged hope which thou hast left to me.

Perhaps e'en now time's kindly hand is planting
On the grave where my dead hope I laid,
Some fair flower to fill with grace enchanting
Days which seemed by grief a desert made.

THE SERVICE OF BEAUTY.

BEAUTY IN LITERATURE.

LITERATURE takes rank among the fine arts. What is true of beauty in art generally is therefore true of this branch of it, and needs not to be repeated under this heading. But literature is a form of art so universal in its appeal, so open and so necessary to all, that it claims a special consideration. It is the stored-up essence of men's experience in thought, in emotion, in action. As such it has a power of nourishing the intellect, of arousing the imagination, of regulating conduct beyond all other arts. In opening out to us the best that has been thought and said and done, it is a mighty agent for good; it grants us possibilities of culture greater than are offered by any single art.

But we must not leave out of sight that all the doors it opens to us do not lead to good. As Carlyle says, "Some few books are going up, and carrying us up heavenward; calculated to be of priceless advantage in teaching—in forwarding the teaching of all generations. Others, a frightful multitude, are going down, down; doing ever the more and the wider and the wilder mischief."

"FADED FERN AND RUSSET HEATHER."

This subtle, all-pervading influence has its dangers, subtle and widespread as itself.

Nature and her beauty we may always receive with open welcome; we need never doubt her message; at the worst we suffer it to fall on deaf ears and dull hearts. But with art, and chiefly with this branch of it, there is every need to exercise our human prerogative of selection. A French author has defined a work of art as "a corner of nature viewed through the medium of a temperament." In literature it is this temperament of the author which we have to take into account. It is the very essence of the power which literature wields over us, a power for the highest good or the most insidious evil. A true poet is a benefactor to mankind; he holds the inspiration of the ideal over our common lives, and glorifies them with a light which is not of this world. But a poet may possess a strong imagination, showing us riotous beauty of conception and a finished grace of style; yet if he lacks moral insight he is no true poet. Falling through the misty atmosphere of his temperament, the pure light is refracted, and gives us all things blurred and distorted.

Purity is an essential element of beauty, and that which contains an element of impurity is not true loveliness, but a misleading image. Too often students of the beautiful are hindered in their search because they, reversing the truth, believe that the object of their admiration must be pure, in and because of its beauty.

Culture has been defined by Matthew Arnold as the "study of perfection" or "harmonious development" in the "two noblest qualities of beauty and intelligence," which Swift named in his "Battle of the Books" "sweetness and light." Here we have a useful standard by which to measure literature as a means of culture. Whatever ministers to "sweetness and light" we may safely rank as good literature. And we shall find that much which has passed for such must be rejected. First, all that which is divorced from moral insight, because there is no sweetness without light, or beauty without moral purity. Next, all that is commonly prized because of its truthfulness of representation, —light without sweetness. Such literature claims as its merit a faithfulness to life; and if truth were the only essential to art, it might indeed be admitted. But the upholders of this school of writing forget that in life, too, we have to use our power of selection, and must choose deliberately between the ennobling and the degrading. Life alone is not enough; we have to strive for the higher and to reject the lower life. It is not good for the "naturalist" writer, nor for his readers, to turn the light of truth always and only upon the dark and evil places of human nature, to show up its weakness without pathos, its sins without concern, and its sufferings without consolation. What is coarse or common or unclean does not become any less coarse or common or unclean because it is accurately drawn; and we must allow no cleverness of manner to hide from us the worthlessness of the matter.

By this test, then, distinguish the high from the low, the worthy from the unworthy.

First ask, Has it beauty? Next, Has it truth? What we may think beauty at first sight will come to change its aspect if we cannot find in it that "high moral element" essential to it; what we see to be truth, if it contain no elevating power of beauty, will be only that half-truth which is ever the most dangerous. As for instance it may be said, evil is true, for evil exists surely enough; and yet to preach and to paint evil, and to fix our gaze on that as truth, would be to fall into fatal and blasphemous error.

Much that passes for literature in our time forfeits its claim to that title altogether upon examination, for it will be found to lack both these essentials. In every age the real books into which men, great men, have put their very souls, and have added to the intellectual wealth of the world, have been very few, but never before has there been such an enormous amount produced of writings which have either added nothing to that wealth, or have really impoverished men intellectually, by employing their faculties wastefully to the neglect of true books.

By that noble title we really cannot bring ourselves to call those many volumes which crowd upon us year by year, although they are not by any means all worthless. The constant flow of criticism—literary, political, social—of light fiction, of travel, has its own place in our lives, and if kept within due limits and used aright, its own good purpose. We have to choose carefully even here, but although we take the best advantage of such opportunities as come in this way, let us not deceive ourselves in the matter, let us not think that we are reading in the highest sense of that word. This is but the "chatter of common men," compared to the "majestic converse of the gods."

There are, however, worse things than this common chatter. There are the evil tongues of hidden narrow-mindedness, of mockery at all things high and pure, of unhealthy sensationalism, of falsehood. Even while thinking of the beautiful in literature, one turns aside to contemplate with pain and grief the vulgar raw hideousness and the moral crookedness of much that is offered in that sacred name. Our only safeguard here against all forms of evil is to resolutely cultivate a taste for the highest and best, until all else becomes, as in time it surely will—intolerable.

The "Service of Beauty," in this as in every phase of life, will result in making our allegiance finally as spontaneous as it is unwavering; but at first it is not easy. While we are young and unimpressible, and our tastes unformed, we do not naturally turn to the best, and, as in the matter of food, we do not assimilate easily what we take without appetite, so it is of no use to weary ourselves with reading contre cœur what for the present is beyond us. Shakespeare says—

"No profit grows where is no pleasure ta'en,

In brief, sir, study what you most affect."

Yet I would have young people choose always the best in that line of reading which they "most affect," that it may be a stepping-stone to higher things. If a girl at one time enjoys nothing but novels, let her read, I would say, the very best, and her taste will gradually be trained to appreciate the philosophy, art, and morality which underlie them.

There has been much discussion lately as to what are the best books. The leading men in every walk of life, who should be our best advisers, have drawn up lists for us which curiously contradict each other. The hints and remarks about reading in general—pointed, wise, and witty—are the most valuable result of the attempt to decide this point, which after all cannot be absolutely settled except by each qualified reader for himself. The real point of importance is that we should be sure we are reading books good beyond a doubt, and good for us. In any particular province of knowledge we should, as far as possible, aim at the best. And however much profit we may gain from what is sometimes called "useful reading," let us not forget what Mr. Russell Lowell points out in this fine passage:—"The world of imagination is not the world of abstraction and nonentity, as some conceive; but a world formed out of chaos by the sense of the beauty that is in man, and in the earth on which he dwells. It is the realm of might-be, our haven of refuge from the shortcomings and illusions of life. It is, to quote Spenser, who knew it well: 'The world's sweet inn from care and wearisome turmoil.'"

VARIETIES.

THE GOOD WIFE'S WOOING.

"A good wife," remarked Grimes, "is beyond price. She is better than rubies, cheers her husband's solitude, woos him from the contemplation of care, and—"

"And," exclaimed Mrs. Grimes, catching up the thread of the discourse, "unless the wood and coal are brought in here in double quick time there'll be a kind of wooing about this house which will make someone think the roof has fallen in."

And then Grimes took a lantern, and with a groan went out into the night, and for a time nothing broke the stillness save the dull thud of the axe as Grimes tried to drive it through a hard knot.

WASTED TIME.—How we loiter away our lives! If we wasted our means as we do our time, we should all be bankrupts.

FOR EVER.

"Do you sing 'For ever and for ever?'" said a soulful youth, languidly.

"No," answered she, in a matter-of-fact tone, "I stop for meals."

REASONABLE JUDGMENT.—Nothing can justly be despised that cannot justly be blamed; where there is no choice there can be no blame. —South.

THE HEIGHT OF POLITENESS.—The height of politeness is passing round upon the opposite side of a lady when walking with her, in order not to step upon her shadow.

ALL HIS OWN.

"I've not much hair, 'tis true, my dear,"

He said, in a sarcastic tone;

"But the little that I have, I vow, Is quite exclusively my own."

PATIENCE.—A Scotch girl at an examination gave a pretty definition when asked—"What does patience mean?"—"Wait a wee an' dinna weary."

A MARKED RESEMBLANCE.

"So you enjoyed your visit to the menagerie, did you?" inquired a young man of his adored one's little sister.

"Oh, yes. And do you know we saw a camel there that screwed its mouth and eyes around awfully, and sister said it looked exactly as you do when you are reciting poetry at evening parties."

A REASON FOR LOVING.

LOVE, love, as long as love you can,

Oh! love as long as love you may;

The hour will come, the hour will come,

When at the grave you'll mourn and pray.
From the Germán.

PIANOFORTE DUETS AND PIANOFORTE DUET PLAYING.

PIECES IN CLASSIC FORM.

THE subject-matter of this paper is so voluminous that it is impossible for me to give anything like complete particulars of all works coming under the above title. At the same time, however, I shall try to indicate which composers are best worth examining, and give in as few words as possible a short description of their writings in this form.

I mentioned in my first article the duets of Weber as being remarkable for their brevity and beauty. A few words about these really characteristic pieces will be, I am sure, interesting to those of my fair readers who have doubtless derived much pleasure from the strains of the Frey-schutz, Oberon, etc.

They are in three sets, numbered op. 3 (six pieces), op. 10 (six pieces), and op. 60 (eight pieces).

Op. 3 is an early work. That of course may be put down a truism, But! (capital B, Mr. Printer, please) they reveal the master to a large degree. They are full of dramatic surprises, and although presenting no difficulties even to the merest beginners (as far as technique is concerned), contain passages of great beauty, and above all are purely and wholly Weber. Now may I claim to have justified the beginning of this paragraph.

No. 1, sonatine, melodious and flowing; No. 2, romance, pure Weber, contains a remarkable finish; No. 3, minuet "Presto," the first time I have seen such a time made to a minuet. This is, in my opinion, the pick of the lot. I should advise the trio to be taken "poco meno mosso"; No. 4, andante, con variazioni; No. 5, marcia; No. 6, a very characteristic rondo.

Op. 10, No. 1, moderato, contains a charming second subject in short phrases, as is his wont, and a short and interesting working-out section. No. 2, andantino con moto, may be passed without comment. No. 3, andante con variazioni, again pure Weber. One variation, "Vivace," commands instant notice. No. 4, mazurka, most charming, and perfectly easy. No. 5, adagio, a one-page gem, containing a subject evidently inspired by the clarinet, the instrument above all others that Weber's melodies suit. This page might have been composed for an impassioned slow movement or recitative. No. 6, rondo, graceful and Weberish.

Op. 60 it would be presumptuous to criticise; I therefore only call attention to their great beauty. I will just mention the tema variato and marcia; the latter piece indeed is a short masterpiece, and ought to be used as a dead march.

If this little four-handed piece had been written for an opera it would have been now ranked with the dead marches of Chopin and Handel; but being "only a pianoforte duet" it has escaped notice. Well! we will keep it to ourselves, dear readers, if you have the curiosity to buy it.

All these duets are published in one volume, in the Peters' edition, No. 188a, for about one shilling!—simply nothing at all.

I have given a list of the duets of Schubert; but anticipating the pertinent question, "How is it that Schubert wrote so many glorious duets?" I hasten to reply, "Because he had not the opportunity of having orchestral works played, and was therefore obliged to pour out his inspired thoughts on the piano."

If I were once to commence descanting upon his duets I should go on till I found I had written enough material for twelve of these papers; I will therefore resist temptation, and mention that a great many four-handed piano compositions of the master can be got in the Peters' edition, and that Breitkopf and Härtel are publishing (if they have not already published) all the duets in their complete edition of Schubert's works.

For beginners I can recommend the Polonaises and Ländler; and before passing on to other compositions, I would remark that one of the most remarkable features about Schubert's pianoforte duets is their "symphonic quality," of course allied to the most consummate beauty of melody.

Mozart has written two capriccios, very fugual and masterly; a set of exquisite variations; and a fugue which is considered one of his finest, and is extensively quoted in theoretical text-books.

Of Haydn I do not know anything, but I believe that there are one or two sonatas and pieces, of which Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel have single copies.

Of Spohr there is nothing. The greatest original pianoforte writer (after Beethoven, of course) has done splendidly in this direction. Need I say I mean Schumann, who has left us some "Ball Scenes," op. 109, "Pictures of the East," op. 66, 12 "Duets for Young and Old," and Children's Ball, op. 130. Of the 12 pieces, op. 85, perhaps the most noteworthy are—

No. 1, No. 3 (Garden Melody), Round, and Evening Song (No. 12), which last is familiar in a number of forms, but few know it as originally composed. Of op. 66 there is nothing to remark, except that they are all fine, and do not present any difficulty to the fairly advanced player.

The Ball Scenes, op. 109, are noble pieces in dance rhythm, showing what a great composer can do with familiar rhythmic forms. These are not easy pieces to play, but will repay the earnest duettists for the trouble they may take over them. They are not works that can be taken in at a glance, but the deep feeling and passion underlying the dance motion can only be brought out and appreciated at its proper value by thoughtful, painstaking study.

Op. 130 are cast in a lighter, simpler vein, but are very pleasing. All these works can be got at an almost nominal price in the "People's Edition," published by Breitkopf and Härtel, and enjoy the additional advantage of being edited and fingered by Mme. Schumann.

A remarkably fine and almost unknown work is the "Operette sans Paroles" of Ferdinand Hiller. This is a little opera in one act, told in a series of pianoforte duets. It starts with an overture in classic form, with a beautiful introduction (themes from which are afterwards utilised). The imaginary curtain rolls up and discloses the love-sick maiden, who laments her absent lover in a tender and melancholy solo. The next item is called "Nuptial Eve" (3), and is in a boisterous vein, probably a supper to which the bridegroom elect has invited his friends. After which we are transferred back to the home of the bride, who, in a Huntsmen's Chorus and Ensemble (No. 4), receives the congratulations of her father's friends and retainers. By this time the lover has arrived on the scene in time for the "Romance of the Youth" (No. 5), in which of course he declares how happy he will be when united to his dear Jemima or Wilhemina or Sabina, or whatever her name happens to be, tempered with a hope (which is afterwards justified) that she won't blow him up for his dilatory appearance. In No. 6, Allegro Agitato, B flat minor, and tremolo accompaniment, the lady does evidently give him a severe scolding; they have had words and tears, but are afterwards reconciled, and finish in a most amiable and loving mood. In No. 7 the friends of both sides of the family combine in "A Drinking Song with Chorus," wishing the young pair every happiness. No. 8 forms the Wedding March. No. 9 is a trio of pathetic import, for in this the bride receives much good advice from her papa and mamma, and dutifully promises to do all they advise (which she doesn't intend to by any means). The bridesmaids now appear in a most delightful "Ladies' Chorus," No. 10, and cause much excitement and admiration among the unattached section of the males. No. 11 is a dance, in which many future marriages are entered into; and No. 11 (Finale) is the departure of the newly-married couple, amid showers of rice and good wishes.

Now if my fair readers do not agree with my account of the matter, they must get the work, and construct a story for themselves. It is published by Messrs. Augener and Co.

There are three charming diversions of Sterndale Bennett, op. 17, published by Augener.

I have some "Scherzi" by a composer who is not generally credited with duets—Enrico Marschner, the opera writer. He has also some four-handed polonaises and marches which I do not possess.

I should not advise anyone not possessed of great patience to attempt the two pianoforte duets that I know of Franz Liszt. There is a waltz, "Bal a Berne," which is about the most difficult thing of the kind I have ever seen. It is, however, extremely effective, and would make a decided sensation at, for instance, country penny-readings, where the pianoforte duet (generally a hasty arrangement of operatic airs) finds a frequent home.

The other composition is the aria, "Il soave e bel contento" of Pacini, with variations.

I shall conclude this paper with a description of some of Raff's duets.

Probably ninety out of a hundred of the young ladies who play the piano know the tarantelle, "Les pêcheuses de Procida," but I don't think many know that it is the finishing piece of a set of twelve—op. 82, entitled "Twelve Chamber Pieces for Piano, for four hands, without octaves."

Every number of this set shows Raff in his best light. Especially charming are the "Polka Rondino," No. 4; The Spinners," No. 6; Alison "Valse à la Viennoise," No. 8; and the "Pompe Solennelle," No. 10.

Raff, to my mind, is always most charming when adapting dance forms symphonically to the piano. I have some other duets of his, a set of waltzes, "Danse Macabre," in which occur two actual fugues.

I have also "Panorama," a set of duets. These are all published by Schuberth, of Leipzig.

There are also charming little pieces by Heinrich Hofmann, Jadassohn, Kalliwoða (most delightful are some waltzes), Kuhlau, Lindpainter, Nicolai, F. Ries, Rheinberger, N. Rubenstein, Jensen, etc.

In my next paper I shall explore the duets of some living musical giants, and then look out for Moszkowski and Dvorak!

WALTER VAN NOORDEN.

By SOPHIA F. A. CAULFEILD.

To those who have read the series of articles on "Heraldry" and "The Days of Chivalry," the employment of flowers as badges, devices, and heraldic insignia, of emblematic significance and historic interest, must be familiar. To treat such a subject exhaustively could not be attempted within space so limited; thus I can only select an example here and there amongst those best known to fame.

Many amongst those made historical by their adoption as devices or heraldic cognisances were specially chosen on account of their emblematic character or traditional interest. Thus were they classified under the various distinctive headings to which they might lay claim, perpetual repetitions would be rendered unavoidable.

CONVENTIONAL ACANTHUS LEAF.

To obviate this difficulty I shall consider them in alphabetical order, treating them under every aspect in which they merit to be seen. So, when my young readers take a stroll—whether through the stately walks of some ancient country seat or manor house, with its geometrical parterres, balustraded terraces, and its wilderness shrubberies, where Nature is permitted to cast off all restraint, and weave wild garlands at her own sweet will; or whether the stroll be restricted to the bounds of a cottage flower plot—it may be that my sketches of flower lore may enhance the pleasure of the hour. Thus I invite them to wander with me to what must seem little more substantial than dreamland, where, amongst more glowing hues of sky and land, we may view the games and sacred rites of ancient Greece and Rome, in which floral decorations formed so important a feature.

In the study of their mythology we find that a flower, plant, or tree was employed as a distinctive emblem of every god and goddess, having reference to supposititious incidents in their several histories. For instance, the anemone, myrtle, poppy, rose, and violet were all dedicated to Venus; the anemone credited with having sprung from the tears, mingled with his blood, which she wept over the body of Adonis. The poppy, the dittany of Crete, and all wild flowers in untrodden dells, were symbols of Diana, named, as the special Deity of the Ephesians, in the "Book of Acts." The sunflower was assigned to Apollo, and poppies to Ceres and Somnus, the god of sleep. The narcissus formed alike the emblem of Pluto and the Fates, because their sweet and powerful odour was thought to produce madness. The couch of Zeus and Juno was composed, amongst other flowers, of the asphodel, the iris, poppy, white lily, pomegranate, and dittany being emblems.

The victors in the athletic games wore wreaths of tree foliage or parsley, not flowers; but at the sacrificial rites and feasts, garlands of the latter were employed to deck the victims sacrificed, and the idol deity to which they were offered. To this practice reference is also made in the Book of Acts xiv. 13.

Some of my readers may be acquainted with Kingsley's "Heroes," and need not that I should extend this part of my subject. Suffice it to add that flowers formed a species of sacrifice, offered in great profusion on the occasion of the Roman Fontinalia, which took place on the 13th of October, in honour of the Naiades, or guardian spirits, who protected the streams and wells. Garlands were then hung over the wells, and bunches of flowers thrown into the fountains, while the water nymphs themselves were crowned with flowers and sedges.

In imitation of the rites of classical times, the floral games of the ancient city of Toulouse were instituted A.D. 1324, and these games were revived under the auspices of Charles IV. and his bride, who endeavoured to reanimate the ancient literary character of the city, and induced the "Capitouls" to offer a golden violet to the successful poet competitor of the province and city. This floral prize was awarded to Arnaud Vidal, of Castelmandry. Another revival took place through the instrumentality of Clemence Isaure, the poet, who died A.D. 1540. She was a woman of fortune, who left the greater part of her wealth to the reintroduction and maintenance of these annual fêtes, held the first week in May, for the bestowal of prizes for poetic merit. These prizes were presented to them on the occasion of the floral games. At this their fresh revival Pierre Rousard was the first to receive the silver eglantine blossom, a silver crown and the title of Poet of France, which distinction was confirmed by Francis I. A golden amaranth was awarded for the best lyric composition. On the high altar of the church of "La Daurade," where Clemence Isaure was buried, the golden flowers subsequently won by poet competitors at these floral games are still, it is said, preserved.

In the year 1694 the Jeux Floraux, which had again revived after a season of disuse, received a new impetus from the powerful support of Louis XIV., and were regularly kept up under the instrumentality of a society inaugurated by him, and that with considerable magnificence.

THE ALMOND.

In our own country, I need not remind our readers, floral fêtes and religious rites have obtained since their institution by the Druids. We have also had our May festivals, with the garland-hung maypoles and the flower-crowned "Queen of the May." At Knutsford (Canute's Ford), Cheshire, this pretty fête is still kept up, and it is to be regretted that with the decadence of these simple historic customs the wholesome simplicity and loyalty of our country-folk should undergo a process of deterioration and decay likewise. It is recorded that noble and simple met together in kindly fashion on the occasion of such like festivities; the proud and haughty Henry, and his good Queen Katherine of Arragon, having danced together round the maypole in the early days of their wedded life. We have also our floral commemoration of the Canterbury Pilgrims in Kent, when little girls walk in procession, carrying baskets containing the emblematic flowers, each dedicated to some saint belonging to that original pilgrim band.

In all Christian countries we find that flowers have been specially dedicated to certain Christian anniversaries, such as the holly for Christmas, lilies for Easter, etc., and to so well-known a fact I need but make a passing allusion. I now proceed to specify certain flowers, as I proposed, in alphabetical order, which have been dignified by historical significance, and woven into lives of celebrated men and institutions, often of world-wide importance.

The first to which special notice shall be given is the Acanthus, which must carry us back to classic times. To this beautiful plant we owe the most elegant of all our designs for the capitals of pillars, the Greek architect, Callimachus, originating the idea of its representation. The story runs thus. After the interment of a young Corinthian girl, her trinkets were collected and placed by her loving nurse near her tomb in a basket, which she covered with a tile to preserve it from the inclemency of the weather. It was placed over the root of the Acanthus, and on the return of spring, when the stalks and leaves burst forth, they spread around the sides of the basket, and shooting upwards met with an obstruction in the corners of the tile. This caused them to bend backwards, and attracted the notice of the architect on his chancing to pass the spot. He seized the idea at once, and carried it out in the design of the capitals which surmount those elegant fluted pillars known as "Corinthian."

THE AMARANTH.

The Romans, as well as the Greeks, made much use of the Acanthus mollis for artistic purposes, and Roman drinking cups are found decorated with its leaves; while the northern nations preferred the Acanthus spinosus, which is both smaller and rougher in character. Virgil says that the Acanthus formed the basis of the design which was embroidered on the mantle of Helen of Troy.

Amongst the earliest in the year of tree blossoms are those of the Almond, whose beautiful pink flowers appear in advance of the long narrow leaves. This tree has been rendered specially remarkable in its historical character by the miracle performed upon a rod taken from it, "Aaron's rod that budded." (Book of Numbers xvii. 8, and Heb. ix. 4.) There are other historic references made to it in Holy Writ, as for example in the Prophecies of Jeremiah i. 2, and the Book of Ecclesiastes xii. 5; and the third mention of it is to be found in Jeremiah i. 12, which refers to the meaning of the Hebrew word from which it is derived—shaked, signifying "haste" or "awake early," a name appropriate to a tree blossoming before all its fellows. The prophet says, "I see a rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten My word to perform it." This tree, Amygdalus communis, of the family drupacæ, is a native of Persia and temperate India. It spread westward to Palestine, but did not grow in Egypt when Jacob gave a present to Pharaoh, on the occasion of his sending for corn. It spread afterwards through middle Europe, and was imported into England about 300 years ago; but the blossoms do not bear fruit in this climate, which is imported from Malaga and Valencia. Thomas Moore uses the symbol of the tree in blossom thus—

"The hope, in dreams of a happier hour,
That alights upon Misery's brow,
Springs out of the silvery almond flower
That blooms on a leafless bough."

The blossoming almond tree, together with the white iris, white lily, and narcissus, are assigned in sacred art as emblems of the Virgin Mary. Pope Pius II. adopted a hand holding "Aaron's rod that budded" as his device, with the motto, Inspersata floruit—"It flowered unhopd for"—in allusion to his unexpected elevation.

The Amaranth must be familiar as a "household word" to all students of the poets, as an emblem of immortality. Milton speaks of it as the "Immortal amaranth, a flower that once,

In Paradise, fast by the 'Tree of Life,'
Began to bloom."

The Amaranth is an annual of many species, having crimson, green, or purplish flowers in large spiked clusters. The widow of Vespasian Colonna, Giulia Gonzaga (1566), great granddaughter of Louis III., Marquis of Mantua, who, according to history, was the most lovely woman of her time, adopted the amaranth as her device, together with the motto, Non moritura, "undying," to indicate the unchangeable character of her love for her husband, and never-ceasing grief at his loss. All proposals of marriage were rejected by her, even those of the Emperor Solymán, who endeavoured to seize her by force, and for that purpose sent Barbarossa, the Corsair, to make a descent upon Fondi for that purpose. But the faithful mourner effected her escape at night on horseback. The name of this flower is derived from the Greek Amaranthus, being descriptive of its unfading character. This order and genus of plants includes 500 species. The Greeks regarded it as the emblem of friendship, and used to employ it, as well as the myrtle and polyanthus, in their funeral rites, the dead being crowned, and the mourners otherwise decorated, with the blossoms. In Longfellow's beautiful poem, "The Two Angels," allusion is made to both the amaranth and the asphodel, of which latter flower I shall now speak.

The Asphodel denotes, in the "language of flowers," "My regrets follow you to the grave." It has not many varieties of species, and these are, for the most part, natives of those countries bordering on the Mediterranean. One kind, the Asphodelus ramosus, is found widely spread over the southern parts of Palestine, and very abundantly in Italy also, and is regarded as good food for sheep. The asphodel is a species of lily, belonging to the order of Liliaceæ, and it is thought to be that to which allusion is made in the Canticles, "He feedeth among the lilies."

The common English name for Asphodel is "daffodil," and the golden ones are dedicated to Eastertide. They are also known as "Lent lilies." No flower, perhaps, has been more frequently woven into a garland of song than the asphodel, under its several names, Old Herrick, Milton, and Shakespeare being amongst the most remarkable. Speaking of Easter, the poet Drayton says—

"See that there be stores of lilies, Called by shepherds 'daffodillies,'"

THE BROOM (Planta Genista).

By the French these "Lent lilies" are designated "Pauvres filles de Ste. Claire." The yellow-blossomed A. luteus, the white A. albus, or "king's spear," and the branching A. ramosus, are all very ornamental garden plants. The Greeks used to plant the asphodel round their tombs, under the belief that its seed supplied the dead with nourishment.

The Broom, of the genus Cytisus, is a favourite flower in heraldry. So early as the year 1234 St. Louis made it the insignia of a new order of knighthood, entitled l'Ordre du genêt, the hundred knights of which formed his bodyguard, and wore a chain composed of golden blossoms of the genêt and white enamelled fleur de lys, suspended from which was a cross of gold, with the motto, "Deus exaltat humiles." Our Richard II. was a member of the order, The broom, as you know, gave their surname to our Plantagenet princes. By some it is said that Fulk of Anjou was the first of the race so designated, but others maintain that it was his son Gefroi, Earl of Anjou and father of Henry II., the Empress Matilda's husband, from the fact that he wore a plume of the broom (or Planta Genista) in blossom, the gen of the Celts and the genêt of the French.

It has been suggested that when Gefroi laid claim to the sovereignty of the province of Brittany, he assumed the ancient badge of the country, which seems a very natural idea; but according to a legend, Gefroi was on his way to the battlefield, through a rocky pathway, on either side of which the yellow broom clung firmly to the boulders upholding the crumbling earth. Breaking off a sprig he fixed it in his cap, observing, "Thus shall this golden plant ever be my cognisance—rooted firmly among rocks, yet upholding that which is ready to fall." He thenceforth assumed the name "Plantagenet," and transmitted it to his descendants. Its first official heraldic was on the great seal of Cœur de Lion, and it remained the family device down to the time of Richard III. (inclusive).

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc.

CHAPTER XII.

THE man saw Eve hesitated, and probably for that reason added this last remark, for in point of fact there was plenty of time, for it was only half-past three now, but it had the desired effect, and overcame her hesitation. She was disappointed that Arthur had not been able to meet her himself, but no doubt there was some good reason for his failing to do so, and after all it was only a delay of ten minutes, so she stepped into the boat without the slightest suspicion that there was anything amiss, and her companion rowed her quickly along the dyke towards Filton Broad, where, as he said, the wherry lay waiting her arrival.

Ten minutes later Arthur Clifford reached the spot where he had left his boat moored the night before, on the opposite side of the river, at the lower end of Muck Fleet, but to his consternation he found it was gone.

Gone! and it was now a quarter to four, and he had told Eve to meet him at the heronry at four. What ever was he to do? Between him and the heronry rolled the river, rippling merrily as the rosy tints of the rising sun flooded the eastern sky, softly tinging the waters of Filton Broad where his chartered wherry was awaiting him. The dawning day now was strong enough for the flower-crowned banks to show forth their summer beauty; the rosebay and purple loosestrife were gorgeous in their rose-coloured robes, the magenta bells of the tall foxglove, the graceful, feathery, white-crowned king of the meadow, the tufts of red valerian, the blue cranesbill, all blended their tints in one harmonious mass of colour, but none of them won so much as a glance from Arthur Clifford; he no more saw them than he heard the matin-song the larks were chanting overhead and the blackbirds and thrushes in the neighbouring bushes. A flock of rooks, mingled with seagulls (no uncommon sight in this part of the country), passed over him to breakfast off the worms and cockchafer in one of the damp low-lying meadows close at hand, but Arthur paid no heed to the cawing of the rooks or the cry of the gulls. He stood for a moment as if paralysed; without the boat all his plans were frustrated, and they had been so carefully laid! True, he could and must swim across the river and meet Eve, and tell her his boat was gone, but then how were they to reach the wherry?

Only by walking to the end of Muck Fleet, and endeavouring to catch the attention of the men he had left on board her, and signal to them to put off a boat and fetch them. This was the only thing to be done, and he doubted not that by shouting and signalling he would succeed in making them understand the plight he was in; but this proceeding would delay them, and he was at a loss to get his clothes over the river dry. But there was no time to be lost, and he was in the act of taking off his coat when to his surprise he saw Adam Day coming towards him. In a moment it flashed into his mind that Adam was the cause of his trouble—that in some way or other he had become aware of his plan, and had determined to frustrate it by taking away the boat, and was now come to glory in his discomfiture. Mad with anger, Arthur advanced to meet Adam, and with an oath demanded to know what he meant by stealing his boat, and coming to gloat over him afterwards?

"You are forgetting yourself strangely, Mr. Clifford; I know nothing at all about your boat; it is a pure accident that I am walking here this morning. I could not sleep, and some impulse which I cannot explain led me here. But if I can be of any use to you I shall be happy to help you," said Adam, gravely.

All Arthur now wanted was to get rid of Adam as quickly as possible, that he might swim across to Eve; so finding he had made a mistake he apologised.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Day, but the truth is I am very much annoyed; I am going on a fishing expedition."

"Indeed. Where is your tackle?" thought Adam.

"And I am expecting a friend to meet me on the other side of the river. Do you know the nearest place to borrow a boat?"

"Noah Oldman's is the nearest from here, sir, but his boat is on the other side, I noticed as I came here, and I wonder at it, for I know when Noah went to bed last night it was on this side. I am inclined to think Jack Farrar has been playing some of his tricks last night."

Arthur paid no heed to this suggestion; all he cared for was to get Adam out of sight, that he might swim across to Eve, who must be waiting for him, since she had evidently crossed the river.

"For the love of everything that is kind go and borrow Noah's boat for me! I am losing all the best of the morning, and my friend will never forgive me for keeping him waiting all this time," said Arthur, earnestly.

Adam hesitated. All this excitement about a fishing expedition struck him as very strange. No doubt to have his boat made use of in this unceremonious fashion was very annoying, but it hardly accounted for the extreme vexation and despair from which Arthur was evidently suffering. He began to suspect there was some ulterior reason for this emotion, and he looked keenly at him with his clear grey eyes, though he was far from guessing at the truth.

The momentary and somewhat awkward pause was interrupted by the approach of a boat down the shallow waters of Muck Fleet, which immediately arrested the attention of both men.

"Hulloa! here comes a boat; who can this be?" said Arthur.

"The borrower of your boat returning it probably," said Adam.

"No. My boat is painted white. Why, it is Spurgin! Hulloa! what does this mean, Spurgin?" shouted Arthur, as the boat came into the river.

"Beg pardon, sir, we think something has gone wrong," returned the man, as he rowed across the river.

"What do you mean?" demanded Arthur, turning very pale.

"Why, sir, Jack Farrar's wherry has been lying to just at the head of Muck Fleet all night, and about half-an-hour ago my mate and I saw a white boat containing a man and a lady dressed in white come up Muck Fleet; we made sure it was you, sir, before your time; but when we found the boat made for Farrar's wherry, and paid no attention to our shouts, we didn't know what to make of it. Then we heard a woman's screams, and Farrar drew his anchor directly the lady and the sailor who fetches her were on board, and sailed away, leaving your boat."

"Monstrous! It is Eve carried off by that scoundrel, Farrar. We must rescue her. Adam Day, help me, help me," interrupted Arthur as he leapt into the boat, and seized an oar, signalling to Adam to follow.

Adam did so mechanically, for he was so thunderstruck by the conclusion Arthur drew from the sailor's story, that at present he had hardly grasped the situation.

"How do you know it is Eve?" he asked, taking the rudder-strings in his hands.

"How do I know? Because, O misery upon misery! she was to have met me at four at the heronry, and we were to have been married this morning at Yarmouth. I have the ring and license in my pocket, and a clergyman, a friend of mine, was to have married us as soon as we arrived. And now that scoundrel, Farrar, has laid his plans so well that my poor darling has been deceived by him, though how ever he did it, how he knew our plans, how he lured her into my boat, is a mystery. Was it Farrar himself who took her on board?" said Arthur, giving a hopeless glance at the heronry as they shot past; but of course no Eve was there, though it was past four.

"No, sir; it was a bigger man than Farrar, and he had a light-coloured beard. The lady didn't go willingly, that is certain, sir, for my mate and I both heard her screams."

"Why ever didn't you go after them, and rescue her, then?" said Arthur, savagely.

"We daren't, sir. Your orders to us were to lie to and have the wherry already to start directly you came on board at a quarter past four; it wanted a quarter to four as Farrar raised his anchor. Then, thinking there must be something wrong, I pulled off as quick I could to see if I could see anything of you, for you said you would come up Muck Fleet."

All this time Arthur and the sailor Spurgin had been pulling furiously, and as Spurgin finished his sentence the boat flew out of the dyke into Filton Broad.

"Steer for yonder wherry, Adam," said Arthur.

Adam gave a sigh of relief, for he had at first thought the pursuit was to be made in the rowing boat, in which case he knew the chances of success were small; but when he saw the wherry lying a little to the south of the dyke they had come up, he began to see what Arthur's plan had been, though how Farrar had managed to frustrate it so utterly was as much a mystery to him as it was to Arthur Clifford. That Eve had been carried off by stratagem he was certain. Her screams heard by Spurgin when she got on board and realised the trick that had been played on her would have convinced him of this, had he not known that she had refused to have anything to say to Jack Farrar, and thereby constituted him her own, as well as her father's, and his, Adam's, enemy.

"She is still well in sight, sir," said Spurgin, as Adam steered the boat alongside the wherry Arthur had engaged, and in another minute they were all on board, and the boat fastened to her stern.

"Hoist the sail and go after them as quick as you can; ten pounds extra a-piece to each of you if you overtake them before they reach Yarmouth, for they are making for Yarmouth, that is very clear," cried Arthur, who was wild with excitement, and worked away to get the sail up harder than either of the men, who, nevertheless, had caught his excitement.

"Yes, sir, they are making for Yarmouth, or for the sea, which is more likely."

"The sea! He'd never dare to carry her out to sea, scoundrel as he is," exclaimed Arthur.

"He would dare to do anything; if he does that we must charter a steam-tug at Yarmouth and go after them; as it is, we had better take the first we come across, though of course there are none in sight just now," said Adam.

As he spoke he scanned the smiling waters of the broad, now rosy with the tints of the eastern sky reflected on their surface, but except one or two wherries so deeply laden with hay-stacks that they looked like floating stacks, and Farrar's wherry, its rich, red-brown sail filled with the fresh breeze which was springing up, and some yachts lying sleepily at anchor, the broad did not yet present its usual busy appearance during the summer months, and it was too early in the day for the steam-tugs to be pursuing their tasks.

"Never fear, Mr. Day, we'll overtake them without a steam-tug, or my name isn't Ted Spurgin. I'll sail my wherry against Jack Farrar's any day, and give him the start he has had this morning into the bargain. The wind is springing up finely and the tide is with us; we could not do better," said Spurgin, the owner of the wherry, hopefully.

"But the wind and tide are with Farrar, too," said Adam.

"Not just at this minute, sir; he has had to tack; we'll gain upon him now; but what do you mean to do, Mr. Clifford, when we have caught them?"

"Board her to be sure, and rescue my future wife; we are four of us to two of them. But Adam and I will do that if you'll look after the wherry; only let us overtake them, that is all I ask. I'll manage the rest," said Arthur.

Adam had been very grave and silent all this time, but he was thinking of Noah and the grief Eve's conduct would cause him; for though he was quite sure Arthur meant to act honourably, yet a runaway marriage would, he knew, in Noah's eyes tarnish the brightness of her name, while the deceit she had practised would grieve him terribly. Adam thought if he were Eve he would hardly dare to meet Noah's righteous anger when he heard of her behaviour, but yet after pondering the matter well over, he could but think that as soon as Eve was rescued from Farrar's clutches the marriage had better take place; at least he decided to do nothing to prevent it; on the contrary, he would go with them to the church and witness it, even though by so doing he should incur Noah's anger.

"We are gaining on them every minute; they are not more than a knot ahead of us now, sir," cried Spurgin, joyfully, as he watched Farrar's wherry.

"How soon shall we overtake them?" asked Arthur.

"In half an hour, at this rate. Hulloa! what's he up to now? He is changing his course. Bring her head round, mate; we'll cut him off now. What an idiot the fellow is; he is playing into our hands. Where ever is he going to?" said Spurgin, who was watching Farrar's manœuvres.

"Up the little river instead of to Yarmouth, apparently," said Adam, as the wherry steered for the mouth of a tributary of the Yare, which entered the broad at its north-east corner.

"So he is, but we'll be there almost as soon as he is; I can't make the fellow out. Why he is going there, unless he wishes us to overtake him, as we shall do in a very few minutes now, thanks to him, I can't conceive," said Spurgin.

"Nor I, unless he hopes to land at Bridgham before we overtake them," said Adam.

"Bridgham! I never heard of the place. What should he be going there for? Is it a town?" asked Arthur.

"A small town, sir. There is a very good inn, where he could hire a trap and drive to the nearest station, but I hardly think he means to do that. I can't make his game out. If he had made for the sea I should not have been surprised, but this beats me hollow," said Spurgin.

It was soon clear the little river was Farrar's goal, and in twenty minutes he was sailing up it with the other wherry, now only a hundred yards behind him.

"Take the quant now, mate, we'll be alongside her in ten minutes," said Spurgin.

The man obeyed, and, seizing the quant, worked away with a will, supplementing the wind by poking her along, until they were close to a bridge which spanned the river a few feet ahead of Farrar's wherry; and then he threw down his quant and went to lower the mast to enable the wherry to pass safely under the bridge.

Now there are a great many bridges across the rivers in this broad district, and the way in which the wherries lower their masts not a moment too soon, but just in the very nick of time, is one of many quaint features of the life here. Just as you have mentally decided the beautiful yet cumbersome craft must come to grief as she sails close to the bridge, down goes her mast and she shoots safely under, to raise it again immediately, before you have time to realise that the manœuvre has been successfully performed, and the danger you feared averted.

The four men on board Spurgin's wherry were so accustomed to seeing the mast dip at the critical moment, that though watching Farrar's wherry, now only a boat's length ahead, they were not alarmed for her safety, until in a moment the mast struck the bridge, the wherry capsized, and the three people on board her disappeared under the water.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SUSIE.—Your own plan appears to be a good one. Your aunt should take a house somewhere in the suburbs, as city men like to leave the smoke and noise, and sleep a little out of town.

SUSAN (a working girl) is thanked for her contribution of sixpence towards the "Girls' Home." You must apply to our publisher, Mr. Tarn, for any information about back numbers of the G.O.P.

LADY CLARISSA.—We could not attempt on such limited acquaintance with the circumstances of the case to give any advice, although you have our sympathy. Should he confess to a change of feeling towards you, of course you should set him free without any argument or remonstrance. It would be undignified to do otherwise.

WILD SCAMP.—We wonder you can so describe yourself! What an utterly unladylike characteristic! To correspond with a man unknown to your parents is an act of rebellion against their lawful authority over you. Confess your undutiful conduct at once, and ask their forgiveness.

TILLIE.—The stains of ink on a mahogany table may be removed by the application of oxalic acid. But it is a dangerous thing to use, or to leave in any easily accessible place, and should be labelled and locked up. Better get in a workman from an upholsterer's to attend to it, as you may make the case worse by inexperience in such matters.

MAVOURNEEN.—We think that you acted rashly, and should have talked over the matter with your intended husband before "jilting" him. Of course we suppose him to be a person of unquestionably good character, and that when he did write, his sentiments towards you had undergone no change. You should have written to ask whether he desired to break off your mutual engagement himself before you cut the matter short by doing it yourself, without giving him a chance of expressing his wishes. If you really care for him and regret your hastiness, write and inquire whether he meant to drop you quietly or not.

FANNY HENSEL.—We can only recommend you to abide by the directions given you by your singing master. Evidently he thinks the risk incurred by the use of your vocal organs, after having imprudently begun to sing in public at the early age of fourteen, is a serious one. You may lose your voice altogether if you do not give it the complete rest that your master prescribes.

GRATEFUL.—The traitor Judas was a lover of money, and he deliberately sold his Divine Master for thirty lucres' sake. He was not a mere automaton—he was a free agent; and he had had the advantage of that Master's teaching, of witnessing His miracles, of profiting—had he desired it—by His example, of enjoying His intimacy and friendship; and being a free agent he sold Him into the cruel hands of His deadliest enemies. Our Heavenly Father overlooks all things, however adverse, for the real good of His children.

GIPSY NAN.—We have ceased to answer questions about the complexion. Your writing is very good. You might join one of the girls' clubs for learning by correspondence at a subscription of a shilling or two. For example, apply to Miss Thoitys, hon. sec. of the Sulhamstead Girls' Question Club, Sulhamstead, Reading, Berkshire. The small annual subscriptions are divided into money prizes at the end of each year.

ANXIOUS PARLOUR-MAID.—Advertising is your only plan now for discovering your sister's whereabouts, after such a lapse of time as five years.

A LITTLE GIRL need not be ashamed of her offering of threepence towards the Girl's Own Home; we thank her for it. The words, "In the midst of life we are in death," are derived from a Latin inscription attributed to Notker, a monk of St. Gall, A.D. 911. They were composed by him while watching some workmen building a bridge at Martinsbrücke, and in peril of their lives. It forms the groundwork of Luther's Antiphon De morte. St. Notker (or Notker) was a canonised saint, and was surnamed "the Stammerer." He belonged to the Benedictines, was a writer on the Martyrologium, and died A.D. 912.

A MOTHER.—Do not waste time nor money on making a girl learn to play any instrument if she does not show musical taste: much less if she has no ear. It is by no means an essential part of her education. Indeed, this rule applies to other branches of study. Of course, geography, grammar, composition, the first three rules of arithmetic, history, French, and plain sewing are all absolutely essential and must be learnt; but music, painting, and art embroidery must be taught or not, according to the taste which a child may evince. We are great sufferers already from piano practising, by girls who have no chance of ever gratifying their hearers.

M. R.—If already considered to be a good pianoforte performer, your fingers cannot be disqualified by your age for attaining to the execution essential to your purpose. One would imagine you to be eighty or ninety when you speak of being "so old." You ought to be able to learn any instrument at twenty-five.

A BARMAID AND DAISY G.—We do not see any mention of a Home of Rest for young women in business in the Isle of Wight on our published lists. The Girls' Friendly Society has five such; and it might be well to write to the central office, 3, Victoria Mansions, Westminster, S.W. Where these are situated we cannot tell. There is such a home as you desire at Babbacombe, South Devon, at 12s. a week, or 5s. with subscriber's guinea ticket; address the Misses Skinner, Bayfield, Babbacombe. Workwomen and others are provided with one on the downs at Lewes, Sussex, at a charge of 5s. a week; address the Lady Superintendent, Hope Villa, Wallands, Lewes. And another at Lindfield, Haywards Heath, Surrey, at 8s.; to members of the Girls' Friendly Society 7s. a week.

LITTLE DORRIS.—It is true that, like the Eucalyptus, the sunflower (Helianthus annuus) is valuable in a sanitary point of view, being a safeguard against miasmatic fevers. But in addition to this advantage it is to be recommended as offering a valuable crop to the farmer, who, in taking example from its cultivation in Russia, India, China, Germany, and Italy, where it is cultivated to an immense extent, they would make a great profit of the excellent oil which it produces. An acre of good land would give a crop of about fifty bushels of seed, and each bushel yields a gallon of oil. The latter, when purified, is as good for table use as almond or olive oil. The seed is edible when boiled, and somewhat resembles Indian corn in flavour. As food for poultry it is admirable, increasing the number of eggs produced more than any other grain. When roasted they are used as a substitute for coffee. The leaves are employed for straw, and the withered stalks contain a good deal of alkali. The oil is employed both for soap and for light. The large cultivation of the sunflower is greatly to be recommended.

ELSIE.—The series of articles on "How to Keep House on £250 per Annum" was in vol. vi., beginning with the first number, October 4, 1884. There were twelve articles in the volume.

THE BARONESS IRETRUDE AND DI VERNON.—We were gratified by your kind letter. Robert, Duke of Normandy, eldest son of William the Conqueror, on his return from Palestine, after the fall of Jerusalem, landed in Italy and passed through Apulia. While there he married Sybilla, daughter of the Count of Conversane, A.D. 1100. She died two years after, leaving a son, William, who died of a wound, aged twenty-six, A.D. 1128, under the walls of Alost, in which engagement he was victorious. He was made Count of Flanders by the King of France. The first wife of Robert de Bruce was Isabella, daughter of Donald, Earl of Mar, by whom he had a daughter, Marjory, who married Walter, High Steward of Scotland, and was the mother of Robert II. His second wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Aymer de Burgh, Earl of Ulster, whose son David succeeded him at his death, at Cardross Castle, on the Firth of Clyde, June 7, 1329. The brothers of the Bruce were Nigel and Edward, and his sister, Isabel.

M. S. WEBSTER.—The authorship of the couplet—

"Be the day weary, and never so long,
At length it cometh to even song," is not definitively established. It was written during the religious persecutions in England, and had reference to them.

VALENDALE.—It is not necessary to do more than bow at a first introduction, unless to a relative. But if you be the younger you should take the hand offered to you, supposing the new acquaintance wished to be specially cordial.

MYRTLE.—You should not write to the young man without your mother's approval, and in no case until he give you a letter to answer.

MAY.—Read our article on "Spots and Stains" in the series called "The Fairy of the Family." Scrape a little French chalk on the spot, and rub it in with your finger. Writing tolerably good.

ANXIOUS FIFTEEN.—Change of air to the very opposite description of air in which you live is sometimes a perfect cure for neuralgia.

W. E. M. should consult a doctor, and read the articles of "Medicus" on the health of working girls in the "G.O.P." The cause of much illness is want of proper exercise; and a regular course of gymnastics is good when the exercise cannot be obtained. The only "prevention" of wearing boots and shoes in a bad manner, i.e., whether inwards or outwards, is to break yourself of it by perpetually thinking of it, and correcting it when you do it.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The hair generally falls in the autumn, and there is no better remedy than the old one of rosemary tea, which is within everyone's reach.

MODELEY.—The "Lion of Lucerne" is hewn out of the solid sandstone rock, and is after a model by the celebrated Danish sculptor Thorwaldsen. It was executed in 1821 as a monument to the memory of the twenty-six officers and 760 men of the Swiss Guard who fell in defence of the Tuileries on August 10th, 1792. The dying lion reclines in a grotto, transfixed by a broken lance, and is sheltering the Bourbon lily with its paw. You will find the entire story in any history of the French Revolution.

KITTY WELLS.—Your stepfather's son, who is not likewise your mother's, is no relation to you, and not within the "prohibited degrees" of marriage. The position of "mother's help" is one which demands very general capabilities of usefulness as well as goodwill, in putting a ready hand with cheerfulness to any description of work which the mother herself would do if necessary. Your verses express good feelings, but do not constitute "poetry."

MODERN ATHENS.—We should advise you to select two or three German towns where there are resident English chaplains, and write to them for information. They might know of some German pasteur who would gladly receive you as boarders, and you would then have a perpetual lesson, day by day, in the language.

SNIPE.—"Lesley" when used as a girl's name appears to be always spelt "ley," not "lie." The origin of this name seems to have been in Burns' poem of "Bonnie Lesley," the heroine of which was Miss Leslie Baillie, daughter of an Ayrshire gentleman. "Bonnie Lesley" is the pet name of a character in Mr. Black's novel of "Kilmenny."

GOODIE.—The 24th of September, 1869, was a Friday. Camphorated chalk is a good simple powder for the teeth.

FANNETTE.—We sympathise with you and your father sincerely in your temporary but distressing trial. Perhaps your father could learn to make netting with a large mesh, for sponge-bags, curtains, fruit-tree nets, and such-like things.

MARY.—The mustard tree alluded to by our Lord will present no difficulty to you when you hear that it was not the English mustard (Sinapis nigra), but a tree called by the Arabs "khardal" (Salvadora Persica) having numerous branches in which the birds find shelter, yet of which the seeds are exceedingly small.

NOTICES OF NEW MUSIC.

EDWIN ASHDOWN.

Twelve Studies for Pianoforte, by Walter Macfarren, conceal, in a most artistic way, the dry facts of technique beneath a glamour of musicianly grace. On this account alone they will be warmly welcomed by amateurs.

Un Azue, a melody for piano by Tito Mattei, is full of beautiful expression and melodic charm. There is, near the foot of page five, a most uncomfortable case of consecutive fifths. The exceptions to the rule forbidding this progression should always be pleasant ones.

Arabian Serenade. A song for basses, and composed expressly for Signor Foli, by Michael Watson.—This stirring ballad will make a capital present to brothers who sing such things, and can only look at music very superficially.

Sabina. Minuet and trio, by Margaret Gyde.—The minuet in C minor is the stronger movement of the two. The trio in A flat major, too great a contrast to its predecessor, is built up upon a very common sort of melody.

THE LONDON MUSIC PUBLISHING CO.

The Creation. The performing edition of Haydn's masterpiece is edited by the late Sir George Macfarren, who has, besides, arranged the pianoforte accompaniment, adding the orchestral indications which are of such great value and interest to amateurs, and also giving breath marks, denoted by a large comma above the staff, and intended to ensure unanimity amongst the singers. The lamented professor strongly advocates the restoration of the pianoforte as an accompaniment to the recitativo "secco" or "parlante." Its predecessor, the cembalo, was originally used, and the figured bass was intended to be filled up on that instrument, and not on the violoncello and double-bass. We must mention that the paper is not thick enough, for the writing upon the other side of a page shows through, and tends to create confusion, but otherwise the "performing edition" is most valuable.

Five Songs—words by Moore, and music by Lancelot Martley—belong to that interesting young school of song writers of whom Erskine Allon (to whom these love songs are dedicated) is a shining example. May we suggest that there are times when a particular rhythm, like a private hobby, should give way to beauty which is sadly thwarted by persistent reiteration?

L'Hirondelle is the title of a most graceful French chansonnette by F. W. Davenport.

SONG PICTURES I.

[Sydney P. Hall.

Sunshine. Song by Berthold Tours.—This is a simple setting of some good words by F. E. Weatherly, M.A. The third phrase of the music is a curious reminiscence of Sullivan's song about a silver churn, in Patience.

Tiny Feet. A song by Morton Elliott.—We can recommend this song to average singers, as a simple and effective thing, strongly impregnated with the character of an Irish melody.

Bonnie Wee Thing. Words by Burns, music by Amy Elise Horrocks.—This is such a pretty song, with such excellent "local colour" about it, that we recommend it heartily. Compass C to F.

La Bergère.—A rustic dance, by Warwick Williams, is a bright little piece, à la gavotte.

C. JEFFERYS.

Life, we've been long together. Words of Mrs. Barbauld's, set to music by Ernst Helmer.—This is a ballad of the Balfe-Wallace period, and although a decidedly weak composition, it has some melodic interest. There is the display of a gift, without any use having been made of it.

REYNOLDS AND CO.

Grannie's Rings. Music by Theo. Bonheur, and words by Arthur Chapman. The words are very touching, and represent a charming social interview between a child and her grandmother.

The Last Vespers. Music by Cuthbert Vane.—It is surely time to protest against the damage which the well-deserved popularity of such songs as "The Storm" and "Children's Voices" has wrought, by flooding the market with a demand for ballads with a refrain from the Church Services. In this particular song the conspirators in composition are reduced to killing a Sacristan! and the refrain is borrowed from the Nunc Dimittis! Another is named "Miserere Nobis," which is the refrain murmured by a monk who happens to pass a bridge just as a poor lunatic leaps over into the water. A song which, under similarly sad conditions, made a stirring demand for a life-belt would be more natural in character and less morbid in tone.

Danse Imperiale. By E. Boggetti.—You never know under what disguise a gavotte will "dissemble" nowadays! Everything not a march is safe to be a gavotte. This belongs to the latter class.

THOMAS MURBY.

Elsa and the Imprisoned Fairy. A Cantata for Juvenile Voices. By Thomas Murby.—There are many good points about this fairy cantata, but also some features which might be developed to greater extent with decided advantage. For instance, the two-part writing is simply a series of thirds. We think, if Mr. Murby is able to do so, that he should elevate the second sopranos to something above mere imitations of an upper part at the distance of a third, and should give children an early love for independent counter-melody. Again, the melodies in solo numbers, and harmonies and rhythms in the accompaniment, ought to introduce features of interest and even novelty; threadbare harmony and commonplace tunes only make children lazy and apathetic.

ORSBORN AND TUCKWOOD.

The Tempest King. By Oscar Verne.—Is a very fair specimen of a ballad for bass voice. It is dramatic, and would require a big voice.

Dresdina is a graceful little gavotte (this time disguised as "Stately Measure"!) by Carl Malemberg.

Gigue in G. A bright, frolicking dance. By E. Boggetti.

Vesper Voluntaries. Book 20 of this useful series of organ, or rather harmonium, pieces contains 12 movements of varied character. By King Hall.

The Juvenile Portfolio of Dances is a book, cheap at a shilling, of Quadrilles, Polkas, etc., for little people. The best number is the old dance, Sir Roger de Coverley.

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

CHAPTER III.

"A fellow so mercurial as your fiddle is not to be created out of any chance piece of timber."—An old book.

ALTHOUGH we know for a certainty that every thing on the earth and under it has, from the beginning, been laid under contribution by man for the purpose of pleasure and of art, yet in passing through a forest the last thing that would suggest itself to us is, that the trees under whose shade we are walking are endowed with a wonderful power—latent, it is true, until the hand of man inspires it with life—a power of expressing the inmost longings and passions of the human heart, a power to draw tears from our eyes or make us dance with joy, a power to soothe our aching hearts and draw forth the expression of our love and devotion, a power to sympathise with us, a power of making itself indispensable to us. Can any fairy tale be more wonderful than this?

We are not surprised to see the trees cut down and made into ships, or furniture, or houses; but to see them endowed with an almost superhuman gift of companionship to man would seem impossible if we did not know it for a fact, and one which we are about to prove.

The form in which this power is lodged must, of course, be as near perfection as possible, and this it is acknowledged to be. It vies with the human voice in its delicacy and its power of expressing every shade and nicety of tone.

The skill of an hour has not made it what it is, nor even that of a century; but, as Ruskin expresses it, "the help of numberless souls has produced it." Nothing good comes forth all at once, but is the result of thought, anxiety, and labour, and the violin, as handed down to us by the great masters, is no exception to the rule.

To us who love the instrument it will be interesting to learn by what process a tree of the forest is made to give out all its latent beauty and power, and assume the form of the graceful violin.

Those entrusted with this work of transformation have no easy task; they must be thoroughly educated in their art, and fully acquainted with those fixed laws and regulations, which to infringe, even by a hair's breadth, means failure. Presuming that this is all as it should be, then the next important step for them is to obtain material wherewith to work. This is most difficult, even though they happen to live in the midst of forests, as at Mittenwald.

There may be an abundance of wood from which to choose, but how and what to choose is the all-absorbing question, for the makers know well that the acoustic properties of the instruments they are about to make will greatly depend upon the selection of wood.

The knowledge of selecting wisely was the secret of the old Italian and French masters, who sought their material far away from their own lands, not because there were no maple or pine trees in Italy and France, but simply that those growing there rarely combined the qualities necessary for the production of a perfect violin, and so much did they value a piece of wood containing both beauty and acoustic properties that they guarded it jealously for their best work, and used up every inch of it.

It is to the old masters' choice of wood, quite as much as to the work bestowed upon it, that their instruments possess that velvety sound which distinguishes them.

It is certain that they had fixed guiding principles as to the nature and qualities of the wood they used; and none knew these better than Stradivarius and Guarnerius.

Not only did they seek wood among the trees of the forest, but were constantly observed mysteriously prowling about far from home, tapping tables, floorings, and even ceilings with their little hammers, and bending down their ears to catch, if possible, the tone of music they loved so much to hear. If they were fortunate enough to catch the ring in anything they touched, they lost no time in making an offer for it, and never parted from it till it was safely lodged in their studios.

Guarnerius seems to have obtained in this way a large piece of well-seasoned pinewood possessing extraordinary acoustic properties, from which he made most of the bellies of his violins. He looked upon it as a mine of wealth, and was most careful in working it that not a scrap should be lost.

In like manner a pupil of Stradivarius visited Ireland, and while there came across an old maple table, which he at once secured, and made from it some beautiful instruments.

I suppose everyone has heard of Vuillaume, the famous violin maker and repairer, and how he wandered about in search of the wood he required. He might have been seen in various parts of Switzerland buying up the furniture or wood-work of a chalet, or entering the poorest hovels in search of what he wanted; and whenever he could detect the right resonance in anything he touched, he made it his at any price.

One day he went so far as to persuade the curate of a small parish to let him take away the ceiling of his sitting-room, and replace it by another; and with this heap of dried wood he hurried back to Paris, there to work wonders with it. The beauty of the wood thus found consisted in its perfect dryness and readiness to be worked upon.

Many experiments were made by the old masters before determining what were the best materials for their purpose. They tried the pear, the ash, and lemon trees for the backs and bouts (sides), they tried deal for the bellies, but they failed to satisfy them on all points; and at length they came to the conclusion that nothing was better for the backs, necks, sides, and purfling (rims) than maple, which is beautiful, flexible, and not too soft, and for the bellies nothing equal to pine wood of certain quality, on account of its elasticity. Of the kind of pine none seemed to them so good as those grown in the Bavarian Alps and Tyrol, while they preferred to have the maple from Croatia, Dalmatia, and Turkey.

But to learn all about the wood was one of our reasons for going to Mittenwald, and, fortunately for us, Herr Neuner who guided us through his factory took infinite pains to show us the various woods, and how to detect the faulty from the perfect. But before going through the factory it will, I think, suit our purpose to accompany the violin makers of Mittenwald into their forests and watch them in their selection and purchase of wood.

It is not the privilege of all violin makers to choose their own wood; as a rule they have to buy of the merchant at a distance such as he sees fit to send, but here it is otherwise.

Before all things the trees must have the right resonance in them, and then, whether maple or pine, those selected must be very old, ripe, and dry; the dryness must be natural, not artificial.

A too great abundance of sap would render the sounds discordant and shrill, and probably cause the wood to shrink, which would damage the violin at once.

Many experiments have been made to dry the wood quickly, but nothing has yet been found whereby it can be done, except at the cost of the instrument.

The age of a tree is known to a certainty. When the trunk is sawn through you will perceive that it is beautifully and regularly marked with rings, which, in the centre, stand rather wide apart, but become closer and closer as they tend towards the bark. As the years get older the rings get closer together and the grain becomes finer.

Each of these rings is a record of a year; those in the centre being the new years, those on the outside and standing close together being the marks of years long gone by. Sometimes there are as many as three hundred rings. Not a single year since it was first planted but has its record there.

But in choosing wood for the violin age is not everything, for the tone of the instrument will depend upon the regularity of the rings. For example: a very fruitful year or an extremely wet year leaves its mark behind in a blurred ring, or one standing too far apart, showing that the goodness and strength were lavished on the fruit during that year, or lost in the extreme wet. Should this occur often, the tree might serve other purposes, but a violin maker would reject it as injurious to the good tone of the instrument he is about to make.

The Record of the years that are past!

Will it be out of place to mention here that as I stood watching tree after tree divulging the secrets of its life, I wondered whether our deeds and lives would be as indelibly marked, and as clearly to be seen when we stand awaiting judgment?

I don't know of anything which so strangely affected me as this unerring record of past years, exposed to the gaze of men assembled there in order to pass judgment and accept or reject accordingly.

Again I found that the violin makers did not select the wood close to the roots nor close to the summit of the trees for their instruments. This puzzled me, until the men explained that up to a certain distance from the trunk the wood is fatter, more compact, and sucks up more freshness than would be good, and that near the summit the wood is scorched and calcined by the sun, and being met by the ascending sap it is watery and green near the bark.

They were careful not to take wood full of holes and dead with decay, for, as they told me, violins made of such would send forth sounds without freshness or life. If they could have a choice, they selected the female tree in preference to the male, as being more pliant.

On finding a tree suitable for their purpose, they chalked a mark on the side facing the south, as regard must be had to the situation or exposure of the tree; that facing the south, under the full influence of the sun, is the ripest and richest in quality, and therefore sought for eagerly; the least desirable and the least perfect being the north, which is hidden from the sun.

Again my mind wandered to the Sun of Righteousness and those who grow up under His influence, and I felt that the trees were full of lessons and allegories.

All masters of the art of violin making seem to be of one opinion as to the goodness and suitability of the trees in this and the adjoining districts for violin making, and I wanted to know the reason of their preference.

It appears that the density, elasticity, and durability of wood depends upon the soil in which it is grown; and that of the Bavarian Alps and Tyrol is strongly impregnated with salt, a substance which has been proved to increase both the flexibility and elasticity of wood.

Having secured the trees, they are taken to the wood-yard and cut up into slabs of a certain size, and laid by in a house to dry—a process which will take at least six years.

The old masters knew the importance of using very dry wood, and most of them had a sort of open shed or awning on the roofs of their houses, where the wood was stored on rafters ready for use. It is easy to see how delighted they were when they happened to come across a piece of resonant wood in some old chalet which was perfectly dry and seasoned, for they could begin upon it there and then.

It is now time to enter the factory and see how the wood is cut for the commencement of the violin; but for a moment we must look at the rings again. Those widest apart near the centre supply the bass tones; those close together and tending to the bark supply the treble notes; therefore a special cutting of the wood is necessary. For example; it is not cut straight across like this, for then the grain would be cut through and the tone spoiled. First they halve the slab, then halve that again and cut the wood in strips from the centre, thus securing the proper amount of year circles in each.

This method of cutting the wood so as to embrace all the tone within the one instrument Klotz evidently learned from his master Nicolas Amati, and other Italian masters with whom he sojourned, for it was the fashion of the Cremonese and Brescian makers so to deal with the wood.

We must not forget to mention that the bridge of the violin is made of ebony or mountain ash, the latter being the next hardest wood; but it is easy to discover of which wood it is made. You can make no impression with your nail on ebony, but it is easy to do so on mountain ash.

Some of Nicolas Amati's violins have the bellies made of deal, probably chosen by him because of its density, elasticity, and vibrating power. An interesting experiment was made with three rods—one of steel, another of glass, and the third of deal; and it was found that when similarly struck all produced the same note. A fourth was then added of maple, and as it is more slow to vibrate, gave out, when struck, a lower note than the deal.

Having obtained the wood, and found some dry enough to commence with, we shall hope to begin work upon it in our next chapter.

(To be continued.)

AT SEA.

A bride was on board ship, and the sea was rather rough.

"I feel so ill, my dear," she said, "and if I should die and they bury me here, you'll sometimes come and plant flowers on my grave, won't you?"

A MORTIFYING REFLECTION.—It is a most mortifying reflection for anyone to consider what she has done compared with what she might have done.

HAPPINESS.—The essential ingredients in happiness are health, tranquillity of mind, competence, and friends of good character.

DOING GOOD.—She that would do good to many must love many better than herself, and prefer the common good much before her own, and seek her own in the common welfare.

IN PRAISE OF METHOD.—A little method is worth a great deal of memory.

"I HAVE BEEN UP MORE THAN AN HOUR, I KNOW," SAID NOAH, GLANCING AT HIS WATCH.

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALE,
Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIII.

NOAH'S CLOCK GAINS HALF-AN-HOUR.

"HALF-PAST five! Why, I have overslept myself! Dear me, I must be getting old! I don't know that I ever did such a thing before in my life," said Noah, as he glanced at the kitchen clock on leaving his bedroom that morning.

It would no more have entered Noah's head to imagine the clock had gone wrong than to think the sun in the heavens had; it never went wrong. It was cleaned once a year regularly, and wound up punctually every Saturday; and for it to lose or gain a minute was a thing unknown in its annals. Noah's own watch might lose or gain, the church clock even might err, but Noah's clock never.

So convinced that he had overslept himself he went out of doors, where another surprise awaited him. The boat, instead of being in its proper place, where he had left it the night before, was on the other side of the river, where Eve had left it.

"Well, this is a queer start, this is! I doubt Master Jack Farrar was up to some of his tricks again last night; if so, Adam was not so far wrong after all. However, I may as well swim across for it, and kill two birds with one stone."

Accordingly Noah suited the action to the word, and performed his ablutions and fetched the boat; he then took his tackle and a pail of worms, and went down the river towards the church to bob for eels, and forgot all about having overslept himself until the church clock struck six.

"Six; it must be seven! I have been up more than an hour, I know," said Noah, glancing at his watch, which, however, confirmed the opinion of the church clock as to the time of day, and on looking round Noah decided the sun did the same. "Umph! I can't make it out; never knew my clock gain or lose a minute; and parson sets the church clock himself every Saturday, I know," he said, half aloud, and then went on with his eel-bobbing till nearly eight o'clock, for he had good sport that day, and then he went home to breakfast.

"My, Noah! how late you are! it is getting on for nine o'clock. I was half-an-hour late myself this morning, and Eve ain't up yet, lazy child," said Mrs. Oldman, who was looking out for him.

"It is only ten minutes past eight, wife," said Noah.

"Go on with you! look at the clock—it is a quarter to nine."

So it was; and Noah, after staring at the clock, went slowly across the kitchen to listen to its tick.

"Why, the clock is open. Have you been touching it?" said Noah, as he found the door of the clock was closed but not fastened.

"Dear, no, man! I never touched the clock, except to dust the case, in my life, nor Eve neither. What! were you smoking in here last night? See, here is a fusee on the floor," said Mrs. Oldman, picking up the fusee—by the light of which Farrar had put the clock on—from the floor.

"No, I lit my pipe outside, and I never use fusees. Just call Eve. I can't make it out at all, the clock has gained five and thirty minutes in the night," said Noah, thoughtfully stroking his white beard.

Mrs. Oldman obeyed, first calling Eve and then knocking at her door, but getting no answer she went into the room and found Eve was not there.

"The child is up and out. Strange! I never heard her go out; she must have gone before I was awake. I wonder she ain't back to breakfast by now. Where can she be gone to?"

"Perhaps she is gone to gather wild flowers, and forgets the time," said Noah, who was puzzling over the clock; and slowly arriving at the conclusion it must have been put on by someone during the night, and resolving to take counsel with Adam about it. Meanwhile he sat down to his solitary breakfast, for Mrs. Oldman had had hers, and was standing outside the ark, scanning the country in every direction for Eve, whose unusual absence worried her.

"I can't think where the child is gone. I hope she has not come across that fellow Farrar, who seems to be always loafing about here after her. I should not wonder if that fusee belonged to him—he always uses them. Did you lock the door up last night, Noah?"

"No; and I forgot to tell you I found the boat on the other side of the river this morning," said Noah.

"Then you may depend Farrar has been here, and up to some of his pranks, though what object he could have in putting the clock on or taking the boat across the river, except to annoy you, I don't know. How I wish Eve would come in! and when she does I wish you'd just speak to her about being out alone so long, Noah. She'll pay more heed to one word from you than she will to a hundred from me. She was out ever so long all by herself on Saturday evening."

"Yes, but she had scarcely been out all the week, and she has not seemed quite herself all this last week either, to my mind. I'll just go round and see Adam before I start for Fordham with the eels; perhaps I may meet her."

"Not you; she's off in the other direction I'll be bound; that is her favourite walk. Look in again before you start for Fordham, to see if she has come home," said Mrs. Oldman, who was much more nervous than the occasion required, as her husband could not help thinking, for he was not in the least alarmed at Eve's absence.

When he was gone Mrs. Oldman made some fresh tea for Eve, and cleared away Noah's breakfast things, and then stood outside the ark looking in every direction for Eve, and talking to herself all the time.

"Something is going to happen; my ducks didn't go to beak, nor the taters to leaf, and the wheat to straw, because it is a dry season only; there is more in it than that, I'll be bound. Where can the child be? That clock a-gaining, too, look as if we were all going too fast, like the ducks and the taters; if it had stopped, I should have known 'twas a certain sign of a death—perhaps of my old man's, as 'tis his clock; but gaining is another tale; perhaps it means a wedding instead of a death. Why, my, yes, of course it must! I wonder I never thought of that before. If stopping bodes a death, gaining means a wedding, sure enough, according to the laws of contraries. And whose wedding should that clock trouble itself about except Eve's, seeing Noah has been married this five and twenty years come next Michaelmas! Ah, well, there is only one man in these parts fit to be husband to Eve, bless her pretty face! and that is Squire Clifford; and I am very much mistaken if she ain't of my way of thinking on that subject. I wonder what dress the child has got on this morning! I'll go and see."

So saying, Mrs. Oldman trotted off into Eve's room, where after a short search she discovered Eve had gone in a clean white dress—a fact which only added to her anxiety.

"Bless the child, if she hasn't gone in her best frock! would not put it on yesterday either, I remember, though I wanted her to. Mary Oldman, Mary Oldman, there is something going to happen, as sure as my old man's a saint, and I a wicked sinner! If Noah was to know how wicked, he'd never forgive me, and so perhaps it ain't worth telling him, though many's the time I have had more than half a mind to. But bless me! here is a letter in Eve's writing! Where are my glasses? I baint much of a scholar, but I can read her writing, I think. How bad I do feel! my heart is in my mouth, and I am trembling like yon aspen up in parson's garden; and of course I can't find my glasses—I never can when I want them. Oh! here they be on the chimneypiece, and here comes my old man, so he can read it; he is a better scholar than I, far away. Here, Noah, come and read this; it is a letter from Eve I have just found in her room."

"From Eve? Isn't she back yet?" said Noah.

"No, man; but be quick and read it! See, it is directed to father and mother."

But Noah was always deliberate in his actions, and he didn't hurry now; but took out his spectacles, wiped them, and then after looking at the direction till Mrs. Oldman could bear it no longer, but nudging him, exclaimed in the Norfolk dialect—

"Go on, Nor, do."

He opened it, and read as follows:—

"My dear Parents,—I hope you will not be angry with me; but before you read this letter I shall be married to the dearest and best and handsomest gentleman in the world. Mother, I don't think you will mind me going off like this, much; for I think you have guessed my secret; it was to save him trouble. And father, dear father, you must not be very angry with your little Eve, but forgive her; and though she will be a grand lady, and live in a grand house and have plenty of servants and carriages, she will always think her father the best and noblest and wisest man in the world. Father, dear, and mother, we have loved each other since we were little children—he and I; but it was only six weeks ago he asked me to be his wife, and this morning we are to be married at Yarmouth, as soon as we get there, and that will be about half-past six. And then we are going abroad for a year; but the marriage will be in all the papers, and I saw the ring and the license on Saturday evening, and a letter from the clergyman who is to marry us. Good-bye, dearest father and mother; as soon as I come back from abroad you must both come and stay a long, long time with your little Eve, who could not help loving a gentleman, but who is still your loving daughter. You will miss me at first, but mother you always said I was born to marry young. And oh, I am so happy! and I am going to study hard to be a wife my husband will never feel ashamed of, for of course I have heaps to learn. But do not fear, dear father and mother, I shall always love you dearly, and see you as often as I can.

"EVE."

Noah read this letter slowly and deliberately in a low, measured voice, but when he had finished it he laid it gently down, and burying his grand face in his brown hands, he sobbed as if his heart would break. Mrs. Oldman sat as if turned to stone, not so much by the news Eve's letter contained as by the effect it had on Noah; never in her life had she seen him so overcome. He had wept over the coffins of their little children, but not as he wept now; that weeping was but as the gentle overflowing of a peaceful river; this as the passionate heaving of a tempest-tossed sea, as violent and sudden as the storms which sweep over the broads. She dared not speak or stir lest Noah's strong emotion communicated itself to her, and tears of sympathy with him rolled down her cheeks; for herself she could not weep, her heart's desire was granted, Eve was married to Arthur Clifford, and with her marriage a load was taken off her mother's mind.

Presently the storm ceased, Noah's sobs died away almost as suddenly as they had begun, and then falling on his knees he exclaimed, "Thy will be done," and remained for a few minutes engaged in silent prayer.

Then he rose, and taking his wife's face in his hands, looked down fondly at her, and said—

"It is a sore trial, Mary; God give us grace to bear it; but I never thought Adam would have served me this trick."

"Adam! Adam Day! My poor old dear Noah, what are you thinking of? It ain't Adam she is married to; Eve cared no more for him than I do; he was a brother to her, but no more!" exclaimed Mrs. Oldman, rising to her feet in her excitement.

"Then who is it?" said Noah.

"Who should it be but Master Arthur, to be sure?—Squire Clifford—as she says in her letter; they have always loved each other, and there never was a prettier sight than to see those two together when they were little children.

You always said he was to marry Miss Grace, but I knew better—I have seen it a-coming for years; they were made for each other if ever a couple were; he tall and dark, she small and fair; he no great scholar, she clever, with more brains in her little finger than he has in his curly head; he idle at his books, she never so happy as when she is studying. God Almighty meant them to come together."

"Silence, wife! you don't know what you are saying. Almighty God never meant my little Eve to marry a gentleman, nor to deceive her parents," said Noah, sternly.

"And why shouldn't she marry a gentleman? Master Arthur ain't a penny too good for our Eve, and much as you think of Adam Day, he is no equal for her, who is as much of a lady, bless her, as Miss Grace up at the rectory, and cleverer and prettier too; though if you come to goodness, why, one is an angel and the other is nought but a human creature, with faults like the rest of us."

"Woman! You are daft; and so puffed up with pride you can't see an inch before you. No more of this; I forbid you to mention the subject again until I do. I am going to the rectory," and Noah walked gravely out of the house; but he had only gone a few steps when he turned back, for his conscience smote him for leaving his wife with such sharp words on his lips.

Mrs. Oldman was standing where he left her by the kitchen table, sobbing gently, and drying her eyes on the corner of her apron.

Noah took her plump, dimpled hands in one of his, and putting his arm round her substantial little figure, laid her comely head, with its soft brown hair, not yet silvered by time, on his breast, and kissed her silently.

"Oh, Noah, Noah, I am a wicked woman! You'd never forgive me if you knew how wicked," she sobbed.

"Mary, if you have had anything to do with this morning's work I forgive you, as I forgive her and him, from the bottom of my heart."

"I haven't! I knew no more than you, or at least very little; but oh, I am a wicked—But dear me, here is Parson and Miss Grace!" And Mrs. Oldman straightened her cap, and slipping away from her husband, blushed like a girl as she curtseyed to the Rector and Grace Leicester, who now entered the ark.

Mr. Leicester was always a grave-looking man, but he looked preternaturally grave this morning, and Grace was paler than ever, and seemed frightened and upset.

Noah was the first to speak.

"Good morning, Mr. Leicester. I see you know what has happened, and you cannot regret it more than I do."

"I don't know all, Noah; I wish I did. I have just found a letter on my study table from my ward, Mr. Arthur Clifford, telling me that before I read it he would be the husband of your daughter Eve, who, with all respect to you and her, is scarcely the person I should have wished to see his wife," said Mr. Leicester.

"Certainly not, sir. I entirely agree with you, and I can truly say I am as grieved to see my daughter married to a gentleman as you can be to see Mr. Arthur married to an eelman's daughter. If I could undo the marriage, sir, I would, but those whom God has joined together let not man put asunder," said Noah.

"But they are not married yet; Arthur says, 'I will telegraph the moment the marriage is celebrated, which will, I expect, be about half-past six o'clock.' It is now ten, and I have received no telegram. I therefore fear something has happened, and I came to suggest that you and I should go at once to Yarmouth and see. My boy is foolhardy, but he is as honourable a man as you or I. Matters have gone too far now, I suppose, for us to prevent it, if the marriage has not taken place. No, what I fear is there has been an accident. How they proposed to reach Yarmouth I don't know, but I imagine by water; and they must have left here by four, if they expected to get there by half-past six. Who is this man riding as if for his life? It looks like Adam Day," he added, abruptly, as a horseman galloped wildly up to the ark.

"So it is, sir. Where can he have been?" said Noah, as Adam, for it was he, dismounted, tied up the panting horse, and came towards them, presenting a strange figure.

He was in his shirt sleeves, and looked as if he had been half drowned, and had ridden some miles in his dripping clothes, as indeed he had.

"Adam, my lad, what is it?" said Noah.

"Bad news, Father Noah—terrible news, but it might have been worse," replied Adam.

CHRISTMAS PARTIES.

BY THE REV. T. F. THISELTON DYER, M.A.

CHRISTMAS gatherings a hundred years ago were not unlike those at the present day. However much the manners of modern society may have altered during the past century, we find little variation in the programme of merrymaking arranged for the parties of the young in olden times. Indeed no change of fashion could alter the leading feature of a Christmas party, namely, the idea of affording both old and young as much laughter and enjoyment as possible. Although dancing formed an attractive element of the evening's proceedings, yet it was not by any means the prominent diversion as nowadays, games of all kinds having been in popular requisition.

There was one advantage, however, which most Christmas parties in years gone by possessed, and which one would like to see introduced into the merrymakings of the present day—they commenced and ended early. The late hours to which even our juvenile gatherings are prolonged, would have found no favour with our forefathers, who believed in no exception to the rule "Early to bed," especially when young folk were concerned. This was a good old-fashioned arrangement, and precluded any objections that even the most rigid moralist might raise against such periodical scenes of dissipation. It should be remembered, too, that the times were more simple and unconventional, and the mode of procedure on such occasions was far less elaborate than nowadays. This, again, was worthy of our imitation, and in striking contrast with the costly and unnecessary extravagance which so often mars the homely simplicity of the Christmas party. And yet let it not be supposed that they were less hearty or inferior in thorough good merriment to the modern entertainments. If the preparations were less extensive, and the programme not so attractive as at the present day, there was, nevertheless, a greater amount of unstudied enjoyment—everyone deeming it right to contribute as far as possible to the evening's amusement. Hence looking back on the social history of years past, as recorded in contemporary literature, we get a clear insight into the manner that juvenile gatherings were usually conducted.

An amusing little book, called "Round About Our Coal Fire; or, Christmas Entertainments," gives a quaint account of the arrangements at such times. The rooms, we are told, were embowered with holly, ivy, cypress, bays, laurel, and mistletoe; and "a bouncing Christmas log in the chimney, glowing like the cheeks of a country maid." The servants were running here and there "with merry hearts and jolly countenances. Everyone was busy in welcoming of guests, and the maids were as blithe and buxom as in the days of good Queen Bess." In short, cheery good nature was the order of the day; and an earnest desire on all sides to make each little guest feel welcome and happy more than fully compensated for the lack of those amusements which are nowadays supplied by professional establishments.

Among the pastimes mentioned were the masqueradings, which were the signal for the utmost excitement. The young people dressed themselves up in the most ridiculous attire, and borrowed from every conceivable quarter any article of dress which might add to the eccentricity of their appearance. As may be imagined, there was no small rivalry as to who should most cleverly conceal or disguise his or her identity, all manner of artful contrivances being resorted to for this purpose. Occasionally, too, when their "make up" was complete and generally approved of, some of these juvenile masqueraders would slip out of the house and pay a visit to a neighbouring family, their approach being heralded by many a merry peal of laughter. It was a happy time, full of good nature and harmless fun, and cheered the old as well as the young. Of the many allusions to entertainments of this kind may be noticed the "Paston Letters," wherein we find a letter dated December 24th, 1484, which relates how Lady Morley, on account of the death of her lord, directing what pastimes were to be used in her house at Christmas, gave orders that "there were none disguisings, nor harping, nor luting, nor singing, nor none loud disports; but playing at the tables, and chess, and cards; such disports she gave her folks leave to play, and none other."

In modern times, perhaps, the nearest approach to these amusing "makes up" of past years are either charades or "tableaux vivants," in which young people ransack the wardrobes, laying their hands on anything which they consider suitable for the occasion. Indeed, it is the preparation for their juvenile display which oftentimes causes the greatest fun, besides affording an opportunity for the exercise of originality of design and ingenuity in utilising the most awkward and unpropitious materials.

At the conclusion of such entertainments dancing has generally formed the chief diversion, or as it was formerly nicknamed, "hopping;" for, as the same old writer says, "these dances stir the blood;" while those unable to join in this pastime have never failed to find equal pleasure in one of the many time-honoured English games, in which even "children of a larger growth" have whiled away many an hour. But in the course of years some of these harmless and once popular amusements have become almost obsolete, being nowadays rarely seen. Some of them might well be revived, and would doubtless prove as attractive in our modern juvenile gatherings as they did in days of long ago.

A game, for example, which often caused a considerable amount of laughter and excitement was known as "Dun in the Mire." The mode of procedure was somewhat after the following fashion:—A log of wood was brought into the middle of the room; this was nicknamed "Dun," or the carthorse, and a cry was made that he had stuck hopelessly in the mire. Instantly two of the young people, responding to the appeal, advanced, either with or without ropes, to draw him out. When unable to do so they in turn called for further help, and finally all the party joined in the game; poor Dun, of course, being eventually extricated. Meanwhile, however, no small merriment was caused by each person's sly efforts to let the log fall on his neighbour's toes. The popularity of this Christmas pastime may be gathered from the frequent allusions to it by old writers. Thus Shakespeare, it may be remembered, in Romeo and Juliet (Act i. scene 4), speaks of it, where Mercutio says to Romeo—

"Tut, dun's the mouse, the constable's own word:

If thou art dun, we'll draw thee from the mire."

Beaumont and Fletcher also, in The Woman Hater (Act iv. scene 3), refer to it:—

"Dun's in the mire; get out again how he can."

Chaucer, too, probably alludes to this old game in the Manciples Prologue, where the host, seeing the cook asleep, exclaims—

"Syr, what dunne is in the mire?"

Another diversion which was in request at Christmas parties was "hot cockles." This was a species of blindman's buff, in which the person kneeling down, and being struck behind, was to guess who inflicted the blow.

According to Strutt, in his "Sports and Pastimes," this pastime received its name from the French "hautes-coquilles," and is thus described by Gay in the following lines—

"As at hot cockles once I laid me down,
And felt the weighty hand of many a clown,

Buxoma gave a gentle tap, and I
Quick rose, and read soft mischief in her eye."

Then there was the old phrase "to sit upon hot cockles" which probably meant to be very impatient, as in the subjoined extract from a work of the beginning of the seventeenth century: "He laughs and kicks like Chrysippus when he saw an ass eat figs; and sits upon hot cockles till it be blazed abroad, and withal intreats his neighbours to make bone-fires for his good hap, and causeth all the bells of the parish to ring forth the peal of his own fame."

Again, oftentimes, "Handy-dandy" was the signal for a merry romp at the Christmas party. One of the party concealed something in his or her hand, making the others guess what was concealed. If the latter guessed rightly, he or she won the article; but if wrongly had to pay a forfeit of an equivalent value. Sometimes it would appear the game was played by a sort of sleight of hand, the article being rapidly changed from one hand into the other, so that the looker-on was easily deceived.

Such old games as snap-dragon and hide-seek are, however, as popular at our juvenile gatherings as in years past, although unfortunately some survive only in name. A game twice mentioned by Herrick, but not once explained, is "Fox i' th' hole," the allusion being thus—

"Of Christmas sports, the wassail bowl, That's tossed up after fox i' th' hole."

After the young people were fairly tired with dancing and romping, round games were next in request, these in their turn affording immense excitement. Then there are numerous allusions to the diversion known as "Questions and Answers," or as it was sometimes called "Questions and Commands," when, says the author of "Round About Our Coal Fire," "the commander may oblige his subject to answer any lawful question, and make the same obey him instantly, under the penalty of being smutted, or paying such forfeit as may be laid on the aggressor." The more intellectually inclined would play at "cap-verses," wherein one gave a word, to which another of the party gave a rhyme, and so on, much amusement being caused by the difficulty some would have of finding the suitable rhyme, and the foolish mistakes others would make; for which, of course, they had to pay in each case a forfeit.

Card-games, once more, have from time immemorial been an endless source of laughter at Christmas parties; a highly popular one having been known as "Post and Pair," an allusion to which Ben Jonson makes in his "Masque of Christmas."

"Now Post and Pair, old Christmas's heir,

Doth make a gingling sally;

And wot you who, 'tis one of my two Sons, card-makers in Pur-alley."

This game is included among the pastimes enumerated by Sir Walter Scott in his famous and graphic picture of Christmas Eve, given in "Marmion." It was played thus: Three cards were dealt to all, the excitement of the game consisting in each of the young people vying, or betting, on the goodness of his own hand. A pair royal of aces was the best hand, and next any other three cards according to their order. If there were no threes, the highest pairs might win. But round games of this kind were numerous, the forfeits being paid with sugar-plums. It is unnecessary to quote further instances of these harmless modes of merrymaking, which were the life and happiness of the young at Christmastime, and many of which might be with advantage revived at the present day. They had, too, this additional recommendation—they united old and young together; and whilst the former forgot for a few hours the more prosaic matters of life, the latter were proud of, and flattered by, the hearty interest displayed by their elders.

IN REGENT STREET.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

THE NEW VEIL.

FOLLOWING my usual habit, I will first notice the "cellular cloth," which has been brought out for underclothing, and for the manufacture of which a company has been established, with a central office in the city, and several in the West-end. The Sanitary Institute of Great Britain has given the medal of 1888 to this material, and the introducers of it claim for it a very high degree of value, as a hygienic covering. The method on which it is woven is intended to reproduce or simulate the arrangement of the pores of the human body; the intention being to allow free ventilation to the exhalations of the skin on the side of the cloth which covers the body; while the other side is differently woven, and its meshes are intended to protect the skin, and keep the air from it. The material used is cotton, as it is the cheapest, lightest, and most durable in character, and washes the best likewise. Nevertheless, for people who prefer silk, or woollen, or mixed fabrics of wool and cotton, wool and silk, or cotton and silk, the cellular cloth is woven in these combinations. These are, of course, more expensive, and they are said to remain quite as durable, and to wash as well. The introducers lay great stress on its extreme lightness and the absolutely free passage which it allows for the exhaled fluids of the skin. This last characteristic advantage, they claim, prevents the feeling of fatigue which is felt during long railway journeys, and which results from the skin being too closely wrapped up in impermeable clothing. The cellular cloth can be used for articles of every description, for clothing as well as for bedding, and for medical and surgical purposes likewise, as it is considered specially useful for bandages from its porous nature.

And now I must turn to the more practical question of made up materials and styles, and gather together such novelties as may be the most desirable for my readers. One of the very useful materials, and the most improved in manufacture, is the sealskin plush now seen in the shops, and so largely employed for over garments. For children it is very well suited, as it is both warm and light, and the whole suit, jacket, or coat, muff, and cap, are made alike. The "Granny bonnets" are a great deal worn by little girls this year in all colours; generally, however, they match the coat, and they are warm and sensible head coverings, and are sold ready-made at very reasonable prices.

Plush petticoats are much used by young girls of all ages, and are worn with woollen bodices, or plush bodices are used with woollen skirts. This seems the chief use of plush this winter, and it is much reduced in price. Braiding is very popular still, and is carried out with wide flat braid or cord, in very bold and extended designs, which are often more like appliqué than braiding. Silk embroidery is much used as a trimming for bodices, up the front, and over the shoulders as straps or epaulettes.

In the way of new colours we find russet in browns and reds, and also a copper red, all of them in great favour for dresses and mantles. Then there is "poplar green," "sylvan green;" and a greenish blue called "Rouen sweetpea" is a new shade which is violet and pinky. Both nut-brown and "beaver" are the favourite colours for the cloth gowns made up for weddings, and two dull hues, viz., grey and brown, are united together more frequently than any two shades of other colours. Black is universally used as a trimming, and is applied to any and every colour, in moiré silk, guipure, crochet, braid, fur, cord, and passementerie. Jet is very little seen, except for evening dress, but lace and all kinds of embroidered trimmings are as much used as they were in the summer season.

Plain ladies' cloth, now called "Amazon cloth," is as much liked as ever, and suits the "Empire" style of making up very well. The bordered materials in woollen seem to be decidedly popular, and from them we have doubtless obtained the idea of bordered silks, which are novel, but will be very difficult to manage in the making-up, on account of the narrow width of silk in general.

The small amount of material which seems contained in the skirts worn at present strikes one very much. All skirts hang from the band in plain straight folds. Many seen in town made of tweed, or some other thick stuff like it, such as homespun, have no fulness at all in front, nor at the sides; the backs having a few large pleats standing up, and the back is sometimes padded to serve the purpose of the ordinary cushion, and always having one steel at the top. No trains nor demi-trains are seen, even for dress, except on elderly people. All dresses are short, while those of the Empire period are short enough to show the feet. The Empire skirt is plain, gathered at the waist, not very full, and there are ruches round the edge. The rounded waist, of great length, and wide sash, such as worn under "the great Napoleon," do not become everyone, although they exactly suit young girls, and this mode of making is adaptable to all materials, whether costly or the reverse. Some of these Empire dresses have sashes which start under the arms, cross in front, and going round the waist, hang in large bows at the left side, the ends being long and touching the edge of the dress.

The dressing of the hair appears to be a little altered, and the small knot of hair at the very top of the head, which proved so very unbecoming to many people, is being slightly modified by degrees. It is lowered to the back of the head now, and is much more loosely twisted, so that it seems to have short curly ends escaping from it. The hair on the top of the head is waved, and the fringed part in front is brought more closely together in the centre. Hair in coils and twists on the top of the head has not, however, gone out by any means, and I was informed the other day that the Empire style of dress would bring in curls sooner or later. But of this I am not certain, as we are all of us too busy in these days for too much and too complicated styles of hairdressing, and curls generally represent much time and leisure. Our English ideas of clothing and style are not Greek—free and flowing—but trim, tidy, and "taut," as the sailors say, everything business-like and neat.

The Empire style has brought us back white muslin as a material for dress. The French call it "La Sainte Mousseline," and consider it the most suitable and becoming apparel for young girls. Some of the new muslin frocks are tucked to the waist, and are worn with very wide sashes of colour, sometimes velvet being used for them. Green is very much liked, and the sash, shoulder-bow, and fan should all be of the same hue. I hear that necklaces will soon return to favour, and I hope they will, for they are a very ancient form of ornament, and very suitable to youth, which is not allowed to wear many jewels of any kind.

I have tried to illustrate all manner of styles in fur, everything that is seen in town; and the general look of the new hats is extremely well given, so that my country readers will know what a winter hat should be like. Close-fitting hats and wide brimmed ones are equally worn, and both are apparently liked. Ostrich feathers have taken the place of the poor tortured wings and portions of birds which we have seen so long, and which have made us so extremely miserable, showing that all the cruel tales we have heard are true as to the widespread slaughter of God's feathered creatures, to feed woman's vanity and folly.

The long boas are as much used as ever, some of them being made of feathers; and fur-lined cloaks seem prevalent. The new long cape is shown on the right-hand side of the picture, "In Regent Street," and it seems a very useful garment, as it protects the back or the shoulders, which is a more exposed and delicate part of the lungs than in front. So long as the taste for tailor-made gowns continues, we shall find these capes and boas in favour. A new style of sealskin or sealplush mantle is shown in the centre figure, with long ends in front, and a waistcoat. This is a very favourite way of making mantles, and is becoming and pretty. The long fur mantles have nothing very new about them, saving their huge collars of fur, in which they have followed the style of men's coats.

The new veil which I have illustrated is a very useful article, and will be found a great protection against the winter's cold. It is a long piece of net with a drawing-string to tie, gathered round the neck, and it may be purchased ready-made at most of the shops in town, and may be of thick or thin net, according as required by the wearer.

The fur-trimmed jacket which is given in our illustration shows how these present styles have fur applied to them, and how the waistcoat is managed, which is usually of a different fur. The collar is large and important, and gives a more distinguished look to a small jacket than anything else could do.

Now that the Princess dress has come in so much I have thought it well to give a pattern suitable for a tea-gown or an ordinary dress, as a full front can be added without any trouble. There are seven pieces—two sleeves, collar and cuff, front, back, and side gore—and the pattern is simple enough to be made up at home; and although well fitting and carefully cut, will answer for a dressing-gown or a dress equally well. The Princess dress is considered by many to be the ideal form of dress, and many ladies have adopted it altogether, as it relieves the hips of weight, and the shoulders bear all weight, while supplying a well-fitting garment which will look well on all occasions.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker, care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.," price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county; and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may be always obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, the Lady Dressmaker selects only such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and re-making at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of the "G.O.P." may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic underclothing have already been given:—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's and plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing-jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke, blouse polonaise, princess dress or dressing-gown, Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, and plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; new tea-jacket, or après midi, for indoor wear; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, Emancipation suit, dress drawers, Canadian blanket dressing-gown, corselet bodice, new spring mantles, sling-sleeved mantle with pointed ends, small mantle with hood and sling sleeves, cape mantle without sleeves, polonaise with pointed ends, open-fronted Directoire jacket, honey-combed Garibaldi, tight-fitting jacket-bodice, Emancipation bodice, used as stays, new Directoire redingote, new princess dress with full back.

ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

RONDEAU.

ON Christmas Eve the children dance to bed;
Hushed then awhile their busy pattering tread,
Filled with sweet hopes they close their laughing eyes,
To open early with a glad surprise,
As from its pillow starts each curly head.

Ah! dear, small angels, now your prayers are said,
Doubt fades afar and sordid sin has sped;
So like the Christ-child each sweet urchin lies
On Christmas Eve.

To this bright goal for them the year has sped;
Its tears they knew not, nor its cares now dead;
The children's laughter only never dies,
They hold life's secret; they alone are wise
Who follow gladly where the Christ-child led On Christmas Eve.

GLEESON WHITE.

THE FAIRY-TALE SISTER.

By LILY WATSON.

HE winter twilight is creeping into the corners of a lofty hall and hanging dusky about the rafters and roof; the firelight is casting its fitful reflection on the wainscot and on the oaken beams overhead, while three earnest young faces gather around its glow. The two boys are silent, absorbed and eager; the girl is animated, and speaking rapidly. She is recounting a tale that, like the "Thousand-and-One Nights," goes on for ever. Its title is "The Young Talisman Seekers." Many and thrilling are the adventures through which her two heroes and two heroines pass, to win a talisman that perpetually eludes their grasp, and that when obtained shall set a lovely fairy princess free from the clutches of a wicked magician. Now they wander through a dread subterranean labyrinth threaded by a deep and sullen stream, and called the "Precipice Passage;" anon they enter the chill vastness of an ice cathedral; again they voyage over summer seas, visit islands of tropic loveliness, or even soar from star to star with some ethereal companion by their side. Air, earth, and sea yield up their mysteries to these intrepid children.

The story-teller's invention carries her along easily, but sometimes she tries to gain a moment's breathing-space for fresh flights, as she repeats dreamily, "And so they went on and on, and on." Then one of her brothers decisively interrupts: "And on," showing thereby that he is tired of the interval and ready for further incident without delay. That story never came to a conclusion. Night after night it continued, and it only broke off when the trio were separated by the ending of the happy days of childhood.

No tale the authoress has ever tried to tell in later years could give her more pleasure than this, and, though her public was limited, its appreciation was boundless.

Much has been written in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER as to the duties that are likely to fall within the sphere of its readers. Thoughts grave and gay on the responsibilities of home life, the best way to dress prettily and thriftily, to preserve health, to cook, to sew, to keep house, study, play the piano, to employ the fingers in a hundred deft ways for use and ornament—these abound in its pages. There is one function of the elder sister, aunt, friend, that is less frequently dealt with, and this is the art of story-telling.

It is, indeed, no trivial and unimportant accomplishment. Every girl who has to do with younger children knows the charm of a story, to soothe irritation, to engross restless energies, to bring a spirit of content and quiet into the turbulent nursery. And sometimes the beneficent art of story-telling assumes the character of a nobler ministrant still, lulling the weary little patient, chasing away the thought of pain, making the sick room for a while an enchanted dreamland, instead of the dismal prison shut in by four walls. The art is worth cultivating by all who have to care for children. And what girl or woman has not?

It is scarcely too much to say that an imaginative child mentally divides his friends into two classes—those who can and will tell him stories, and those who cannot or will not. There is no slight disappointment involved in the testy refusal, the laboured stupidity of a good-natured, foolish improvisation, or, far worse, the promise and the ironical repetition of some doggerel lines in mock fulfilment. Now the longing to hear stories is no mere childish whim; it is an actual need of the imagination, the satisfaction of which will do the child good besides making him happy. The story-teller in days of yore filled a very important function, on which a volume might be written. It may be remembered that in modern times Mr. Ralston has revived the art of fairy-tale telling in public, and in a modern novel by a well-known author the heroine makes it her profession.

Few chapters in biography are more charming than the story of the child Goethe and his bright young mother.

"Air, fire, earth, and water," says she, "I represented under the form of princesses, and to all natural phenomena I gave a meaning in which I almost believed more fervently than my little hearers. I was as eager for the hours of story-telling as the children themselves. I was quite curious about the future course of my own improvisation, and any invitation which interrupted these evenings was disagreeable. There I sat, and there Wolfgang held me with his large black eyes; and when the fate of one of his favourites was not according to his fancy, I saw the angry veins swell on his temples, I saw him repress his tears. He often burst in with—'But, mother, the princess won't marry the nasty tailor, even if he does kill the giant.' And when I made a pause for the night, promising to continue it on the morrow, I was certain that he would in the meanwhile think it out for himself, and so he often stimulated my imagination. When I turned the story according to his plan, and told him that he had found out the dénouement, then was he all fire and flame, and one could see his little heart beating underneath his dress!"

All that was best in the creative genius of Goethe owed its stimulus to the imagination of his girl-mother; and many another great poet has had, if the truth were known, some "Märchen-Tante," as the Germans say, some "fairy-tale aunt," who fed his youthful fancy with legends and romance.

It is absurd to frown, as many people do, on fairy tales as stuff and nonsense, and insist on telling children nothing but Goody Two Shoes stories that are just as unlikely to be true. The faculty of imagination ought to be encouraged, not regarded as a vagabond truant or a criminal, to be kept strictly within bounds or done to death! Why, even the man of science has need of imagination, to show him, as in a vision, the wonders of the past, the triumphs of the future. Every great achievement of humanity has been seen in imagination first before it became reality. Goethe said no man could be a naturalist without this faculty. Its possession adds delight as well as power to life. Fairy tales of the best kind, well told, are an admirable means of developing imagination.

Therefore, the arid relative who declares that fairy tales are a "parcel of rubbish," and the children's heads ought to be filled with something rational instead, is not so sage as he thinks himself. And the dreadful modern child who "knows there are no such things as fairies," will be none the better or the wiser for his conviction.

Granted, then, that fairy tales should be told, what is the proper way to tell a story?

The first essential is that the language should be suited to the listener. It is not necessary to choose short words, even for the baby, so long as they are words with which he is familiar. A little creature between two and three years of age will stand with great eyes fixed upon the face of the narrator and listen attentively to a long tale, if only it is brought within his grasp. Simplicity that is not laboured will ensure attention.

Another most important point is that the story must be told dramatically. Actions must be described, not merely mentioned. Who would care, for instance, to hear the lovely Greek legends told like this? "Once there was a man called Hercules, and he went into a desert place, and there he killed a monster called a Hydra," or "There was a young man called Perseus, and he flew through the air on winged sandals, to turn a thing called a Gorgon into stone." The mere enumeration of a string of incidents is not story-telling at all. Who has not heard the well-meaning drone from elder to younger: "So then he went," etc. "And then he did," etc. "And then they said," etc. What the hearer wants is to see the action done, the journey taken. The mind of a child asks for graphic details, and clings to them so tenaciously that not one must be omitted in the repetition of the oft-told tale. So there must be plenty of simple, vivid description. This is easily acquired by a little attention and practice; but without it no one can be a story-teller.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to add a third requisite—that the story must be told good-humouredly! It is not always easy to break the string of one's own thoughts and stoop to the level of the eager child-mind. But a story prefaced by "Oh, you tiresome little thing! Well, mind, I shall only tell you just this one," loses some of its sweetness of flavour.

It is not of course to be supposed that the poor "Märchen-Tante," or "Märchen-Schwester," is to be always at the beck and call of her young audience. It is a good plan to set aside one part of the day as the "story hour," or to utilise any special time when the sister has charge of the younger ones.

"But what shall I tell them? I don't know any stories!" some well-intentioned reader may ask, in dismay.

It is a delightful fact that a few stories will go a very long way with children. They like to hear the same one over and over again, especially when they are little; but the older they grow the more variety they exact. It is as well, first of all, to fix in the mind what should not be told to children, as this warm recommendation of fairy tales may seem to open the door to all sorts of supernatural horrors.

Nothing about ghosts, apparitions, or anything spectral should ever be told to a child. There is no inconsistency in saying this. Fairies, mermaids, dwarfs, genii, even ogres, are for the most part good company; children are delighted, and are not, unless in very exceptional cases, frightened by their wildest vagaries; but the shadowy regions of the dead are another matter, and everything ghostly must be strictly forbidden. It would be very curious to examine this point and see where the line of demarcation comes in, for there is all the difference in the world to the average child between the fairy tale and the ghost story. Anything that gives a weird and horrible turn to familiar life and familiar objects is frightful to a child, such as the "new mother with the glass eyes and wooden tail" in Mrs. Clifford's clever "Anyhow Stories," who, to the writer's thinking, is the most terrible invention of modern child-literature. But the fairy tale, on the other hand, lies frankly outside the regions of ordinary experience, and is accepted at once under these conditions. This, at least, is an attempt at explanation of a fact that will be acknowledged by all who have to do with story-telling to children.

It is as well to exclude, also, all stories that end horribly. Little Red Riding Hood, for this reason, is by no means to be told to very young children, unless the modern ending is adopted, by which the Green Huntsman kills the wolf, and even then the preliminary fate of the grandmother is not encouraging.

In the best popular fairy tales there is an excellent moral, and surely they are as good for the purpose of education as the old-fashioned nursery stories, where the good boys got all the plum-cake, and the bad ones were gored by bulls. Both are remote from actual everyday life, and only good allegorically; therefore one may as well derive the moral from the beautiful as from the ugly and sordid. In a story where obedience, faithfulness, tenderness, bravery appear as qualities to be admired; where trickery, cruelty, and deceit are held up to detestation, there is always a good effect on the listener's mind, and the greater his interest, the more enduring is the lesson.

Illustrations and examples of the fairy tales to be preferred shall be left to another chapter; but one word must be added to express the writer's conviction that, as a rule, the old fairy tales are far better than the new. The critical spirit of our age has crept even into its juvenile literature, and whereas the object of old fairy romance was to delight and charm, the object of the new seems to be to entertain grown-up people by sly side remarks to them, and rather to make the children laugh than to fascinate their imagination. The true fairy-tale lover, while he cannot but enjoy the clever modern story, delights in drinking deep draughts from the well of old romance, unpolluted by any nineteenth century elixir of doubt.

So, for the sake of the future of the children as well as their present pleasure, do what you can to develop this faculty of imagination. Tell them stories of boys and girls like themselves by all means; but do not omit the fairy tale, that carries them quite away from their childish world and opens the gates of an enchanted land. That land they may never wholly lose. In differing guise it may hover near them all their lives, and be to them even as Spenser called it centuries ago—"The world's sweet inn from care and wearisome turmoil."

BIRD LIFE IN JANUARY.

By A NATURALIST.

If snow has fallen heavily, covering the ground and drifting against the hedges, in many places the weight on the tops of the twigs will bow the hedge right over, forming a roof on the lee side. In and about such spots the birds gather for food and shelter. Driven to extremity, companions in misfortune, they mix with one another without regard to species. Robin redbreast makes friends with anyone that will feed him. The sparrows look out for stray crumbs and other small trifles, hunger putting shyness on one side for a time. They suffer for it, however, by getting under cinder sieves, propped on sticks with strings tied to them, to the great delight of the young trappers, when they hear the cry, Chivie! chivie! chivie! "Philip sparrow" is held in high estimation by the youngsters, and by many grown up country folks too, as a table bird. They often, with shovel and broom, clear a space in the stable yard, on which some oats and broken bread are scattered. Then ensues a regular uproar of chivics!

outgoings and incomings. Most energetic destroyers of insect pests they are. Greenflies they will collect in their mouths until they can hold no more; then off the male birds fly to feed their families.

No matter how many sparrows are about, directly the corn is cut away they go to the fields for about three weeks or a month; then they will certainly plunder a little and irritate the farmer: though, after all, the grains that fall in the fields yield them plenty to eat. I generally have either hawks or owls about race as pets; and when a farmer friend sends me the birds shot in the wheat as food for these, strange to say not one in seven is a sparrow.

If the snow gathers the birds will show signs of distress; they flutter where they settle, or rather flop down, for they are weak through want of food. The woodpigeons in hosts fly from their resting-place in the old beech woods, miles distant, for food. Hundreds of them are shot as they come on their feeding grounds in the woods and fields. The farmers can sell them; and, besides that, they have a deep-rooted dislike to all the pigeon family. "They does a mortal lot o' mischief, does them pigeins; they eats my turnmuts."

When hard pressed the pigeon will eat a portion of the tender green, but that is about all. If you examine the crop of any wood-pigeon, when the winter is moderately open, you will find in it acorns and beech nuts, as long as there be any to pick up; and when these fail, the crop will be found full of the seeds of two of the worst weeds the farmer has to contend with.

Yellow buntings, the yellow hammers of the children, with chaffinches, come round about the houses to see what they can find. Wag-tails also pay us some visits. By throwing out some mixed scraps from the dinner-table you can see at once what the natural food of a bird is. All truly insect-eating birds, such as wag-tails, go for the meat scraps in preference to the bread; little bits of fat suet are a delicacy to them. Each one in the flock of birds that, with drooping wings and tails, mournfully pray you to relieve their hunger, will pick his own morsel out from the mixed meal you may offer.

That digger of the ground, the rook—the farmer's best friend, suffers terribly if snow and frost continue. If it were possible to collect from the pouches of a dozen rooks all those insects which are noxious to the interests of the farmer, for only three months, it would stock an entomological museum; and yet he shoots them whenever he can, which is, however, not very often. Rooks leave their rookeries when winter draws near, and form vast colonies in the heavily timbered woods with a southern frontage if possible. Leaving their resting-place to gather what little food they can find, and returning early in the afternoon, they will get what they can from gardens and the public roads; but the frost bites keenly, and the stomach does not get very full, so that, with one thing and another, the birds are in poor trim. After a spell of very severe weather, you may find one at the foot of a tree dead, for the cold pinches him, hardly though he is. That numbing sleep comes over him which knows no awakening; his grasp on the branch relaxes, and with a thud he falls to the ground, frozen to death.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN A CRYPT.

By EVELYN UPTON.

THE little travelling clock on the mantel-piece had just struck four. Before its silvery chimes had died away the great bell of the Cathedral boomed out the hour. There was something so grand and solemn in the slow majestic tones that they always reminded me of the opening chords of Handel's "Dead March." Each time they struck the hour I heard in them a requiem for the countless souls who had passed away during the last sixty minutes.

Four o'clock! That meant I was free to leave the great oriel window where I had been reading for the last hour, and I might now with a clear conscience indulge in a little blind man's holiday. It was too early to have lights, and it was too dark to see to read with comfort. So I drew one of the easy chairs close to the fire, threw myself into it, and then having stirred up the coals into a bright blaze, and taken off my shoes the better to enjoy the warmth, I gave myself up to a delicious fit of maiden meditation. I don't think anything very weighty was passing through my mind; as far as I can remember, my thoughts were about as aimless and colourless as a young girl's firelight musings usually are.

It only wanted a fortnight to the shortest day, and the December afternoon had been very dark and unusually silent and oppressive. There was not absolutely a fog, but the atmosphere was in just that condition that is neither rain nor mist, but is as cheerless and unsatisfactory as either.

Although I was in the spring-time of my years, my life at the Deanery bore a certain resemblance to the grey winter afternoon. My grandfather, the Dean, was nearing seventy, and spent the greater part of his time in his study. Consequently I, the only other inmate of the house with the exception of the servants, was left very much alone. In the summer I went for long visits to my other relations, but the winter I always spent at Worsboro Deanery. It was, in fact, the only home I had. My father was serving in the Indian army, and was then stationed with his regiment on the frontiers of Afghanistan. The prospect was always held out to me of some day joining him in India, but I was persuaded my stepmother was not anxious for my company, so there were always obstacles in the way of its fulfilment. I used often to think longingly of all the gaieties and delights of a life in India, but whenever I mentioned the subject to my grandfather he always said it would break his heart to part with me, so I was obliged to keep these longings to myself.

My meditations were somewhat summarily interrupted by steps outside the drawing-room door. The next moment it opened and James announced Miss Williams. I jumped up, hurriedly thrust my feet into my shoes, and came forward to receive my guest.

A young, clear voice exclaimed, quickly—

"Oh, don't let me disturb you. You look so deliciously comfortable sitting there in the firelight. This is lovely," throwing herself into the opposite armchair. "I may take off my jacket, mayn't I? Please don't have lights on my account," as James, after closing the shutters, was preparing to light the gas.

"Well, then, if you prefer it we will wait till tea comes in," and I gave the order to James.

"If I had known you were sitting here all alone, I would have come in sooner," she went on, as James closed the door.

"Well, you know I always am alone," I answered, a little petulantly.

"Except when you have callers, and that happens pretty frequently. I can sympathise with you, as I am just in the same boat. And I can tell you the Archdeaconry is a dull hole—no disrespect to my uncle and aunt; but how can it be otherwise with aunt a constant invalid, and uncle more or less busy with cathedral or diocesan affairs?"

"But I suppose your visit is nearly ended?" I asked, regretfully; for I knew how much I should miss her bright, lively chatter.

"Over, indeed! Why, I just heard this morning that I shall have to spend Christmas here. Will is much better; but the doctor won't hear of my returning home for another month."

I sympathised duly, and she went on to tell me of her family concerns.

"I ought not to complain," she said, at length. "Uncle and aunt are very good to have me here, but you see they are both such elderly people, and with Christmas coming on one does long for a bit of fun. Why, I declare, to-day is only just a fortnight off Christmas Day. How are you going to celebrate it?"

"There will be the decorations in the Cathedral," I suggested, mildly.

"My dear child," she said, laying down the screen with which she was shading her face, and raising her pretty eyebrows in surprise, "do you call that any excitement? Have you no parties in prospect? Surely there will be some coming off in Worsboro."

"The Maynard Wilsons are giving a party on the thirty-first," I observed, indifferently. "They sent me an invitation, which I declined."

"What on earth did you do that for? You might have smuggled me in as your friend."

"Why, the last time I was at one of their parties they treated me so rudely I vowed I'd never go to another," I answered, reddening.

"Oh, I don't look for manners in Worsboro," Mona retorted, with a superior air. "But what a shame, and you the handsomest girl there, I've no doubt."

Of course I disclaimed the compliment, but I remember I had felt painfully that if I had been as ugly as any old crone I could not have been more neglected. The entrance of James with the tea made a pleasant diversion, but though I turned the conversation off on to church decorations, Mona soon brought it back again to the same subject.

"I see we shall have to invent our own amusements," she said, with a merry little laugh. "I mean to have some larks on Christmas Eve, as sure as I sit here. And I mean you to share in them, too. Oh, don't shake your head so ominously; I won't do anything very shocking. But a Christmas Eve without any fun would simply be an anomaly. Why, at home our Christmas Eve parties have been the best of the whole year."

And she went off into glowing descriptions that made my mouth water.

But we both agreed that, owing to our peculiar circumstances, it was quite out of the question to attempt to celebrate Christmas with any such festivities. And then we began to discuss various schemes, all more or less impracticable. Mine, she said, were much too commonplace, and hers were certainly too far-fetched. We were still laughing over the absurdity of her proposition, when James's demure face again appeared in the doorway, announcing Mr. Morgan, the Minor Canon and Precentor of Worsboro Cathedral. Mona was lying almost at full length in the large armchair, in the easiest, most unconstrained of attitudes, dangling her hat in one hand, her well-shaped little head, with its wealth of red-gold hair, framed in the dark cushions of the chair. With her fair complexion and merry blue eyes she was undeniably pretty; but I always thought her greatest charm was her superabundance of vitality. There was something exhilarating and refreshing in the very contact with a creature so full of young life and buoyancy. As she turned her inquiring eyes to the door I saw a faint blush spread over the pale cheeks of the Minor Canon. His lank dark hair, long face, and eye-glasses gave him a prim, old-world aspect quite in keeping with the traditions of the place. Music was his strong point; on every other he was best described by negatives. He was at home, in the sense of being at his ease, nowhere but in the Cathedral choir.

"I wish to have a few minutes' talk with the Dean before service," he said, very apologetically, as he located himself stiffly in a chair, refusing my proffered cup of tea. "I believe he is at home?"

"Yes, I think so. He will be here directly." And then there was a pause. I was preparing to make some common-place remark on the weather, when Mona rose to go.

"I know aunt will be sending the crier round the town," she said with a silvery laugh, "if I don't return immediately."

"Won't you wait five minutes longer and allow me to see you across the minster yard?" Mr. Morgan asked.

"Oh, dear no, thank you, certainly not! I'm not afraid of ghosts," with what I thought unnecessary vehemence.

"I shan't let him have that great honour," she said, with twinkling eyes and a little disdainful moue as we stood for a moment in the corridor. "Well, good-bye, dear, and trust me to find out some way of spending Christmas Eve profitably."

During the next few days I was constantly meeting Mona, and our friendship advanced with rapid strides. We often discussed Christmas Eve, but without arriving at any satisfactory conclusion. At last I began to think she had given up the idea. But one afternoon, about four days before Christmas, she came into the Deanery drawing-room in high spirits, and, scarcely waiting to kiss me, she burst out with—

"It's all right, Grace. I've settled it all!"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, our plans for Christmas Eve, of course!" throwing herself down excitedly into the easy chair. "It'll be the greatest fun imaginable, and the best of it is that we owe it all to old Mr. Propriety." (Her irreverent designation for the Minor Canon.) "He dined with us last night; it wasn't a dinner-party, only just he and Dr. Wayland, and of course he took me in. I told aunt I would rather Dr. Wayland did, but she wouldn't hear of it. She said the Minor Canon took precedence of the Cathedral organist. So I snapped at him politely: all through dinner, but I think he rather liked it, poor dear!" (My own opinion was that he would like anything Mona said or did.) "And then, I don't know how it was, but we got on to the subject of courage. And he spoke very slightly of women's courage, said they were afraid of insects and dark rooms. So, to prove how wrong he was, I declared I would cross the crypt at midnight. And he dared me to do it! But I will, and what's more, we'll go there on Christmas Eve." And she clapped her hands delightedly.

I believe my teeth chattered in anticipation, for of all weird, gruesome places to visit at night the crypt of Worsboro Cathedral was about the worst. It had long enjoyed the reputation of being haunted, and even those among the inhabitants of the precincts who by day laughed at the groundless superstitions, as they called them, were known to carefully avoid passing its one aperture by night. A host of obstacles instantly presented themselves to my mind.

"It would be a very novel way of spending Christmas Eve, certainly," I answered, in a dismayed tone; "but I don't see how we could manage it. Of course all the Cathedral doors are locked and bolted at night."

"There would be no difficulty about the locks. I should borrow uncle's key. It always lies on his study table."

"But the bolts," I urged. "You can't undo them from the outside."

"Oh, you little goosie! How do you suppose the verger lets himself out? I know he always goes out by that little door in the south transept, and uncle's key fits that lock."

"Well, supposing we could get into the Cathedral, how should we manage to get into the crypt? That must be kept locked up too."

"Oh, I'll manage all that. Leave it to me."

"But I'm sure I couldn't get out of the house without being heard. Grandpapa often doesn't go to bed till twelve o'clock."

"You could come and stay the night with me. Uncle and aunt would be only too happy, if I wished it." Thus as quickly as I raised any objections they were smoothed away, and Mona at last dragged a somewhat reluctant consent from me.

"If you'd rather not come I'll go by myself," she exclaimed; "only I fear Mr. Morgan might be inclined to doubt my unsupported testimony, whereas he would never dare to question anything you said."

Of course I instantly assured Mona that I should like it of all things, and that I would not be left out on any account. And when this was settled it was time to go to the Cathedral service. But I fear that all the time my thoughts were far more occupied with our coming adventure than with my devotions, and later on, when I was alone in my room, dressing for dinner, I began to repent of my newly-given promise. The idea of my crossing the Cathedral vaults at midnight! I, who since my return from school, seven years ago, had never gone to sleep without having first made a careful and minute examination of the room, peering under the bed for some hidden burglar, opening the doors of the wardrobe, and squeezing the dresses inside, looking behind the curtains, and sometimes when I was feeling particularly lonely, even poking into an ottoman which I knew could by no possibility afford concealment to any human creature short of an infant or a midget. And even after all these elaborate preparations I used to lie shivering and shuddering if I heard unusual noises in the house or in the precincts; but I determined to stand by Mona, and I would not show the white feather.

So the days passed on, and Christmas Eve arrived. In the morning Mona ran in for a few minutes to give me final instructions, and we did not meet again until the eight o'clock evening service in the Cathedral. It was a special service for Christmas Eve, and in place of an anthem we had the Christmas portions of the Messiah most beautifully sung. In his rendering of the Pastoral Symphony Dr. Wayland quite surpassed himself. The notes positively trembled on the hushed air. One could almost hear the flutter of the angels' wings as they were descending from heaven to earth. I had never heard anything so exquisite before on the Cathedral organ, and I have never listened to the Pastoral Symphony since without recalling that evening.

We did not get out of the Cathedral much before ten o'clock. I went back with Mona to the Archdeaconry, as it had been arranged I should spend the night there. Tea was brought into the drawing-room, but we soon said good-night to the Archdeacon, and went up to Mona's room. Mrs. Lydstone had retired an hour or two ago; indeed, the whole household seemed to keep early hours. Obeying Mona's injunctions, I lay down dressed on the outside of the bed and closed my eyes. She sat up reading by the firelight.

As twelve o'clock struck we noiselessly left the room, crept down the back stairs, and stole into the kitchen, and thence into the adjoining pantry. I gave a sigh for the comfortable bed and the warm room I had just left, but I could see from her radiant face that Mona was thoroughly enjoying the adventure. She had wrapped herself up in a large cloak, and drawn the hood over her head, and in her hand she carried a dark lantern.

Letting herself and me out by the pantry window only a few feet from the ground, she closed the outside shutter behind us. In two minutes more we had crossed the paved yard, passed through the bolted door in the wall, and reached the south transept door of the Cathedral, from which it was only divided by a few feet of ground. As Mona fitted the key in the lock I gave a hurried glance round. It was a fine but very cloudy night, and there was a bright crescent moon. No one was within sight or hearing, and the tombstones in the adjoining grass-plot stood up gaunt and weird in the moonlight. The next moment, and we were within the Cathedral. An unspeakable stillness and solemnity brooded over the whole building. With the aid of the lantern we picked our way across the transept and paused when we reached the choir screen. The moon shining in through one of the south-east windows of the clerestory sent a ray of silver light across the chancel, and touched the foremost pillars of the nave. The rest of the great nave lay in the deepest shadow, and the heavy Norman pillars and massive arches loomed dim and indistinct in the darkness, giving an unreal sense of height and vastness. Mona broke out with an exclamation of delight.

"Now I do call this jolly! How grand and solemn it looks! Can't you fancy that the spirits of the departed may be assembling all among those pillars and arches, come back to revisit their fine old Cathedral on Christmas Eve?"

"Oh, don't!" I implored, clutching at her arm. "Do let's get away!"

My cheeks were as pale as the moonbeams, and my heart was beating violently. She patted my hand encouragingly.

"They won't hurt us."

"Oh! but I'm so afraid some living man may be hidden somewhere, and may pounce upon us and murder us," I whispered, in terrified tones.

"Nonsense, Grace! Who ever heard of a murder in a Cathedral since Thomas à Becket was slain, and that was I don't know how many hundreds of years ago."

Only partially reassured, I hurried her through the deserted and silent choir, and then out by a side door which led round to the Lady Chapel; and passing that, we came at length to the door of the crypt. With a little pressure it yielded to the key, and after carefully locking the door behind us we went down some dozen or more well-worn stone steps and stood in the crypt. Now that we were there at last my one consuming idea was to get the terrible ordeal over as quickly as possible. Mona, pitying my too evident fright, proposed I should keep guard at the door while she went inside. But this I refused to do. On all accounts I preferred to stick by her, come what might. The crypt was not usually shown to visitors, as it contained nothing of general interest, and I had only once been inside, many years ago. It extended under the choir and the two transepts, and was pitch dark. But by the feeble light of the lantern we made out by degrees the vaulted roof and low arches and pillars running down either side. The air was full of dank, unwholesome smells, and the atmosphere together with the black solitariness were enough to upset any woman's nerves. I detected a fall in Mona's voice.

"Well, it is a nasty, gruesome place! I don't think anyone would come here by choice. All the more credit to us! But we'll walk to the end and back again."

The stone floor was very uneven and broken up in several places, and we had to tread cautiously. Suddenly we stood still as the lantern revealed straight in our path some planks laid round a freshly-opened grave. We looked at one another in horror, and Mona exclaimed, with a slight shudder—

"This is more than we bargained for! We'd better get on."

The first sickness of fright had passed off, and a sort of dogged indifference was stealing over me. I thought I was getting impervious to shocks, but I felt tongue-tied and could only articulate with difficulty, as I followed close behind Mona, who now insisted on leading the way with the lantern. But we had hardly gone a step or two further before she tripped and fell, uttering a little stifled cry. At the same instant the lantern flew out of her hand and came crashing down on to the stone floor. The glass broke and the light went out. Almost before I could help her Mona had picked herself up, exclaiming—

"Oh, never mind; this is nothing! I'll light it again directly. I brought some matches with me."

But, alas! the matches were of the sort which "light only on the box," and no amount of striking would make them ignite. As Mona realised the grim fact she went off into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, in which, though I knew it was artificial and horribly ill-timed, I was forced to join, for fear of doing something worse. And it gave momentary relief to my overwrought nerves.

"Now I do call this amusing! This is a bit of Christmas fun with a vengeance. Oh, you poor Gracie," catching my hand, "I have got you into a fix!"

Amusing! for two young girls to be shut up alone in a pitch dark vault at midnight, with the dead lying all around, with a yawning grave close at hand, and far away from all possibility of succour! All the stories I had heard of the crypt being haunted, all the tales I had ever read of murders and dark tragedies which never saw the light of day, came swarming into my brain. As if guessing my thoughts, Mona said, bravely—

"There's nothing really to be afraid of in the darkness. We are on consecrated ground, and I always feel as if the angels must be very near the earth at Christmas time. We shall easily find the door again; I know just where it is, and when once we are in the Cathedral the moonlight will show us the way."

"But there's the open grave," I whispered, in awe-struck tones. "I think we'd better stay where we are."

"Oh, dear, no! I'm not going to spend a night here. I'll grope about on my hands and knees till I reach the steps, and if you hold on to my skirts you can pull me back when I find I'm near any dangerous part."

So we set off on all fours. The comicalness of the situation drew forth every now and then from Mona little stifled bursts of laughter, but to me it was a very grim sort of joke. Our progress was very slow. We seemed to be perpetually edging up to some tombstone or other, and then retreating away from it, and I was seized with the horrible idea that all the time we might be going in the opposite direction to the entrance, and should never reach it.

Hark! What's that? An eerie uncertain sound, which seemed to come from the other end of the crypt, had suddenly arrested us. My heart stood still. Now, then, the tragedy was going to be enacted. There it was again—more distinct still—a sort of weird rustling! We both started to our feet and strained our ears to listen.

"It does not come from the door. It sounds like someone getting out of a grave," I breathed into Mona's ear.

"I don't mind anything human, but I can't stand the supernatural!" she gasped out, with expiring heroism.

Three more seconds of tortured suspense—then a pale, cold gleam of unearthly light, and a tall phantom figure in a long white robe, with both hands outstretched, was advancing towards us. For one instant we stood transfixed. Then I gave a wild shriek that made the vaulted roof ring again. Mona's hand clasped in mine grew suddenly deadly cold, relaxed its hold, and she dropped down senseless at my feet.

* * * *

A very well-known human voice recalled me to myself, and the next moment the Minor Canon was bending over the prostrate form of Mona. He took her up in his arms as if she had been a baby, directing me to precede him with the relighted lantern, and before I had recovered from my surprise I found myself safely outside the dismal crypt. Mona was laid on the Cathedral floor, and the purer air and a little gentle chafing soon brought her round again. (She always averred that a pair of lips touched her brow. If so they were not mine!) Her first words on regaining consciousness were, "But we did cross the crypt by night."

As we re-traversed the Cathedral, leaning on either arm of the Minor Canon, he gave us the explanation of his timely appearance. It was simple enough. After the service he went back to supper with Dr. Wayland, and they lingered over musical scores till midnight. Then, as it was raining sharply, the organist sent him back in his long white macintosh. But in passing the outlet of the crypt he saw a faint spark of light inside. Struck by the unusual occurrence, and remembering his conversation with Mona, he determined to satisfy himself on the subject. As he entered the vault by the very same door as ourselves, the moon at that moment breaking through the clouds gleamed in brightly through the grated aperture, and produced the sudden white light. Our heated imagination, and brains bewildered by the darkness, had done the rest.

When Mr. Morgan parted from us at the garden door, womanlike, Mona would have the last word.

"It was all your fault, Mr. Morgan. You dared me to cross the crypt at midnight!"

A dangerous light illumined his face, as he held her hand lingeringly in his and answered firmly—

"I never doubted your bravery, Miss Williams, but I shall think more highly of woman's courage after this."

Several years have passed since then, and Mona is now the wife of the Minor Canon. She refused him the first time he asked her.

"It was very pretty of him to come to our rescue and to say nothing about it afterwards," she said, naively; "but I can't see that I'm called upon to marry a fossil like that just out of gratitude." Nor I either. But when he repeated his request she changed her mind and accepted him. And she tells me she has never regretted the decision. She and I have had many a laugh over the adventures of that Christmas Eve; but neither of us has ever felt the least desire to repeat the experiment.

A GIRLS' TOUR IN BRITTANY.

CHAPTER III.

PONT Aven "may be described without much exaggeration as occupied, possessed, and dominated by foreign artists, with a sufficient number of the original race left to serve as models for the invaders." The reason of this is not at first sight evident. The houses which surround the village green are not specially quaint or characteristic, nor is the scenery strikingly beautiful. But there is a lovely river flowing swiftly through beech-woods, banked in with mossy rocks, now flecked with sunbeams, now lost in profound shadow; there are water-mills, rustic foot-bridges, and lower down, where the river widens, sailing boats come up, thus forming another class of subjects. The charming costumes of the peasants, and the ease and simplicity with which they pose, are also points of importance. The cap has long ends pinned on the top of the head, giving the effect of wings, if starched, but falling more gracefully if of a thick, soft twill. The collar is ten or twelve inches deep, finely plaited, and often edged with lace; the bodice, as usual, cut square at the throat, and filled in with white.

The animated scene at the washing stations is of unfailling interest to artists. This phase of Breton life is thus described by the author of "Guenn." "Going to the river was an event which took place two or three times a week at Plouvenec, but its frequency made it none the less delightful to Guenn. All the women clustered on the bank, kneeling and washing their linen, and spreading it out to dry on the clean grass, reeds, brambles, and tufts of heather and brake; and everything, positively everything, that had happened in Plouvenec since last time—with much that had not—related in stirring style by practised tongues. . . . Girls who had mothers rarely went to the river very young. Even here, where childhood is so unguarded, there was a tacit understanding that it was in a certain sense a decided step in a girl's life, a crisis when she first went to the river."

The women kneel in wooden trays. We noticed one woman on a sort of fence or pier which ran into the centre of the stream, soaping, rubbing, pounding with a flat wooden paddle. She wore sabots, a black bodice, and a thick skirt of bright scarlet cloth; in kneeling her stiff collar turned up behind her head like an aureole. Some large white ducks were swimming about, and tiny children paddling on the stones.

An old woman, whom we found knitting outside her cottage door, and who allowed us to sketch her, invited us into her house, and gave us the opportunity of making acquaintance with a Breton interior. The room was small and dark, and the floor of uneven mud. Fowls walked about or perched on the furniture, which was massive and handsome, and polished to a degree which would have won even Mrs. Poyser's approval. There were two four-post beds, each with thick feather beds and thick goose-down coverlets, cupboards with handsome steel hinges, a quantity of good crockery arranged on shelves against the wall, an eight-day clock, a long oak table, and two benches with backs. In the open fireplace was set a mysterious witches' cauldron, over two or three bits of smouldering wood. It was only revealed to us by a shaft of sunlight coming down the chimney.

We had often noticed before in Brittany the incongruous combination of Irish squalor with north-country cleanliness and comfort. One sees a farmyard, ankle deep in mud, straw and manure, in which animals of various kinds are wallowing, and yet at the door may be set a brass pan, nearly a yard in diameter, gleaming like the sun, and through the window one catches a glimpse of snowy bed curtains. We often saw four beds in one room, sometimes arranged in two or three tiers like the berths of a ship. It occurred to us that the men were lazy and uninventive, while the women did their very best in their department.

In the evening forty or fifty persons, chiefly artists of all nationalities, sat down to table d'hôte at the Hotel des Voyageurs. The panelled dining-room is covered with studies and spirited sketches executed by the artist visitors, and to their taste we attributed the good decorations in the large new salon.

We left Pont Aven after two days, feeling rather overpowered by the great artistic talent there. If we chose a secluded spot from which to sketch, we were sure to notice in a short time four or five real artists unfurling umbrellas, setting up easels, and establishing themselves in front of several square feet of canvas. Our feeble light was quenched by the fear that we were appropriating a "reserved seat," and thus retarding an immortal work of art. Mlle. Julie Guillon provided us with a carriage for Quimperlé (price 8frs.), where we established ourselves for four days at the Hotel de Lion d'Or. We were apparently the only ladies there; our landlord was most attentive, and very anxious to make us comfortable. He was constantly proposing excursions by river or carriage with himself and a "Monsieur Anglais," and was surprised that a day's sketching afforded us greater satisfaction.

We suffered more at Quimperlé than elsewhere from the unwelcome attentions and criticisms of street children. At length we discovered their school hours, and only went out when they were safely immured. When we saw them making for us with a triumphant halo, their hands and mouths crammed with the dinner they intended to devour while hanging over and pushing against us, we quietly folded our campstools and went indoors. Before devising this strategic movement we were almost driven to distraction, for the grown-up people did nothing to keep them in order, but gazed from their shop doors at the increasing crowd with the utmost apathy.

One boy was extremely amusing; with an inch of pencil which he sharpened with a huge hedger's knife and a copy-book, he proceeded to imitate all we did. We were sitting at the foot of a steep street of steps when a boy was seen tearing down these steps to join the crowd. Our special tormentor called out to him to stop at a certain point, saying we wanted to sketch him; insisted on his placing his foot or arm in a certain position, and kept the unfortunate victim in one place for five or ten minutes by crying out, "Elles sont à faire tes jambes," "Elles sont à faire ton bras." At last the deluded one was invited to resume his headlong career in order to see the result of our skill. Great was his chagrin at perceiving no vestige of himself in the sketch. Another victim would then be made, and the same far repeated time after time.

Quimperlé is charmingly situated at the junction of the rivers Elle and Isole, which flow in a united stream, the Latia, through steep wooded banks. The church of St. Michel stands on an eminence, surrounded by the old town. Except for the beauty of its position and of one lovely porch, it boasts no special attraction. On Sunday the church was so full two white-capped girls had knelt down in the porch, and were there joining in the service; they formed a perfect picture, wearing black dresses with the favourite trimming, broad black ribbon velvet; one of them had on an apron of the colour of an autumn beech leaf, or bright rust, and against her lay a green cotton umbrella; as the other one knelt an underskirt of scarlet was visible, and round her waist was the band of her apron, the bright blue so often seen in the Virgin's robe.

The women are often very good-looking, almost always pleasing. The men are solemn; they wear a felt hat with ribbon ends, and a coat shorter than an Eton jacket, profusely ornamented with buttons. Being tall and thin, they look like overgrown schoolboys, while the boys look like dwarfed old men, for they are dressed just the same, and the probability of their growth has not been forgotten by the tailor.

We had not time to make the excursions to St. Barbe, Faut, the Rochers du Diable, and the Forest of Carnoët.

We left Quimperlé at 2.15 on Sept. 27th for Auray. Through a foolish mistake we did not stop at Hennebont, a quaint old town, the scene of the exploits of the celebrated Duchess of Montfort, Jeanne la Flamme, who successfully defended the town, in the absence of her husband, until succour arrived from England.

Auray was in gala attire, some sort of agricultural show being in process. The women wear a most peculiar cap. It consists of a close-fitting crochet under-cap, over which is laid a square piece of fine net with a broad hem; it is slightly caught together at the back, but towards the face falls plain and square. In walking the cap catches the wind, and the square corners blow back with a pretty effect. Delicate coloured cashmere shawls (pale blue, fawn, or grey) are worn round the shoulders, and tucked under the apron bibs. This rather trying costume suited extremely well the handsome Auray faces.

The church is ugly, with a vulgar gilt altarpiece and a painted ceiling. The view from the tower is very fine, commanding the distant Atlantic, Quiberon Point, St. Michael's Carnac, Lockmariaker, and the windings of the river.

Next day we woke up to find fine rain falling, but hoping the day might improve we started at 10.50 for Plouharnel, the station for Carnac. On arriving there we were taken possession of by Mlle. Gaillard, daughter of the proprietor of the Hotel de Commerce. Rather against our better judgment (as it still rained fast) we agreed to go to Lockmariaker as well as to Carnac. The Peninsula of Lockmariaker hems in the little Morbihan Sea on one side, as does the Peninsula of Rhys on the other. There is to be seen the largest menhir, 60 feet long, fallen and broken; and from thence one can go by boat to the Island of Gave Inis, where is a wonderful stone gallery covered with unexplained sculptures or engravings.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

HOUSEKEEPING.

HOUSEMAID.—To clean straw matting you should not use soap. Dip a large coarse cloth in salt and water only, and rub it the way of the straw, not across it, and then wipe dry. The salt will prevent its turning yellow. No soap should be used in cleaning oil-cloth, neither should hot water nor a brush be employed, or the paint will come off. A large soft cloth dipped in plain cold water will serve to clean it well. Papier maché articles also will not bear soap nor hot water. Sponge them with cold water, dredge them with fine flour before dry, and then polish with a soft flannel. But ask your mistress's leave before you touch these latter delicate articles, as she may prefer to clean them herself.

SARAH and NURSE.—If you keep some camphor in the cupboard the ants will avoid it. They dislike strong scents, and if you do not keep food nor wearing apparel in the cupboard, you might dip a small sponge in tobacco-water or creosote, and leave it there, with the same result, having first washed the shelves with strong alum and water. "Nurse" should lock the cupboard while using these things, lest the children get at them.

MISCELLANEOUS.

M. A. C.—A crown-piece of William III. of England is worth about 15s., and a half-crown of George II. perhaps 5s.; that is if both be in good preservation. Modern foreign coins are of no extra value in this country, and you would probably get nothing more for them than their value in silver. It is impossible for us to be certain about the value of any coin, of course, unless we could see it, and we can only give their present values so far as they are known. A Washington "cent" would be worth about 2s. if in good condition.

M. L.—Martin, from whose name the feast called "Martinmas" was named, or rather who was himself the object of commemoration, was also distinguished as giving a name to a certain season of the year, fine weather setting in on the 11th of November being called "St. Martin's summer" in France and Switzerland. This saint was the Bishop of Tours (France), and died A.D. 400, having specially distinguished himself in destroying the heathen altars and images of false gods, which in his day still existed, and which he could not tolerate within his episcopate, held by him for upwards of twenty-six years. This year the Swiss have been enjoying a magnificent Eté de St. Martin, after a very changeable summer season, such as we have ourselves experienced.

MARIANNE.—The wearing of "châtelaines" is of very ancient date. Our own Saxon ladies wore them, and various appliances of the toilet were suspended to them, such as tweezers, nail-arrangers, etc. 2. Introduce the youngest to the elder of two persons who wish to be acquainted, the person of inferior rank to the superior, and a man to a woman. To explain, you should say "Allow me to introduce," or "to present, Mr. So-and-So," and then say, "Mrs. So-and-So," or whatever the prefix to the name may be.

ALICE BLANE.—The real name of "Robin Hood," the famous outlaw of the time of Henry II., A.D. 1160, was Fitzooth, the Earl, it is believed, of Huntingdon. He spent his fortune, and then took to the woods as a freebooter, having been outlawed. His companion (among others), nick-named "Little John," was one Nailor, a gigantic man. His reputed grave, at a village in Derbyshire, was a subject of much speculation; and the local traditions respecting his residence and decease at that place were called in question. For the sake of the historical and archaeological interest connected with it, the rector permitted the grave to be opened a few years ago. This settled the question, and confirmed the traditions of the place, for a gigantic skeleton was found to occupy it, it is said of fully seven (if not of upwards) feet in height. 2. Indigestion or acidity produce hiccup; swallowing a small piece of ice or taking a dose of magnesia may cure it.

A CAPE GIRL.—We were much interested in your letter. Do not listen to the conversation of those who would draw you away from the faith of Christ, and dishonour your blessed Redeemer; and unless very well taught in the answers to their infidel objections, do not attempt to argue with them. "Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed," and "Hold fast that thou hast, that no man take thy crown." We are glad that the answers we give to others should so often be of service to you.

CHAPTER XIII.

WHITEFOOT IN REQUISITION.

THREE days after this Bessie wrote the following letter—it was commenced on Wednesday, and finished on Thursday morning:—

"My dear little Hatty,—It is your turn for a regular long letter, as I have already written to mother and Christine.

I don't write to father, because he is so busy and letters bother him, but you must tell him all the news. You cannot think how Edna laughs at my correspondence; she always says it is such waste of time; but you and I know better than that. It is just the one thing that I can do for you all, now that I am away, and I am not so selfish that I grudge an hour in the day. I know exactly how disappointed one face looks when there is no letter from Bessie in the morning, and so I lay down my book and scribble away, as I am doing now.

"I am having a lovely time. I do not think I have ever played so much in my life before. It is such a new thing, and yet it is rather nice, too, to hear Edna say in the morning, 'Now what shall we do to-day?' as though one's whole duty were to amuse oneself. Father always says, 'Whatever you do, do it thoroughly,' and I am carrying out his maxim to the letter, for I do nothing but enjoy myself, and I do it thoroughly. On Monday, I finished my letter to Chrissy before breakfast, and afterwards, as Edna was busy, I spent a long morning reading 'The Village on the Cliff.' I have finished it now, and think it lovely. I do enjoy these mornings in the garden; but I must not read too many stories, only Edna says I shall like 'Old Kensington,' and I must indulge myself with that. I assure you we make quite a picture. Mac lies at my feet, and Spot generally curls himself up on my lap. Tim prefers lying on the lawn and keeping an eye upon the kitten. She is such a droll little creature, and her antics quite distract me.

"I ASSURE YOU WE MAKE QUITE A PICTURE."

"Well, I had this delicious morning to myself, and in the afternoon we played tennis at the Athertons. There were no visitors, but we girls played by ourselves, and I got a long talk with Grace Donnerton. I liked her better than ever; but just as she was talking to me about her sister's hospital, Maud Atherton disturbed us by telling us tea was ready.

"The next morning, Edna drove me over to Kimberley—such a lovely drive; and the ponies were so frisky and went so well. We called at a beautiful old house called Kimberley Hall—I never saw such a place—and had luncheon there. Mrs. Blondell, our hostess, is such a dear old lady, with lovely white curls, and such a sweet old face. Her husband is such a handsome old man; but he is quite deaf, and no one seems to make him hear anything except his wife, and she goes up and speaks to him in a low, distinct voice, and tells him things, and he brightens up at once. He is such a courtly old man, and pays little old-fashioned compliments. He took Edna's hand and said, 'We do not often see a pretty young face, my dear, but it is a very pleasant sight. I remember your mother when she was a girl, and a fine handsome creature she was. I think her daughter does her credit, eh, Dolly!' And Dolly, for that is the dear old lady's name, put her pretty old hand on his arm, and said, 'She does indeed, Rupert, and she has got a look of our Maisie about her,' and then they looked at each other in such a way. Edna explained it to me as we drove home. She said they had one child, a beautiful girl, who lived until she was seventeen, and then died of some wasting disease. She had been dead fifteen years, but the old couple had never got over her loss. 'I am there often,' Edna went on, 'but I have never once been without hearing Maisie's name mentioned; they are always talking about her. One day Mrs. Blondell took me upstairs and showed me all her things. There were her little gowns, most of them white, folded in the big wardrobe. "She was to have worn this at her first ball," said the poor woman, pulling down a lace dress; it looked quite fresh somehow; only the satin slip was a trifle discoloured. There were the shoes, and the silk stockings, and a case of pearls, and the long gloves. "She would have looked lovely in it," she went on, smoothing out the folds with her tremulous fingers. "Rupert says she would have made hearts ache. Thank you, my dear, you are very kind," for I could not help hugging the dear old thing. It made me cry, too, to hear her. I go there very often because they like to see me; they will have it I am like Maisie, but I am not half so pretty.' And Edna laughed, though her eyes were moist, and touched up Jill rather smartly.

"We had some people to dinner that evening, so Edna made me put on my Indian muslin, which she said looked very nice. She wore a soft white silk herself, which suited her admirably. She has some beautiful dresses which she showed me; she says her mother thinks nothing too good for her, and showers presents on her. She gets tired of her dresses before they are half worn out. I was half afraid she was going to offer me one, for she looked at me rather wistfully, but I made a pretext to leave the room. I enjoyed myself very much that evening. The curate took me in to dinner, and I found him very clever and amusing, and he talked so much that, though I was very hungry, I could hardly get enough to eat; but Edna, who declared that she had had no dinner either, brought me up a great plate of cake when we went to bed. Edna sang beautifully that evening, and the curate—his name is Horton—sang too, and Florence Atherton brought her violin. I had never heard a lady play the violin before, but Edna tells me I am old-fashioned, and that it is all the rage at present, and certainly Miss Atherton played extremely well. Good-bye for the present, dear Hatty, I will add more to-morrow. This is a sort of journal, you know, not a letter, and I shall write a little bit each day. 'Do be nice and lengthy,' you said, and I am sure I am carrying out your wish.

"Thursday morning.

"Well, here I am again sitting at my writing table, pen in hand, and 'the top of the morning to ye, darlint' as Biddy used to say; but my Hatty will be still asleep I know, as she is not one of the strong ones, poor little Hatty! Such a wonderful thing happened to me yesterday—I actually had a riding lesson. Do tell father that, for he knows how I used to envy Tom when Colonel Miles gave him a mount. It happened in this way. Edna was talking at breakfast-time about her ride in the Row, and Mr. Sefton said suddenly, 'How would you like to learn to ride, Miss Lambert?' and not thinking he meant anything by the question, I said, 'I should like it of all things. I do long for a good gallop.

"Oh, you must not gallop before you trot,' he returned, quite seriously; 'Edna, if you still have your old habit by you, I don't see why I should not give Miss Lambert a lesson. Old Whitefoot is doing nothing for his living.'

"Well—would you believe it?—he was quite in earnest, and Edna, who is very good-natured, seemed to think it a good bit of fun, for she jumped up from the table and told her brother to bring Whitefoot round in half-an-hour; and then she made me go upstairs with her and put on a beautiful blue habit, which seemed to me quite new; but she said she had a much better one made for her that season. It fitted me tolerably, and only required a little alteration to be perfect—and I assure you I hardly knew myself in it, I looked so nice; but a dark habit is always so becoming. Edna looks like a picture in hers.

"Well, when we went downstairs, there was Whitefoot—such a pretty brown mare!—with Mr. Sefton standing beside her, and Brown Bess was being brought round from the stable. I was just a little nervous at first, but Mr. Sefton was very kind and patient; he taught me how to gather up my reins, and how to hold myself; and he would not mount for some time, but walked beside me for a little distance, telling me things, and when he saw I felt less strange he jumped on Brown Bess, and we had a canter together.

"My dear Hatty, it was just delicious. I never felt happier in my life. But Mr. Sefton would not let me ride long; he said I should be very stiff at first, and that we should have a longer ride to-morrow, when Edna would be with us; and of course I had to submit.

"I was far too lazy to play tennis that afternoon, so Edna made me get into the hammock, and I had a nice quiet time with my book, while she and the Athertons had their usual games, and by-and-by Grace Donnerton came and sat by me, and we had another nice talk.

"The next morning Edna said she would ride with us, so Mr. Sefton ordered the horses directly after breakfast, and we had a glorious ride for more than two hours. I found trotting rather difficult at first, but Mr. Sefton would not let Edna laugh at my awkwardness, and he encouraged me by telling me that I should soon ride well, and after that I did not mind a bit. Edna really rides perfectly; it was a pleasure to watch her. Once she left us and had a tearing gallop by herself over the common. The other horses got excited and wanted to gallop too, but Mr. Sefton held Whitefoot's reins, and managed to quiet them both with some difficulty. I thought Edna looked lovely as she rode back to us; she had such a beautiful colour, and her eyes looked so bright, I don't wonder people admire her so.

"Edna was going to an archery meeting that afternoon with the Athertons, but as there was no room for me in their waggonette, I stayed at home quietly with Mrs. Sefton, and I managed to make myself useful, for several people called, and I had to make tea and help entertain them, but I got a quiet hour in my favourite garden seat. Edna brought Florence and Maud Atherton back to dinner, and we had a very merry evening, playing all sorts of games. Mr. Sefton came into the drawing-room for a little while, but he did not stay long. I think the girls quizzed him, and made him uncomfortable. It is such a pity that he is not more at his ease in society; people think he is stupid and cannot talk, but he is really very intelligent, and knows a great deal about a good many subjects. There is to be no ride to-morrow. Mrs. Sefton is going up to town on business, and Edna is to accompany her to the station, for, although Mr. Sefton suggested that I should go out with him for an hour, I could see that they did not second it. Now, darling, I have told you everything, and I think you will own that I am having a good time. I hope all this pleasure is not spoiling me, but I think of you all as much as ever, and especially of my Hatty. Are you very dull without me, dear? And how do you sleep? Write and tell me everything—how mother looks, and what Tom said in his last letter, and if father is busy. And if any of you want me very badly you must say so, and I will come home at once, though I do want some more rides, and Edna has promised to drive me over to Kimberley again. But there is the gong, and I must run down to breakfast. Good-bye, my dearest Hatty.

"Your loving "BESSIE."

Bessie had written out of the fulness of her girlish content. She wanted to share her pleasure with Hatty. Happiness did not make her selfish, nor did new scenes and varied experiences shut out home memories, for Bessie was not one of those feeble natures who are carried out of themselves by every change of circumstances, neither had she the chameleon-like character that develops new tendencies under new influences; at the Grange she was just the same simple, kindly Bessie Lambert as she had been at Cliffe.

After all, she was not disappointed of her ride. Jennings, the groom, had a commission to do at Leigh, and Richard proposed to his step-mother that Bessie should ride over there too. Jennings was an old servant, and very trusty and reliable, and she might be safely put in his charge. To this Mrs. Sefton made no objection, and Bessie had a delightful morning and made good progress under Jennings' respectful hints. Bessie had just taken off her habit, and was preparing for luncheon, when Edna entered the room.

"What dress are you going to wear this afternoon, Bessie?" she asked, rather abruptly, and her manner was a little off-hand. "I shall be in white, of course, and I shall wear my grey dust cloak for the roads, but—"

"What dress!" returned Bessie, rather puzzled at the question; she was hot and tired from her long ride, and had been looking forward to an afternoon of delicious idleness. "Is anyone coming? I mean, are we going anywhere?"

"Why, of course," replied Edna, impatiently, and she did not seem in the best of tempers; "it is Thursday, is it not? and we are engaged for the polo match. You must make haste and finish dressing, for we must start directly after luncheon."

"Do you mean that Mr. Sefton is going to drive us over to Staplehurst, after all?" asked Bessie, feeling very much astonished at Richard's change of plan; he had not even spoken on the subject at breakfast time, but he must have arranged it afterwards.

"Richard!" rather contemptuously. "Richard is by this time lunching at the Fordham Inn, with half a dozen stupid farmers. Have you forgotten that he flatly refused to drive us at all. Oh, I have not forgotten his lecture, I assure you, though it does not seem to have made much impression on you. Well, why are you looking at me with such big eyes, Bessie, as though you found it difficult to understand me?"

"Because I don't understand you, Edna," replied Bessie, frankly. "You know both your mother and brother objected to Captain Grant's invitation; you cannot surely intend to go in opposition to their wishes."

"Their wishes! I suppose you mean Richard's wish, for mamma never opened her lips on the subject; she just listened to Richard's tirade."

"But she did not contradict him; and surely you must have seen from her face that she agreed with every word." Bessie did not dare to add that Mrs. Sefton had expressed her strong disapproval of Captain Grant to her. "She was looking at you so anxiously all the time."

"Oh, that is only mamma's fussiness. Of course I know she does not want me to go. I don't mean to pretend that I am not aware of that, but mamma knows that I generally have my own way in this sort of thing, and she did not actually forbid it."

"Oh, Edna! what can that matter when you know her real wishes?"

"My dear, don't preach; your words will not influence me in the least. I told Richard before mamma that I should go, and I mean to carry out my word. You are a free agent, Bessie; I cannot oblige you to go with me, but as the Athertons are all engaged, I could not get one of them in your place."

"But if I say I cannot go, what will you do then?" asked Bessie anxiously.

"In that case I should go alone," returned Edna, coldly, "but I should think you were unkind to desert me."

"I should have to bear that," replied Bessie, rather sadly; "it is not what you would think of me, but what I ought to do. Oh, Edna, you are placing me in a very difficult position. I do not know how to act, and the whole thing distresses me so. Do give it up for my sake, and just to please me; do, Edna dear."

"I cannot give it up," was Edna's answer; "but I will not argue any more about it. Make up your mind quickly, Bessie, for there is no time to lose." And so saying she left the room, and a moment afterwards Bessie heard her ringing for her maid.

Bessie had never felt more distressed; she was so tired and so perplexed how to act, that she could almost have cried from worry. "If I go with her, will not Mrs. Sefton and Mr. Richard have a right to be offended with me?" she thought. "They will not know that I have tried to turn Edna from her purpose; they do not know me well enough to be sure of my motives. Edna told him that I wanted to see polo played; they may believe that I was willing to go. I cannot bear to put myself in this position; and yet, will it be right to let her go alone? Will they not blame me for that, too? Oh, how I wish I could speak to Mr. Sefton; but he is away. What shall I do? I must decide. It seems such a little thing to pray about, and yet little things bring big consequences. No, I can't moralise; I am too worried. Why can I not see the right thing to do at once?"

Bessie sat and reflected a moment, and then a sudden impulse came to her and she opened her blotting case, and wrote a few hurried lines.

"Dear Mrs. Sefton," she wrote; "I am so troubled, I hardly know what to do. Edna has just told me that she intends to drive over to Staplehurst after luncheon to see polo played, and has asked me to accompany her. I cannot induce her to give it up. Please do not think that I have not tried. I know how much you and Mr. Sefton were against it; but I do not think you would wish me to stay behind. She ought not to go alone. I feel you will be less anxious if I go with her." Bessie dashed off these few lines and then dressed herself hurriedly; but before she had half finished the gong sounded.

As she ran downstairs she met Dixon, the butler, coming out of the dining-room, and putting the note in his hand, begged that he would give it to his mistress directly she returned.

"Certainly, ma'am," replied Dixon, civilly, and it struck Bessie that he looked at her in an approving manner. He was an old servant, too, and most likely was accustomed to his young mistress's vagaries. "We expect my mistress home at six, and I will take care she gets the note," he continued, as he opened the door for her.

POETS OVER-SEA.

A GOSSIP ON THE RECENT POETRY OF AMERICA.

By GLEESON WHITE, Author of "Some Poetry we Read," "Ballades and Rondeaux," etc.

CHAPTER I.

It was with a light heart that I projected a campaign to descend upon the recent poetry of America, to occupy not only its strongholds but every minor position, and bring captive its best and noblest, to be imprisoned for a while in these columns. It is with a sense of defeat that I marshal together the results and present them in haphazard fashion to the readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER. The drift-weed which had floated to our shores of late, and the exotic blossoms, that, opening under Western skies, had been hidden between leaves of the many periodicals that come over to us, urged me, Columbus-fashion, to explore the source of their origin; but the overwhelming material that appeared leaves me in a mood near akin to sheer despair. Mrs. Partington, so good at a puddle, was powerless to mop back the Atlantic. To criticise a continent in a column, or even annotate the poesy of a new nation in a nutshell, needs either an infinity of previous knowledge of the subject, or sublime egotism. It may be brave sport for the critic to decide in a quarter of an hour the value of the labours of patient workers for a quarter of a century, but such a perilous task is only justified by that success which must needs be rare. In place, therefore, of an exhaustive notice and critical glance over the whole harvest of the last growth of American poetry, and a judicial summing-up recording its value in to-day's literature, or even a mere catalogue of authors and their volumes, a much more modest programme is forced upon me: and the ambitious scheme vanishes, to be replaced by a mere gossip upon the more noticeable of the verse-makers of to-day in the United States—not even rising to the dignity of a lecture or essay, but merely, as it were, going to a bookcase well filled with volumes hardly known on this side of the ocean, and taking down book after book at random, to make some little effort to introduce it to new readers. We all know how pleasantly a bibliophile can make an hour pass, as he lovingly displays the treasures of his collection, reading an extract there, or passing to us an open volume at the well known page where the very heart of the book beats in a short paragraph, and so by adding a word here and there, gives in desultory fashion a more fairly coherent summary of his stores than his visitor could glean if left to rummage as he pleased. For in that case he would probably either weary of his quest, or else be so enthralled by some one volume that chimed with his particular mood, that he would confine himself to it solely, leaving all the others untouched.

Here is the bookcase with its hundred or so of new volumes of American poetry, the garnered crop of a very few years; but whether the book-lover who owns them can justify his position, and glean the ripest fruits and most rare blossoms, is doubtful; at least he does it as a labour of love, since every volume brings back kindly thoughts of the courtesy of the far off writers, who sent it over seas to help his purpose.

A few general observations may be risked, for what they are worth, and given merely as the opinion of one who has tried to grasp the main feature of this group of poetry. The fecundity of the rhymester of the States is undoubted; not even our own highly productive island shows more "new poems" in a year. Nor is there so far any sign of the advent of an epoch-making poet among the great chorus. In bulk, it is marked by the character of our own song of to-day—exceedingly high level of its mechanism, no paucity of imagination, a profusion of pretty fantasies and slightly varied similes—doing little things excellently well, but rarely attempting the greatest. One personality, unique and removed by date from the period immediately under notice, is yet so strange to the bulk of English readers, that later on it will be necessary to our purpose to include Walt Whitman.

Apart from this unique figure, it must be candidly said that there is no name of supreme power, towering over all its fellows among the younger school of the United States, any more than in England.

Of Longfellow, Poe, Bryant, Emerson, and the rest of the dead-singers, no word to-day; nor even of Lowell, Holmes, or Whittier. They, with many others, are household words on both sides of the Atlantic. And since for sake of space a limit must be drawn, many names of poets either dead, or whose life-work was given to the public ten or twenty years back, must be left out here. The group to be noticed may be held to correspond roughly to our Austin Dobson, Andrew Lang, William Morris, George Meredith, A. M. F. Robinson, to choose a few names entirely at random. That is, of singers who have already won high place among literary people, but who are, compared with the position of Tennyson, or even Swinburne and Browning, not yet quite recognised by the great public, who are slow to make friends with new men, however staunch and lasting when the acquaintance has once fairly started.

From American poets we expect much; and perhaps bearing in mind that without rudeness it may be said their literature is a thing of yesterday only, too much. For one of the first demands we make is that theirs shall be a native and non-English song. Now although there are signs of this quality in their work, yet it must be confessed it is not at present the dominant note. And remembering how the tradition of their art must needs commence, with our own, at the pure well-head of English poesy—Master Chaucer—and flow in the same channel down to this century, it can scarcely be a surprise that echoes of many a cadence dear to English ears are heard in their strain. Yet there is without doubt a subtle distinction which seems to indicate among their singers more intimate familiarity with certain strongly individual voices of the past, than is the case with our own younger writers, side by side with a less comprehensive grasp of the whole sequence of the art amongst us. Again, English poetry is not quite so exclusively the fountain on which they draw, as with us. Much of their verse suggests familiarity with other European song, with, at the same time, it may be a slighter acquaintance with the classics of Greece and Rome, betrayed chiefly by the use of more available material than an English scholar would care to own, that is to say, as if the classical allusions came from a Bohn's translation, or Lemprière, and not at first hand from the texts themselves. This may be hair-splitting or mere conjecture; but to differentiate their poesy is not quite easy. Yet even as a picture by Abbey, old English though its subject be, has a Dutch Knickerbocker flavour not quite our former ideal of Herrick's England, so their verse has a piquant flavour that just removes it from ours, adding the charm a mere trace of a provincial accent will sometimes lend to a well educated voice.

It is hard to exact at once entire originality of motive and conception from a new school of writers who work in the old tongue; even individual creators have used the manner of their predecessors. In music, hardly any great master has found his own tongue at first. For his earlier message he has chosen to modify accepted forms and well worn phrases, until gaining strength, and confidence in his own powers, he bursts impetuously into his own new song, not less new because of his previous restraint, but really more fresh because evolved in due order in place of being merely a sudden and abnormal new creation.

That their future individuality will be very marked, there is much already to prove. But it must not be forgotten that we also are in a productive state, and borrow at times the local colour and new features of their work directly it becomes popular. Poe and Bret Harte, to take two diverse names, will support this assertion. Anyone now reading either of these authors for this first time would fail to realise the novelty of their method, as so many on both sides of the Atlantic have mimicked their mannerisms, and made the more prominent peculiarities of their style common property.

But generalisation is needless, and a start must be made, and surely place aux dames must rule in these pages even more than elsewhere, so a few of the daughters of the great republic who have lately joined her choir must claim first notice. In gauging the worth of a woman's contribution to literature, the infallible critic has a two-edged sword, warranted to slay without mercy, and to hew through the armour of any poetic Joan of Arc with deadly skill. For it cuts both ways. First, it holds that all woman's work in the arts is essentially feminine, lacking vigour, comprehensiveness, and the nobler virile qualities the critic marks off as the property of the other sex only. Next, that if by chance a George Eliot uses these very qualities, then it is not really woman's work at all, but purely masculine work accidentally produced by a female, but lacking in all the true attributes and the dainty elegance, etc., of the feminine mind. Thus armed, he easily does his work. It is not always "he" in this case, for it is temptingly easy for a woman, by adopting this slashing treatment, to demolish her rivals and indirectly proclaim her unique individuality at the same time. If space allowed, so clumsy a paradox could be easily refuted, but it would be killing a dead bogie, for no one can seriously refuse the possession of the true creative power to the women of to-day. In fiction, poem, and song, names second, in their own way, to none come too readily to need quotation.

The awkward question of precedence next arises. Scorning the easy refuge of alphabetical sequence, it seemed best to pick at random, for the date of birth of each writer would be hardly a graceful mode to regulate the order of notice. So blind chance must be the goddess to introduce the few who represent, more or less fully, youngest America of to-day. Not, of course, because they are all equally youthful in years; but, regarded from our own standpoint, the latest aspirants to the poet's bays—for the uncomfortable word "poetess" is at once a slight to the singer and a vulgarity to the reader; no one talks of a paintress, or musicianess, or a preacheress, or a doctress; why then a poetess?

A book, "John Ward, Preacher," has lately made the name of Margaret Deland familiar to us, and on the title-page of that much-praised book—about which, probably, a great deal more will be heard yet—we find "By the author of 'An Old Garden.'" This little volume, in its coat of white parchment and "gaily flowered gown," charms by its exterior being a booklet so daintily clad to be worthy of the boudoir of a princess. In its naïvely wrought lyrics there is a charm not easy to analyse. Herrick is probably the chief favourite of its author, and who dares object to the echo of the loved rhymes of the old Vicar of Dean Prior, here mimicked with such grace?

In the fore-motto to the group—and it is noticeable how often the prefatory rhyme betrays the true individuality of the author, more than all his more ambitious attempts—we find a suggestion of the influence of his verse.

"Put all thy faith in Time,
Nor trust in me;
Grant Life, and Love, and Rhyme, Eternity.

The section that follows, giving title to the book, is heralded by a delightful word-painting of an old garden, followed by a series of flower-pieces that may best speak for themselves in these two.

THE MORNING GLORY.

O maid!
I pray thee light
Both noon and night;
The envious dawn
Thou lookest on
Is too soon gone;
Then stay
The day,
I pray!

THE ROSEMARY.

My sweet maid Rosemary—
(Her gown it is so plain
E'en vanity
Dressed thus, could not be vain!)
Doth preach to me
When this my life doth seem
All small and mean
And full of briers to be;
For in the rain or sun,
Cloaked all in modest gray,
This garden nun
Doth stand as though to pray.
Content, she never heeds
If flaunting Poppy scorns,
Nor marks that weeds
Do tear her gown with thorns;
She tells her beads
And lives her life with joy,
Her one employ
To fill some small, sweet needs!

Among the children's poems is a rhyme that has the true nursery ring.

Bright up into Bossy's eyes,
Looked the Daisy, boldly;
But, alas! to his surprise,
Bossy ate him cordily.
Listen, Daisies in the fields:
Hide away from Bossy!
Daisies make the milk she yields,
And her coat grow glossy.
So, each day she tries to find Daisies nodding sweetly,
And although it's most unkind,
Bites their heads off neatly!

There is one powerful story-teller, Amélie Rives, who has not only produced verse of rare promise, but attempted already the highest form of the poet's art. So far her poetry has not been collected, and therefore it is not easy to speak of it as a whole. Yet if up to the high level of her stories, "A Brother to Dragons," "Virginia of Virginia," "The Quick and the Dead," and others, it will be indeed a notable volume. But it may be that, like George Eliot, she will always remain essentially a prose writer, although her periods at times are set in rhythm and rhyme, and that the thing said will be more noteworthy than the melody of its expression. "Herod and Mariamne," a tragedy in classical form, is her last and boldest attempt. That a popular periodical should dare to devote almost an entire number to such a work is surely without parallel. Imagine the surprise of the readers of Temple Bar or Macmillan, if they discovered a play in blank verse filling their beloved magazine! The tragedy at the publishing office that would follow would be serious, and the subscribers killed off thereby equal to the most gory needs of the poet. As "Herod and Mariamne" would suffer from quotation, and much of Miss Rives's work is at hand in Harper's, Scribner's, and other magazines that have an English edition, it need not be extracted here. If one dared to prophesy the arrival of a new genius of the first order in these dead-level days, Amélie Rives would justify the rash act. The first feeling produced by her work is absolute wonder that a young girl should use such masterful methods and dare the highest. Nor is her work crude or merely ambitious; it is the quiet, restrained force that seems to put forward only a fraction of its possible strength, and to hold in reserve far greater powers, that fascinates the reader, and provokes anticipation so far realised in each succeeding instance. It is natural that the American public should have welcomed her so warmly, and creditable to their taste.

Although it is an unpleasant thing to own, yet of late years (witness their discovery of Fitzgerald's "Omar Khayyám," their recognition of Robert Louis Stevenson, and many another instance) they have shown a quicker appreciation of artistic excellence than our own people, who have spent their excitement upon "Called Back" and other sensational romances, which however good in their way, for the most part, cannot be ranked as serious art.

The two books, "Songs at the Start," and "The White Sail, and other poems," by Louise Imogen Guiney, are two volumes of verse distinguished by a very pretty fancy, and typical of to-day. To say that they echo and reflect older song is true, but not derogatory to the charm of the lyrics. It is a feature of the day, this facile, graceful verse, that is so good that it seems churlish to wish it were better; and yet at times, when the finish of the verse is forgotten and the thought expresses itself with more natural vigour, there is evidence of more than just polished and dainty versification.

"The White Sail" is too long to be extracted, and these two give no fair test of the author's powers; yet the fancy of the one and the cadences of the other may leave readers eager to turn to the books themselves.

PRIVATE THEATRICALS.

You were a haughty beauty, Polly
(That was in the play),
I was the lover melancholy
(That was in the play).
And when your fan and you receded,
And all my passion lay unheeded,
If still with tenderer words I pleaded,
That was in the play!
I met my rival in the gateway
(That was in the play),
And so we fought a duel straightway
(That was in the play).
But when Jack hurt my arm unduly,
And you rushed over, softened newly,
And kissed me, Polly! truly, truly,
Was that in the play?

MY SOPRANO.

Loving her, what should I fail to do for her?
Keep season on season sunny and blue for her,
Lengthen her days like a happy tale,
With thoughts all tender and hearts all true for her.
Ward her from trouble, good tidings bring to her.
Fight for her, laugh with her, comfort her, cling to her;
But if I were even a nightingale,
I wonder — if I should dare to sing to her.

(To be concluded.)

THE CHEF.

By MARY POCOCK.

HOW A FRENCH COOK PREPARES FORCEMEATS, GARNISHES, BATTERS, PASTES, ETC.

preparation of the different things used in making a variety of dishes is such an important part of French cookery that I have thought it necessary to give them a page to themselves, only referring to them in future articles in the same way as I shall do to sauces and gravies, without repeating the manner of their preparation. I shall begin with a thing rarely used properly by English cooks, that is soaked bread.

Panade for Force meat.—For nearly all forcemeats a panade made of bread or flour is needed. Of bread it is made thus: take some crumb of white bread, pour boiling water on it, cover it, and let it soak a few minutes, then squeeze all the moisture from the bread, either with the hands or by pressing it in a linen cloth, then put it in a stewpan; separate it with a spoon, and stir into it either a little boiling milk or a little hot broth, sufficient to make a thick paste; cook two or three minutes, then turn on to a plate to cool. Panade with flour is made thus: put a teacupful of cold water in a saucepan on the fire with a little salt and a small lump of butter, then dredge in slowly, stirring quickly all the time, as much flour as the water will absorb, so as to get a thick paste without lumps in it; boil three minutes and turn on to a plate to cool. Bread panade made with either milk or broth, with a little piece of butter, the yolk of an egg, and seasoning added to it, is often given to children and old people, as being light and digestible.

Farce à la Mie de Pain (bread stuffing).—Prepare half a pound of crumb of bread as panade, using either broth or milk; when cold add to it a quarter of a pound of beef or veal kidney suet finely chopped, a minced onion, a pinch of parsley, two raw eggs, salt, and a little nutmeg.

Farce Commune (an ordinary forcemeat).—Take some bread panade and mix with it half the quantity of chopped bacon fat, with salt, pepper, and chopped parsley, shalot, and sweet herbs, add the yolks of one or two eggs according to quantity of forcemeat, and employ as required.

Forcemeat for Veal or other Meat.—Take half a pound of uncooked veal, a quarter of a pound of bacon, and a quarter of a pound of beef suet, chop the whole well, add salt, pepper, nutmeg, chopped shalots, and chopped parsley; put to this about two-thirds the quantity (nearly three-quarters of a pound) of bread panade that has been made with broth and allowed to get cold, mix with two yolks of raw eggs, and use for stuffing a breast of veal or any other kind of butchers' meat.

Forcemeat for Poultry.—Chop half a pound of fowl (cooked or uncooked) from which the skin and bones have been removed, add two ounces of pickled pork and a quarter of a pound of veal suet, season with salt, pepper, and nutmeg. When all finely chopped pound in a mortar, and add six ounces of bread panade made with milk; bind with the yolks of two eggs. Use for stuffing capons, fowls, etc., but do not press in too firmly.

Pheasant or Partridge Forcemeat.—Take half a pound of the meat of either pheasant or partridge (preferably uncooked), chop, and pound it with six ounces of bread panade and six ounces of butter, add the yolks of five eggs, salt, pepper, and a little nutmeg.

Rabbit Forcemeat is made in the same way, but three yolks of eggs are quite sufficient for the same quantity of rabbit.

Forcemeat for Game.—Take the livers of the game and pound them with some beef marrow, or a little butter, chop and pound about the same quantity of boiled pickled pork, and add it to the livers, with a little salt, pepper, and spice; add a little cream and two or three yolks of eggs, cook slowly in a stewpan for a quarter of an hour, stirring all the time, so that it does not burn.

Godiveau (a forcemeat used much as a garnish).—Take half a pound of fresh lean veal without skin or gristle, and half a pound of beef kidney suet without skin, chop both very finely, then mix them together, season with pepper and salt. When finely chopped put in a mortar, and pound; add a raw egg when the fat and lean are not discernible, turn the meat on to a plate, and stand it on ice for an hour; then put it back in the mortar, pound it again, adding a small piece of ice or a little iced water, then two more raw eggs and a pinch of finely-chopped parsley; put a small piece on a floured board, roll it round, and throw it into boiling water, poach it, and try if it is too firm; if so add a little more iced water, and pound again. Then form into balls or shapes on a floured board, put them into boiling water, poach ten minutes, and drain on a sieve, or put in a wire basket to poach, so as to drain easily when taken out of the water. The godiveau must be made in a cool place; it is used in pâtés, vol-au-vents, and with some made dishes. Different kinds of godiveau are made by substituting the flesh of poultry or game for the veal. When it can be obtained, veal kidney suet is preferred to beef.

Forcemeats for Pies or for Turkeys (to be eaten cold).—Chop half a pound of lean pork or veal, with an equal quantity of fat bacon, add a few finely-powdered or chopped sweet herbs, a little spice, pepper, salt, and if wanted very good, two or three truffles (according to size) are added; when well chopped pound the whole in a mortar, add the yolks of two raw eggs. If the pie is to be made of poultry or game, the pickings from the bones and the odd scraps can be added to the forcemeat.

If passed through a sausage-machine and well mixed, forcemeats do not require to be pounded.

Quenelles de Volaille (quenelles of fowl).—Take the white meat of a cold fowl, remove the skin, chop and pound the meat, soak nearly an equal quantity of crumb of bread in a little hot milk, squeeze the bread, and pound it separately with a little piece of butter; then add the pounded chicken to it, pound again, adding nutmeg, pepper, salt, and the yolks of two eggs; then beat the whites of the eggs to a froth and add them, turn on to a floured slab, make into little rolls, and poach by throwing into boiling broth, and simmering from eight to ten minutes.

Quenelles au Foie de Veau (quenelles of calf's liver).—Take half a pound of fresh calf's liver, chop it, and add a quarter of a pound of veal kidney suet; chop again until very fine, then add two tablespoonfuls of onions that have been minced very finely and slightly cooked in butter, a little parsley and marjoram chopped, with a piece of garlic the size of a pea; pepper and salt. Beat three ounces of butter to a cream, add the liver and other ingredients to it, mix and add four or five eggs one after the other, and then half a pound of very fine fresh breadcrumbs; mix well. Boil some water, add a little salt, throw in a small piece of the mixture, and poach it to try its consistence; if too firm a little more butter, or a little white sauce can be added; if not firm enough another egg will make it right. Then take small pieces of the paste, roll them on a floured board and throw them in a stewpan of boiling water, put the lid on, and when the water boils draw to the side of the stove, let them simmer a quarter of an hour, and then drain them. These quenelles are used in various dishes, but can also be served alone as an entrée, for which they are sprinkled with fried breadcrumbs.

Quenelles de Lapereau (quenelles of young rabbit).—Take the meat of a young rabbit, chop it, pound it in a mortar and pass it through a sieve; take equal weight of crumb of bread, soak it in milk or water, then squeeze it in a piece of linen to get all the moisture from it; add it to the rabbit with the same weight of butter, so that the three ingredients are equal in quantity; pound well together, add salt, pepper, grated nutmeg, a tablespoonful of velouté sauce, and two or three yolks of raw eggs, one at a time, pounding all the time; try your quenelles as in preceding recipe, and rectify the consistence if necessary, then poach the same way as the quenelles de foie or in stock if preferred.

Salpicons.—Remove the skin and bones from cold fowl or game, cut the meat into small dice, add one-third the quantity of truffles, mushrooms, or the red part of a tongue, and cut in dice like the fowl or game; add some white or brown sauce, more or less thick, depending on whether the salpicons are for garnishing or for making croquettes with.

Liaisons aux Jaunes d'Œuf (egg thickening).—Take one or two yolks of eggs separated from the whites, stir and strain them, add a few spoonfuls of cream or cold milk or water, mix well, remove the liquid to be thickened from the fire, and stir the eggs in slowly; put back on the fire, and continue stirring until the eggs thicken, but do not let them boil.

Roux.—A brown roux that is very useful is made thus: melt a quarter of a pound of butter in a stewpan, stir into it five ounces of flour, stir it, and cook it for half an hour; by that time it should be a nice brown, not too dark; turn it into a pot and let it get cold. When required for thickening a gravy, cut off a piece of this roux, put it into the hot gravy, and let it boil. It will keep for a long time, and is used in many things.

Roux Blanc.—Put a lump of butter in a saucepan; when it is melted throw in a spoonful of flour, stir until it is cooked, and then add the hot gravy to it, stirring all the time. White roux will not keep, not being so much cooked as brown.

Braise.—Put at the bottom of a saucepan some slices of bacon, or bacon rind and bones, some pieces of veal, or veal bones, slices of carrots and onions, sweet herbs, parsley, one or two cloves, two bay-leaves, little salt, pepper, small lump of sugar, and moisten with a little broth; let it reduce a little, then place whatever is to be braised on the top of the bones and vegetables, and pour in broth until about half the meat is in it; cover closely, and cook gently for a long time, occasionally basting the meat with the broth. Some braising-pans have a rim round the lid for burning charcoal; this browns the top of the meat.

Fumet de Perdreau (partridge flavoured).—Take the necks, legs, backbones, etc., of partridges—the parts, in fact, that are no use for anything else—break the bones small, and put all in a stewpan with carrots, chopped onions, thyme, bay-leaf, pepper, cloves, and a little white wine; reduce over a quick fire, then cover with broth; do not put more than sufficient broth, cook twenty minutes, strain, and take the fat off. Used for flavouring sauces and other things; any kind of game can be used in the same way. Of grouse the backbones should not be used.

Glaze.—Take some ordinary stock that has not been thickened, put any remains of veal, poultry, or game into it, let it boil fast until it begins to get a dark colour, skim it well, then strain it into a small stewpan, which place at the side of the stove; let the glaze reduce until it is the colour and thickness of dark treacle, and hangs to the spoon; then pour it into a pot and put it away for use. If properly made and kept in a dry place it will keep good for a long time.

Financière.—Scald a sweetbread, then cook it in butter; when done cut it in pieces, add some well-flavoured and seasoned velouté sauce to it. Prepare some cocks' combs, kidneys, and livers by blanching them, then cooking and cutting in pieces; add these to the sweetbread with some button mushrooms and pieces of truffle, cook all together until the mushrooms are done, then just before serving add some quenelles of fowl and a thickening of yolks of eggs. Financière is used as a "garniture," and to fill vol-au-vents cases. Lambs' sweetbreads or calf's brains often take the place of calf's sweetbread in financière.

Spices.—The following spice mixtures are used by many French cooks; I give them for the benefit of some who like spice, but must remind readers of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER that they should be used sparingly; a dish with too much spice is spoilt in a way that cannot be remedied.

Spice for Steaks.—Take one ounce of cinnamon, twenty cloves, one nutmeg, a piece of ginger the size of the nutmeg, a pinch of fennel, and a pinch of coriander seeds; pound all these together to a fine powder, then sift and press tightly into a small tin, which must be kept well shut.

Fine Spices for Entrées.—Take half an ounce of cinnamon, one nutmeg, thirty cloves, a quarter of an ounce of coriander seeds, and six bay-leaves; pound these and sift them, taking care that they are very finely powdered. Take two ounces of mushrooms, and one ounce of truffles that have been slowly dried on a stove; pound and sift them, and mix with the powdered spices; press tightly into a tin canister, and keep well shut in a very dry place.

Spice for Sausages, etc.—Take one ounce of coriander seeds, a quarter of an ounce of aniseed, a quarter of an ounce of cloves, a quarter of an ounce of dried basil, and the same of dried sage leaves; reduce the whole to powder, sift, and keep for use in a well-shut tin. It is used with fresh pork, chitterlings, sausages, etc.

Pâte à Frire Parisienne (batter for frying in).—Put four tablespoonfuls of flour in a basin with one tablespoonful of good olive oil, or of oiled butter and a pinch of salt; mix to a smooth paste, adding a little tepid water and a few drops of vinegar (or half a glass of light white wine is used and preferred by most cooks); add the yolk of an egg, stir and add more water if needed; the batter should be rather thick, and is better if mixed some hours before it is wanted; taste it to see if it is salt enough. Just before using the batter beat the whites of two eggs to a firm froth, and stir them quickly into the paste. Some cooks use two yolks of eggs to this quantity of flour, and omit wine or vinegar. Batters for frying in must always be rather thick, or they will not cover the articles to be fried.

Another batter for frying in is made thus:—Moisten four tablespoonfuls of flour with a quarter of a pint of ale, stir in one tablespoonful of olive oil, a piece of butter the size of a walnut, and a large pinch of salt; just before the batter is wanted add two whites of eggs beaten to a firm froth. Stir well in.

Pâte à Beignets (fritter batter).—Put six tablespoonfuls of flour in a basin, add two tablespoonfuls of good olive oil or oiled butter, stir well with a wooden spoon; when smooth pour water to it while stirring, until it is the consistence of thick cream; add a pinch of salt, the yolks of two eggs, and a little pounded white sugar. This batter should be mixed at least two hours before it is wanted for use; when about to be cooked beat the whites of the two eggs to a stiff froth, and add them to the batter; stir well, and see that they are well mixed with the other ingredients. It is an improvement to rub the rind of a lemon on the sugar before pounding it.

Another batter for sweet dishes.—Put eight tablespoonfuls of flour in a basin with a little salt, two teaspoonfuls of sugar, three yolks of eggs, six tablespoonfuls of oiled butter; mix well, then moisten the paste with light white wine until it is of a right consistence; before using incorporate the whites of the three eggs, having first beaten them to a stiff froth. Some cooks put a tablespoonful of brandy in at the same time as the whites of the eggs; I do not think it is any improvement to the batter.

Crème Pâtissière.—Put in a stewpan five yolks and two whites of eggs, with four tablespoonfuls of flour, one ounce of butter, one ounce and a half of pounded sugar, a little salt, and some grated lemon rind; mix with a spoon and moisten with three-quarters of a pint of milk; put the stewpan over the fire, stir, and let it thicken, taking care that it does not get lumpy; let it cook three minutes after it thickens, stirring it continually, then take it from the fire. If this cream is to be used for fritters two tablespoonfuls of potato flour must be added to it.

Pastry.—The following are the pâtes most used in French cookery:—

Feuilletage.—Sift and put on a board one pound of fine flour, heap it up and make a hollow in the middle, put in a pinch of salt, one ounce of butter, the white of an egg, one-third of a pint of water (some flour requires rather more water); make into a paste and put aside for half an hour, then roll it out; beat fifteen ounces of butter into a thick square, place it on the paste and fold the latter over so as to envelope the butter, then roll it out into a long, thin band; when it is about half as thick as a finger fold it in three (one fold from the bottom and one from the top), press it with the rolling-pin to make it even, then turn it one-quarter round from right to left, so that the part that was at the side of the board is now nearest to you; again roll it out into a long band, and then fold in three as before (this is giving the paste two turns); put it aside for ten minutes, then give two more turns, then put it away again for another ten minutes and give it two more turns, always rolling, folding, etc., the same way as the first two turns; this makes six turns in all, and the paste is then ready for use, or will not hurt if it is put aside until wanted. This is the pastry that is used for small pâtes, vol-au-vents, etc. For some purposes it is made with less butter.

Pâte Brisée.—Heap a pound of fine flour on a board, put in a hollow in the middle ten ounce of butter in small pieces, a pinch of salt, and half a pint of cold water; mix the water and butter, then work in the flour, knead the paste, roll it out twice, and put it in a cool place for an hour before using.

Pâte Brisée au Sucre.—Heap one pound of flour, put in the middle of it ten ounces of butter, three ounces of very finely-powdered sugar, three yolks of eggs, a pinch of salt, and one-third of a pint of cold water; mix the paste and roll out once or twice. Put aside for a time before using.

Pâte à Dresser.—This is made with one pound of flour, half a pound of butter, two eggs (yolks and whites), and about one-third of a pint of water. Proceed as for pâte brisée.

Pâte à Choux.—Put three-quarters of a pint of water in a stewpan with a quarter of a pound of butter, the grated rind of a lemon, a quarter of a pound of sugar, and a pinch of salt; stir, and when it boils draw the stewpan to the side of the fire and dredge in as much flour as the water will take, stirring continually; put back on the stove and cook until the paste leaves the sides of the stewpan as you stir; it is then done. Put it in a pan and beat in eggs one after the other until the paste sticks to the fingers. This paste is used for pain duchesse and other things. It is also very good dropped on a baking-sheet in pieces the size of a walnut, sprinkled with chopped almonds and sugar, or with flavoured sugar, and baked in a rather quick oven.

Pâte à Brioche.—Heap one pound of flour on a board, make a hollow in the centre, mix half an ounce of yeast with half a pint of warm water (one-third boiling and two-thirds cold water together give about the right temperature), pour into the flour and mix into a smooth, firm dough. Take another pound of flour and mix into it a little salt and one pound of butter, add four large or five small eggs, and about a tablespoonful of warm water; mix this paste with the dough, knead until there are no light streaks in it, make it into a ball, cover it with flour, put it in a basin with a cloth over the top, and leave it eight or nine hours in a tolerably warm place, then use it to make brioches (very good with half the quantity of butter). Brioches are generally formed like small cottage loaves, and are glazed over the top with egg before they are baked.

Pâte à Baba.—Sift one pound of flour, take a quarter of it and make a dough with three-quarters of an ounce of yeast, and not quite a quarter of a pint of warm water, cover it, and let it rise at the side of the stove thirty minutes. Put the rest of the flour in a warm basin, put to it ten ounces of butter, broken in little pieces, three eggs, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, and a pinch of salt. Work the butter with the eggs, then with the flour, knead well, add four more eggs, one at a time; when they are well incorporated add the dough, knead five minutes, then add a quarter of a pound of sultanas or currants. Put the paste in buttered moulds, but only half fill them, let them rise to the top of the moulds, then bake in a quick oven for about half an hour.

Cinnamon Sugar.—Take a stick of cinnamon, pound it in a mortar, add five times its weight in pounded sugar, pound again, sift, and keep to sift over cakes, sweet dishes, etc.

Sucre à la Vanille.—Split a vanilla pod, then cut it in very small pieces, put it in a mortar with six ounces of pounded loaf sugar, pound until the vanilla is all powdered (it takes about a quarter of an hour), then sift. Vanilla sugar is much used in making delicate sweet dishes and sifting some on cakes.

Orange and lemon sugars are made by rubbing lumps of sugar on the rinds of the oranges or lemons, and pounding or grating the sugar afterwards.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE RESCUE.

EVE was certainly surprised when she saw a strange sailor instead of Arthur, waiting for her in his boat at the heronry, but never for one moment did she suspect there was anything amiss, for as far as she knew no one but she and he knew of their intended marriage; so imagining he had been unavoidably detained, and had for some good reason sent one of the wherrymen to fetch her, she jumped into the boat, and was quickly rowed alongside the nearest wherry. Her conductor helped her on board, and there she found herself face to face, not with Arthur Clifford, but with Jack Farrar. In a moment the truth flashed upon her that she had been decoyed on board his wherry, and with a wild movement towards the deck-side, she gave several loud shrieks, and would in her terror have jumped overboard, but Farrar caught her in his arms and held her fast. Struggling madly to free herself, and screaming all the time, Eve soon exhausted her strength, and the shrieks soon subsided into sobs, as she still tried to escape from Farrar's hated control.

"Ah! that is better, Eve; I thought that game would not last long. How lovely you look, even in your tantrums. There, don't cry, my beauty, or I shall have to kiss them tears away," said Farrar.

But this insult seemed to give Eve new strength, and with a violent struggle she succeeded in throwing him off, and seizing an iron bar which lay on the tarred deck of the gaily-painted wherry, she placed her back against the mast, and raising the bar in her right hand, exclaimed—

"Touch me again, if you dare, and I'll kill you, I will, you cowardly wretch!"

"Bravo, my beautiful Eve; my little wife, bravo," exclaimed Farrar, in genuine admiration of her courage.

Eve had never looked more beautiful than she did at this moment. Her hat had fallen off in the struggle, and her beautiful red-brown hair was rippling in charming disorder over her shoulders; her cheeks were flushed with anger; her lovely grey eyes flashed fire; her delicate nostrils dilated with scorn; and she bit her red lips with her pearly teeth. Her white dress was tumbled, and the little blue shawl torn off in the struggle; but as she stood there, straight as a dart against the mast, flourishing the iron bar above her head, she looked like an avenging angel. Scorn, anger, indignation, outraged womanhood, were all visible in her face and manner, and though Farrar was no coward, he cowed before her, and kept at a respectful distance.

"How dare you insult me in this way! Your wife, forsooth! I would die a thousand deaths rather than be wife to such a vindictive Southerner as you, Jack Farrar!" exclaimed Eve.

"Ah! we flew at much higher game than a poor wherryman, I know. Nothing short of a fine gentleman like Mr. Clifford would do for us. Nicely we planned it too, my queen, didn't we? Turn your beautiful head, my pretty, and you'll see the wherry your fine gentleman lover has hired, waiting to take you to Yarmouth to be married at half-past six this morning. You see I know all about it. Ah! you may open those fine eyes of yours in surprise; perhaps it would surprise you to know I have seen the ring, and the licence, and the letter from the minister that's to marry you; and I have seen the yacht that was to take you away; but the ring, and the licence, and the yacht, and all the fine things on board her will do for some other bride; there is plenty of clothes on board this wherry of mine for my wife. Come and see all the pretty things I have bought for you. When I heard him planning it all so nicely, I said to myself, 'two can play at that game, my gentleman.'"

"You heard him! what do you mean?" demanded Eve, her curiosity for the moment overcoming her indignation.

"Aha, my pretty one! you little thought Jack Farrar was close by you every one of those Saturday evenings you spent by the heronry. I was there the night of the thunderstorm, and was there last Saturday, and other Saturdays too. Sometimes I was overhead in one of the trees; sometimes I was hid in the long grass close by you; sometimes I was in a boat; but there I could not hear much. The last two Saturdays I have been up in a tree, and heard every word."

"You mean, cowardly wretch!"

"Your meetings were stolen, so if you come to meanness I don't see much difference. But we'll let that pass. Mr. Clifford thought he was doing a mighty clever thing, I have no doubt, but it seems to me I have done a cleverer. He has got a clergyman in Yarmouth ready to marry him as soon as he gets there; so have I. He has got a 'truss' on board his wherry; so have I—ah! and a beauty too. When you see the lovely red and blue silk dress, and white hat with green feathers to go with it, for you to be married in, you'll sing a different tune, I'll warrant; fit for a duchess they are, both of 'em; and such a shawl! all the colours of the rainbow in it!"

Eve's lip curled scornfully at this information.

"He have got a wedding-ring and licence; so have I. Here they are, look! Let me try the ring on, my beauty, may I?" And he advanced a step nearer, holding a wedding-ring, which he had taken from his fob, in his hand.

"Take care! If you dare come near me I'll knock you down," said Eve, brandishing the bar again.

"He had a wherry to carry his bride off in; so had I—my own, too, while his was hired. He was to meet her at four o'clock this morning at the heronry, but it is the early bird that gets the worm; so I was there at half-past three, and so was she." And Farrar chuckled at his cleverness.

"Half-past three!" exclaimed Eve, in amazement.

"Yes, my little darling. Father Noah's clock never goes wrong, does it? but it gained thirty-five minutes last night with my kind assistance."

"You fiend, you cruel wretch! How dare you deceive me in this way, you sneak, listening and creeping into honest folks' houses while they are asleep? I hate you, I do, I do," sobbed Eve.

"Hate away, my pretty love; I don't mind your hating me one bit; it is coldness and indifference I mind, not hate; that may turn to love any day or hour, so hate on, my little Eve."

"Yours, indeed! I tell you I would jump overboard rather than belong to you. Where are you taking me to?"

"To Yarmouth, to marry you if you'll promise to marry me; if not, out to sea until you do."

"You dare not! Oh, you dare not do such a cruel thing! Put me ashore directly. Do you hear me? Where is the man who brought me here? I will appeal to him; he can have no object in seconding such a villainous scheme."

"Except money; and he is well paid," said Farrar.

Just then the other man left the tiller to tell Farrar the other wherry was pursuing them, and Eve turned to him and implored him to help her; but the man turned a deaf ear to all her entreaties, and on hearing the welcome news that Arthur was pursuing her, Eve's courage revived, and she now concentrated all her interest in watching the movements of his wherry.

She left her place by the mast, and sitting down on a coil of rope, leant her left arm over the rail of the deck, still keeping the iron bar in her right hand to protect herself from any approaches of Farrar's. He stood gazing at her, and entreating her one minute to marry him, threatening to carry her out to sea the next if she refused; but to all his prayers, entreaties, threats, promises, vows and protestations of love alike, Eve turned a deaf ear, and maintained a dignified silence, which exasperated

Farrar more than anything she could have said.

In vain he pleaded he had loved her ever since he first set eyes on her; in vain he vowed to love and cherish her as wife was never yet loved; in vain he promised not a wish of hers should be ungratified; in vain he urged his mad love as an excuse for his conduct; in vain he promised never by word or deed to grieve her, if she would be his wife; in vain he uttered mysterious threats if she refused. Eve paid not half as much attention to what he said as she did to the wind, which she watched anxiously, following the steady advance of the other wherry with her eyes, and inwardly glorying in its progress; but not one word did she vouchsafe to answer.

"They are gaining fast on us!" cried the man at the wheel, when Farrar had spent a good half-hour in talking to Eve, without succeeding in getting a word in reply.

Farrar turned and looked across the rippling waters of the great broad, glistening under the early morning sun, and saw his mate's information was quite true; it would be impossible to reach Yarmouth without being overtaken at this rate, and he decided to alter his course.

"Take her up the Little River. Hard a-port!" he cried, with a muttered oath.

The sailor obeyed, though he did not understand the order, for if Farrar hoped to reach the village of Bridgham before they were overtaken, it was a forlorn hope; still, it was the nearest landing-place, and was their only chance of escaping their pursuers. It was a very remote chance, and another quarter of an hour made it evident it was impossible; the other wherry was gaining rapidly on them, and though as soon as they entered the river Farrar seized the quant and poled away with all his might, it was useless; and Eve, who was eagerly watching Spurgin's boat, saw to her joy she was gaining rapidly on them.

Soon they were near enough for her to distinguish four figures on board, and she was wondering who the fourth could be, for Arthur had told her he should only take two wherrymen with him, when she recognised both Adam and Arthur.

"What will they do when they get alongside us, I wonder? Will they be content with a war of words, or will they fight? How dreadful it will be if they do! They are only a few boats' lengths off us now; I can speak to them directly," said Eve to herself, and rising from her lowly seat, she walked over to the stern of the wherry, and strained her eyes, looking for a sight of Arthur's face.

A minute or two later Farrar came up to her again, and white with suppressed passion, which transformed his handsome face, he said—

"Once more, will you be my wife?"

"No!" said Eve, firmly and decidedly, inwardly quailing under the fire of Farrar's black eyes glowing like two balls of fire, though she controlled the terror she felt, and looked at him without shrinking.

"Then you shall be no other man's," growled Farrar, under his breath, as he turned on his heel.

But with Arthur and Adam only a boat's length off, Eve was not alarmed at this threat; another minute, and they would be alongside, and as they were five to two, she felt no uncertainty as to the result.

"Bridge, sir," cried the man at the tiller.

"All right," answered Farrar, as he moved to the mast to lower it in order to run safely under the bridge—a manoeuvre he, like all wherrymen, liked to postpone to the last safe moment.

But on reaching the mast he folded his arms instead of lowering it. There was a crash, a flapping of the sail, as the mast snapped in two like a twig, and the next moment the wherry was overturned, and the three occupants went overboard.

As quick as thought Arthur and Adam threw off their coats and leapt into the river, which just here was very deep, to rescue Eve, who had disappeared under water with Farrar and his mate, while the wherry filled and sank in an incredibly short space of time. But as Eve came to the surface for the first time Adam caught her by the hair. She was unconscious, and supporting her with one arm, he swam with her towards the bank of the river, Arthur joining him and helping, and between them they succeeded in getting her safely ashore. Meanwhile the mate had swam ashore, being as much at home in the water as on land, but nothing was to be seen of Farrar.

"Take her to the inn, Mr. Clifford; there is one close at hand. I must see if I can help Farrar," said Adam.

And as Arthur took his beautiful burden in his arms to carry her to the inn, Adam swam towards a black speck which appeared above the water a few yards off. It was Farrar, quite unconscious, and with a fearful wound on his handsome forehead, which was cut open, for he had struck his head against one of the piers which supported the end of the bridge; but Adam succeeded in swimming ashore with him, and with the assistance of the mate, carried him in Arthur's wake to the little village inn, about a hundred yards away.

Here the usual means were used to restore consciousness to both patients, and in Eve's case with partial success, after a short time, when the hostess put her to bed between warm blankets. But all attempts to bring Farrar round failed, though Arthur ordered the attempts to be persevered in until he returned with a doctor, whom he insisted on fetching himself; while Adam seized a horse and rode off at once in his shirt-sleeves to fetch Mrs. Oldman, Arthur having borrowed the only available coat.

"Come in, my lad, come in! Why, you look half drowned," said Noah, grasping Adam's hand as he reached the ark.

Adam obeyed, but hesitated on the threshold when he saw Grace Leicester was in the ark, for even at such a moment as this he was unwilling to appear before the woman he loved in such guise; but the hesitation was only momentary, and, reddening, Adam bowed to her, and made a brief apology for his appearance, and then taking Mrs. Oldman's hands in his, he said—

"Eve is safe, Mrs. Oldman; but she is very ill, and I have come to fetch you to nurse her."

"O dear, O dear, Adam! What has happened to the child? She was well enough last night. Is she married?" said Mrs. Oldman, sinking on to a chair, forgetting the presence of her visitors in her excitement.

"No, she is not married; she is at Bridgham, in bed in the inn, the landlady looking after her; and Mr. Arthur is gone for the doctor while I came here. It is a strange story, and I hardly know where to begin."

"Begin at the beginning, my lad, and then we shall understand all about it, and be as quick as you can, for the sooner you get into some dry clothes the better," said Noah. And accordingly Adam told all he knew of the events of the morning as briefly as he could, his hearers listening in amazement, but never interrupting him by a word, until he reached the point of the accident.

"We heard the man at the tiller shout 'Bridge, sir,' and heard Farrar reply 'All right.' When the wherry was a few yards off the bridge, he moved to the mast, as I supposed to lower it, for I was watching him narrowly; but reaching it in plenty of time to do so, he deliberately folded his arms, and in an instant, before there was time to cry out, the mast struck the bridge, and snapped like a reed; the wherry was upset, and Eve, Farrar, and his mate went down. Mr. Arthur and I rescued Eve, and I jumped in and succeeded in bringing Farrar to land, but I fear he is killed; he has struck his head against the pier of the bridge, and is suffering, I am sure, from concussion of the brain; in fact, I believe life was extinct when I left him, though they were still trying to restore respiration."

"And a good thing too! Such scamps as he are best out of the way; he would have lived to be hanged if he hadn't been drowned," said Mrs. Oldman.

"Wife, I am ashamed of you. Please excuse her, Mr. Leicester. She is so upset by all that's happened she does not know what she is saying."

"My, yes, I do, Noah. I say, and I mean, drowning is better than hanging, and too good for Jack Farrar, and I stick to it, though it is awfully sudden, I'll allow; but it looks like a judgment on him for carrying off our Eve in that way."

"We are a deal too fond of looking out for judgments on other folks. But how is my child, Adam?"

"She was recovering consciousness when I left; but what with the shock and the excitement, I doubt if the doctor will allow her to be moved for a day or two. But Mrs. Oldman will be able to tell better when she gets there."

"Oh, father, may I drive Mrs. Oldman over in my pony-carriage?" said Grace.

"No, my dear, no; it is no place for you," said Mr. Leicester, decidedly.

"Thank you kindly all the same, Miss Grace; but my poor little girl can't expect folks to think as highly of her as they used after this," said Noah, sadly.

"I shall always love her dearly—always. Oh, father, do let me go! People will not say such hard things of her if I do; and it is Arthur who is to blame—Arthur and that poor wicked man Farrar—far more than poor Eve," said Grace, with tears in her blue eyes.

"Miss Grace, Miss Grace, you'll break my heart! and it is a hard heart as takes a deal of breaking. God bless your sweet face!" sobbed Mrs. Oldman, overcome by various emotions, as she laid one of her fat dimpled hands on to Grace's lap.

"It was not Eve I was thinking of; it was only that Farrar's death will have caused an excitement, and the place will be full of people; but on second thoughts, Grace, I will do as you wish, or rather, I will drive you and Mrs. Oldman over. We are bound to do all we can to save Eve from gossiping tongues, as of course this foolish marriage cannot possibly take place. I am sure Noah, you have too much sense and proper feeling not to agree with me in this," said Mr. Leicester.

"Yes, sir; it will never take place with my consent, not if it breaks my poor little girl's heart to stop it," said Noah.

"It has gone too far to stop now. Eve's character must not be sacrificed to please Mr. Clifford's friends; but unless I am very much mistaken, he will never allow Eve to return to Windham until she is his wife," said Adam, in a tone of decision which startled his hearers.

"I'll see she never does that. God Almighty made them for each other, and married they shall be, for all Noah or anyone else may say to the contrary, or my name isn't Mary Oldman," said Mrs. Oldman in an undertone to Adam.

"I cannot agree with you, Adam; it is a mere boyish fancy on Arthur's part, and the kindest thing we can do for both of them is to put a stop to it all at once, and for that reason I shall see Arthur as soon as we get to Bridgham, and insist on his leaving Norfolk immediately, not to return till Eve is happily married to some worthy man," and Mr. Leicester glanced at Adam as he spoke, as if he thought him a suitable husband. "But the sooner we start the better, so if you will get ready, Mrs. Oldman, Miss Leicester and I will call for you in half an hour," he added, as he rose to leave.

"Miss Leicester!" muttered Mrs. Oldman to herself, as she went into the inner room to dress and pack up some clothes for Eve.

"Have you any message for Eve, Noah?" said Mrs. Oldman, when she was waiting, in her best bonnet and gown, for the rector's pony-carriage.

"My love, and I forgive her; and I will come and see her this evening, and bring her home, if she is well enough," said Noah.

"I'll tell her," said his wife aloud; "but you won't bring her home unmarried for all that, obstinate as you are, I can tell you," she added in an undertone, as the pony-carriage arrived, and carried her and her bundle off in the back seat.

CHEERFULNESS

"AN eye for cheerfulness and brightness, what a blessing it is! Some people's souls seem to have a strong affinity for whatever there is in the outer world capable of ministering to joy; they detect its presence by a special instinct; they extract it from the most unlikely objects. . . . The first sensation stirred in them by overshadowing darkness is, that there is some light left. . . . One such individual in a household is a source of incalculable comfort to all the rest, for it certainly does a person good to see a man make the best of things."

An old divine has told us to cultivate the "little virtues" that grow at the foot of the Cross, and I think among these we may place cheerfulness. Were one to consult a dictionary as to the meaning or definition of this word, most probably one would find "good spirits, liveliness, animation, alacrity, mirth, gaiety," etc. Now although these qualities are very good in their way, none of them fully expresses cheerfulness. "Good spirits" will last for a few days, but sooner or later the reaction will come. "Animation, mirth, and gaiety" will generally only last as long as one has reason to be happy, but true cheerfulness is far different, for through rain and sunshine it remains the same. Mirth, animation, and gaiety only accept the happiness that is sent them for a while, desponding when it is withdrawn, whilst a cheerful person will not only seek happiness for themselves and others, but even when it is withdrawn, and all seems dark and dreary, they still live in a buoyant hope of a bright to-morrow, and are always the first to hail any return of good fortune.

Cheerfulness is quite necessary for all who wish to live an energetic and useful life. To the old, the infirm, and the unhappy, a cheerful person imparts hope, happiness, and life; it helps to make their long and weary hours pass quickly.

It is of course natural that every one should suffer a little, or maybe a great deal, in this life, which cannot always be couleur de rose; nevertheless, it is the duty of all to try and bear their own sorrows manfully and cheerfully, to look always on the bright side of things, and by so doing not only make their own sorrows easier to bear, but also impart courage to others by a good example. Cheerfulness is innate in some people, while to others it can only be a cultivated little virtue; but as cultivated flowers are often the most perfect, being the outcome of fine selection and toil, so likewise cultivated cheerfulness may be more perfect in character to that which is inborn.

We all know what a boon and a benefactor to society cheerful people are. It does one good to hear them speak. They seem to live in a higher, happier sphere, and through all their troubles are yet able to enjoy life thoroughly. It may be because they have learnt to appreciate and to be thankful for the many little blessings they receive every moment of their life, and do not let them pass as mere natural events, unworthy of their gratitude. Our own happiness or misery is to a great extent formed by our own creation. If we will insist on walking in the shade when the sun is shining on the other side of the road, it is only natural that we should not feel its warmth.

Finally, if all would try to cultivate the spirit of cheerfulness, how much brighter this world would be! Time would fly quickly, and there would be no more of those long days which seem to have no ending.

Cheerfulness is a small virtue, it is true, but it sheds such a brightness around us in this life, that neither dark clouds nor rain can dispel its happy influence.

VARIETIES.

A TEMPERANCE TALE.

A mouse fell into a beer vat, poor thing, and a cat passing by saw the struggling little creature. The mouse said to the cat—

"Help me out of my difficulty."

"If I do I shall eat you," said the cat.

"Very well," replied the mouse; "I would rather be eaten by a decent cat than drowned in such a horrible mess of stuff as this."

It was a sensible cat, and said—

"I certainly shall eat you, and you must promise me on your word of honour that I may do so."

"Very well, I will give you the promise. I promise."

So the cat fished the mouse out; and, trusting to the promise, she dropped it for an instant to clean her own mouth of the abomination of the vat, thinking she had better do so before she took a meal off the mouse.

The mouse instantly darted away and crept into a hole in the corner where the cat could not get him.

"But didn't you promise me I might eat you?" said puss.

"Yes, I did," replied the mouse; "but, don't you know that when I made that promise I was in liquor?"

And how many promises made in liquor have been broken!

HEROINES IN OBSCURITY.—The women of the poorer class make sacrifices and run risks and bear privations and exercise patience and kindness to a degree that the world never knows, and would scarcely believe even if it did.—Samuel Smiles.

INDUSTRIOUS SPINSTERS.—Amongst our hard-working and frugal forefathers it was a maxim that a young woman should never be married until she had spun herself a set of body, table, and bed linen. From this custom all unmarried women were termed "spinsters," a name they still retain in all our law proceedings.

SCREEN-PAINTING IN OIL COLOURS.

BY FRED MILLER.

THE illustrations accompanying these few notes are reproductions on a very small scale of a four-fold screen I recently painted. The original was some 6 feet 6 inches high, and the illustrations, being necessarily on a very small scale, are apt to appear somewhat confused, especially the side painted with the reeds. But there is a very decided advantage in having illustrations of this character reproduced from actual work, for the amateur gains a much clearer idea of what the original screen was like from whence the cuts are taken than if I had redrawn the screen merely for the purpose of illustration.

Photography helps one greatly in these matters, for having a camera I photographed both sides of the screen, and the result is now before my readers.

The use to which the owner of this screen has put it strikes me as a very good one. He uses it to put round the seat of the piano, and so keep the draught from the performer—a most useful purpose my readers will allow, for too often the player is exposed to all the breezes that blow in a drawing-room. As a draught excluder, a screen is most valuable, and therefore always have the bottom of the screen close to the floor, and not elevated on knobs or castors, which may look elegant, but which allow the wind playing along the carpet far too much scope.

The framework of this particular screen I had made for me by a cabinet-maker who works for the trade, and its cost was £4 5s. The panels, which are of pine, would be worth at least another £1 or 25s., and they then want priming, so that the actual outlay in producing such a screen would be some £6 or £7. The framework, I must mention, was stained black and polished. Of course, a much cheaper article can be had. A good carpenter would make the framework of deal; and instead of having it stained and polished it might be painted white. A screen could be made in this style for, I should say, £3. You might do the painting yourself by purchasing some colour ready mixed or in tins, for colours of all shades can be purchased in tins ready for use at many places. Aspinall's enamel seems a good thing, judging from work I have seen done with it, or there is the Chez-lui enamel. In priming the panels purchase some white lead ground in oil (to be had of any good oil-man), and by diluting with turpentine and straining through canvas or muslin, and with the addition of a very little copal varnish just to harden it (be careful to put very little varnish, or the ground colour will dry with a gloss which is objectionable to paint upon), a very good grounding colour is at hand. You will require to put two coats at least upon the panels, as the wood is very absorbent and sucks up the first coat. In the screen I am referring to the whole surface was painted; that is, instead of using an arbitrary colour for the sky and other parts not decorated, I painted in the sky, etc., round the work as it progressed, and in such cases a white ground is the best, for you treat the panels in much the same way as you would canvas.

But many very effective screens can be worked in the Japanese style by having the panels painted, say, some agreeable grey, and just throwing the work across it in a very "decorative" spirit. The screen figured here is more realistic than decorative in character, but in former volumes of THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER illustrations of a decorative character have been given.

Another form of screen which is cheap is to have a comparatively rough framework made and then stretch over this stout tough brown paper, putting strips of leather or other material on the edges, and nailing with brass-headed fancy nails. Brown paper is a capital material for painting on, as it is absorbent. Japanese gold-leather paper is also an admirable material to use, and the plainer varieties (there are some with little or no pattern upon them) are very effective when decorated. Canvas such as used in oil painting can be purchased by the yard, and this might be used. The cheaper kind will be good enough, and that with a coarse grain is to be preferred. We are nothing if not practical in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER, and that must be my excuse for so far digressing from the actual subject of these notes. But as the old cookery book says, "First catch your hare," and so here, first have your screen to decorate, and then think about the decoration.

My main idea in painting this screen was to suggest a river bank, and to use only such subjects as would be found in close proximity to water. I have always been charmed by the beauty of waterside foliage, and have often made studies of single growths. The side treated with reeds I actually painted in the autumn on the banks of the Ouse, near St. Neots, though of course it was finished in the studio. Those who live in the country might paint the whole screen out of doors, and each panel might be treated separately, and not made to form part of the whole scheme as I have done. This side of the screen I call the autumnal side, as it was painted in September and October, and I attempted to reproduce some of the gorgeous tints that are only to be seen in riverside foliage. The purple loosestrife, for instance, is to be seen in every shade of scarlet and purple. The dock, too, is gorgeous in colour, as are the willow herb, meadow sweet, and sedge.

The difficulty in painting direct from nature is in selecting the various groups and arranging them effectively. One is apt to be dazzled and confused by the wealth of the material, and, in endeavouring to get this effect in one's work, to simply produce a confused jumble of foliage, formless and uninteresting. This comes of not knowing what to leave out. You must fix your attention upon some one object, and give that prominence by making all else subsidiary. In the lower portion of the upper panels I have massed the reeds at the back, and treated them more as a background of colour than as individual forms, in order to give prominence to the loosestrife, dock, and meadow sweet. This is what artists term "breadth," and is essential if we would make our work effective when viewed from a distance. Look at nature with half-closed eyes, and paint with half-closed eyes. By this means you will see only the most essential things, and nature will mass itself, for much of the detail will be lost. One sees too much of nature in fact. The trained eye only sees what is important and what can be represented. It is knowing what to leave in the ink-pot makes the writer; as knowing what to lose in breadth makes the painter. I would advise my readers to make individual studies of the different plants, though there is no reason why a suggestive background should not be employed as well as an arbitrary one. Suppose you want to make a great feature of a clump of loosestrife with a background of reeds. Treat the reeds as a mass or wall of colour, and in a lower key—that is, greyer, so that they do not interfere with the loosestrife. Keep out all strong lights and darks from the background, reserving these for the foreground objects.

In getting many of the tints associated with autumn, recourse must be had to glazing. Scarlets are best obtained by glazing rose madder, raw sienna, burnt sienna, and Indian yellow over lighter tones of these colours. Rose madder glazed over cadmium produces a gorgeous scarlet. So it will when glazed over vermilion. In glazing, use a little varnish, say copal or amber, rather than megilp or medium. The underneath colour should be quite hard, and I would advise my readers to paint in the dry method, using turpentine or spike-oil of lavender to thin the colour, and no medium or varnish. When the work is finished and has stood some time, varnish carefully with mastic or other good varnish (or Soehnee's spirit varnish), and your work will be permanent.

The following is a list of the colours I used in painting my screen:—

Yellow ochre, raw sienna, burnt sienna, vandyke brown, raw umber, black, light red, Indian red, vermilion, rose madder, cobalt, French ultramarine, Antwerp, ceruleum, viridium, cadmium pale, cadmium orange, Indian yellow, lemon yellow.

This is a complete list, and suffices for all requirements. It will be noted that I leave out all the chromes. Delicate tints cannot be obtained by their use. Yellow ochre is the finest colour for greens; with cobalt it makes delicious greys, and with ultramarine and Indian yellow rich juicy greens. Avoid greens made of bright yellows and blue. They are always crude. Emerald green might be added to the above list, as it is useful for toning with blues and gives with them a fine peacock blue such as is wanted in kingfishers, but avoid it in greens, and never mix with any of the fine yellows, as it destroys them.

The other side of the screen, painted with yellow flags and swans, speaks for itself. The distant reeds are only just indicated. The swans are here the feature, and must be carefully drawn if introduced. There are some good photographs of swans taken instantaneously to be seen in photographic publishers' windows, which are very useful for painting from, if one has studied the bird from nature as well. There is a danger of getting the swans out of tone—that is, too white for the rest of the work. You must always set tone into your work, so that every object seems to fit in harmoniously. Tone in painting is very much what the "key" is in music. This side of the screen I kept grey in colour, for where one has much green to deal with, great care must be exercised in avoiding crudeness and vulgarity. Nature is full of grey, and you have only to put a crude green in comparison with nature to see the truth of this.

The lower panels are treated with smaller flowers, such as forget-me-nots, but there is no reason why the panels should be divided as I have done. This is simply a question of individual caprice.

One word as to bird drawing. I have made a great feature of birds on both sides of the screen. The Natural History Museum offers a fine field for work in this direction. Among the new cases may be seen many waterside birds, such as reed warbler and bunting, kingfisher, ducks, gulls, and tits, and as they are very finely stuffed one might paint direct from them. It will be necessary to write for a student's ticket before permission to draw is granted. The Booth Museum in the Dyke Road, Brighton, contains, I suppose, the finest collection of stuffed birds in England, for Mr. Booth is both a naturalist and sportsman, and he has had the cases set up under his own supervision, and the habits of the various birds are strictly adhered to, so that looking at a case is like reading a chapter of natural history or looking at the book of Nature herself.

FOR LOVE ALONE.

By LAURA L. PRATT, Author of "Plucked from the Burning," "Burton Brothers," etc.

CHAPTER I. A NEW HOME.

"THEN you would rather travel alone, dear?"
"Yes, thank you, I should much prefer going by myself."

The answer was so coldly given, that a shadow came into the kind old eyes that were affectionately regarding the girl.

Mrs. Terry was more than seventy years old, and Miriam Stewart was seventeen; yet the old face wore a sweet, happy, placid expression, while on the young face was a look of habitual discontent.

"I am afraid you will feel lonely; it will be a long journey."

"I am used to being lonely," answered Miriam, with a catching of the breath that was almost a sob.

Mrs. Terry longed to say something comforting; but the girl turned from her, and there were no tears in the blue eyes that looked through the window into the cold spring twilight.

It was a difficult matter to show any love to Miriam Stewart. Indeed, after being in the same house with her for a month, Mrs. Terry, whose heart was full of love, and whose favourite verse was—

"He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small,
For the dear Lord who loveth us,
He made and loveth all,"

had begun to doubt if it were possible to love her. There are people whose hearts are hungering for love, who yet by a cold and repellent manner put it from them. Perhaps the hedgehog would like to be petted, but its quills would prevent its being pleasant to pat or stroke. So it was with Miriam; she had hedged herself round with the thorns of discontent. Because she was poor and plain, and not particularly clever, she chose to believe no one ever could or would love her, and she tried to deceive her own heart, and sing—

"I care for nobody, no not I,
And nobody cares for me."

But she did care, and it was with an aching longing to be like them, that she watched other girls basking in the sunshine of family and home love.

A few months before, her father had been with her, and they had been all in all to each other. Miriam called herself a Christian. She had been a Sunday-school teacher, and dearly loved her class of little ones. She had enjoyed visiting the sick and suffering. But when her father had been taken from her, and she was left orphaned and alone, there was no child-like spirit of submission to a loving Father's hand, even though that hand was heavy in correction. Hers was only the submission of a rebellious slave to a conqueror—of a slave rebellious in heart though submissive outwardly, because the conqueror is all-powerful. She saw the clergyman who called on her in her grief, and heard passively enough the exquisitely tender messages sent by the Lord to His suffering children, but there was no response in her heart. As time went on, those who would gladly have been her friends were estranged by her coldness. She hugged her sorrow, and told herself that she would live without love. Mr. Terry had been her father's most intimate friend, and he and his wife had gladly taken Miriam to their home, when by her father's death she had been left alone. It had been arranged that she was to live with the only relations she had in England—an uncle, an aunt, and a family of cousins whom she had never seen. Her uncle, a busy doctor, living in a country town on the South Coast, had written her a kind letter, saying how gladly they would all welcome her among them. Miriam chose to read between the lines, and fancy they were only taking her in on sufferance.

It was the eve of her departure. To-morrow she was to leave the Terrys for her uncle's house, which was thenceforth to be her home. Mrs. Terry had been most anxious to inquire among her neighbours, and to ask their help in finding a travelling companion for Miriam, for what seemed to her a long journey. But Miriam begged her not to trouble herself, as she preferred being alone. With a sigh, the kind old lady let the girl have her own way, and said no more.

It was with a feeling of relief that Mr. Terry turned away from the station the next morning, after seeing Miriam Stewart safely started on her journey. She travelled third class. Had she been a different kind of girl Mr. Terry would have sent her first class. "But," as he said to his wife, "Miriam is so 'touchy,' I was afraid of offending her. I am sure her father's oldest friend might have done just that for her without giving offence. But there, one never knows how to please her. I wish her relations joy of her."

Mrs. Terry sighed as she answered, "I think she wants loving very much."

Miriam would have indignantly denied that she was "touchy," but her conduct while with the Terrys had certainly left her open to the charge. We do not often "see ourselves as others see us."

Settling herself into the farthest corner of the compartment, she gave herself up to thoughts of her new home.

"I will just be the governess only," she said. "I will not allow myself to love one of them. I seem to blight and destroy what I love. Father was all the world to me, and he died; and now I am quite alone; oh, father, if you had only lived! There is no one to love me now."

Miriam turned her head to the window to hide the tears that rushed to her eyes.

She was in that mood when the mind gets warped, and to judge rightly or fairly is impossible. There were many just as ready to love her now she was poor and lonely as when she was bright and prosperous, but all advances had been met so coldly, that her friends felt hurt, and resolved to leave her alone for some time. Hence the feeling of utter loneliness, which was another bitter drop in poor Miriam Stewart's already full cup. But how much bitterness had she herself put in it? Absorbed in thought, she had not noticed her fellow travellers, except to frown at a poor woman sitting opposite to her, who held a crying baby in her arms.

The mother put her face against the little white one looking up at her, and tried to soothe the child, but the fretful moan still went on.

The red after-glow of sunset was brightening all the western sky as Miriam neared the end of her journey.

About three stations before reaching Littleborough, the door of the compartment of Miriam's carriage was hastily opened just as the train was about to start, and two girls hurried in.

"We nearly missed the train," said one, putting a basket of hot-house flowers on the seat by her side.

The woman with the baby had moved nearer to Miriam, and the girls were opposite to her. She looked at them over the book she was pretending to read.

Having looked once, she looked again and again. Never had she seen such a lovely face as that of the girl with the flowers. Miriam was a keen lover of the beautiful, and her eyes took in every detail of her dress and appearance. Everything about her was pleasing, from the soft, curly, fair hair under the pretty grey hat and feather, down to the small shoe showing beneath the pale grey gown. Her companion was a pleasant, bright-looking girl, plainly dressed, and holding a large basket of primroses.

"It is good of you to give up your comfortable first class and come with me," she said.

"Your company a good deal more than makes up for the difference in the classes," replied the other, laughing.

A minute after the laughter died out of her face, and leaning forward she said to the tired-looking mother—

"I am afraid your baby is not well?"

The mother's face brightened at the kind tone and words.

"No, ma'am," she answered. "Poor little darling, he isn't at all well. I am taking him to my sister, and I hope the sea air will do him good."

"Your arms must ache with holding him such a long time; would he come to me for a little while do you think?"

"Oh, yes, miss, I think he would, but," with a glance at the pretty delicate dress, "are you sure you don't mind taking him?"

"You don't know how much I love babies," was the laughing reply, as she gathered the moaning child in her arms and carried him to a seat near the window.

The child ceased his crying, and lay perfectly still in her arms. She bent over him, talking to him in baby fashion.

Miriam was quite sorry when the train stopped at Littleborough Station, she had grown so interested in her companions. It came quite as a pleasant surprise to her to find all were getting out at the same station. Her uncle, a tall man with grey hair, came forward as the train stopped. Miriam knew him, and was soon on the platform shaking hands with him.

"Why, how is it you and Margaret have come together?" he asked, looking from Miriam to the tall girl with the primroses.

"So this is Miriam? I had no idea I was in the same compartment with my cousin."

Dr. Leigh formally introduced his daughter to her cousin, and the girls went together to the rather shabby pony chaise that was waiting for them, while he looked to the luggage.

Margaret drove, and the fat old pony did not hurry himself. About half an hour's drive through lanes bordered by golden-green hedges, with glimpses of low-lying hills in the distance, brought them to their destination. The doctor's house stood back from the road. The large wooden gates were fastened back, and Margaret turned dexterously in and drove up to the door, where several children were standing ready to welcome them.

Margaret told Miriam all their names and ages; but there was too much noise and confusion for her to take in anything clearly.

Her uncle turned to kiss her in the hall, and said, kindly—

"You are very welcome, my dear; and I hope you will soon be quite happy in your new home."

Ah! how many a lesson was she to learn in her new home. She thought she was going to teach, but she was to learn far, far more than she could possibly teach.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CAMP.—The Jews were surrounded by idolatrous heathen nations, and were much disposed to image-worship, and their long residence in Egypt, where the Divine Being was symbolised and adored under so many animal forms, as, for example, the calf, had a strong influence over them. Thus the prohibition to make a graven image was coupled with the explanatory prohibition to bow down to it and worship it as a deity. But it is not, therefore, sinful to be a sculptor, for even the Israelites were made to make the two cherubim with outspread wings over the Ark of the Covenant.

UNA DEAN.—The affianced pair should be sent out together. There is nothing masculine in your writing.

WHITE JESSAMINE.—What you call "speaking for the Lord Jesus" can and should be done under certain circumstances; but tact and sound judgment should be exercised, or you will do more harm than good. Be modest in addressing other people, and always remember that your chief duties consist in your home work for your parents, and your brothers and sisters.

DOLL-FIG.—The use of a concertina to accompany or lead the voices in singing hymns is by no means "irreverent." 2. A rubbing with spirits of turpentine and sweet oil is good for rheumatism, also with opodeldoc.

DAISY had better use a little vaseline to her hair, if so very dry.

JANE B. and MARY C. had better apply to our publisher, Mr. Tarn, for all information and service of such a nature, as what they ask is outside the department of the editor.

BACKWARD.—The 12th of October, 1873, was a Sunday. Use a softer pen, and write roundhand copies. We are glad you are interested in our answers.

LIVELY ANNIE.—You should strain the rain-water through a hair sieve. Your digestion is slow. Be careful of your diet, eat slowly and masticate well. Dine early, beware of eating when very tired, rest a little first. If greatly over-fatigued and after a long fast, begin by taking some milk with a little lime-water in it, so as to strengthen the stomach before taking solid food. Take meat once a day only, and wear looser stays.

CLIMBERS.—We advise you, under the circumstances that you name, to ask your father's assistance in breaking off your connection with the man towards whom he and your mother entertained so great an objection.

ONE OF OUR GRATEFUL GIRLS (Guernsey).—We doubt that the use of a back-board and face-board would be of much use to any girl twenty-four years old. The former is a light piece of flat deal board, about as thick as a pencil (a line being ruled on each side to show the thickness). It should be wide enough to cover both shoulder-blades, and should be shaped like a battledore, only with two flat handles (one at each end). These latter should be perforated at regular distances, and supplied with little pegs to keep the hands from slipping in holding it. The face-board is like a battledore also, made just like the back-board, only with one handle, which should be stuck into the waistbelt, and the middle of the wide part cut out so that it should touch the forehead only. Any carpenter could make them for you.

EXCURSION.—Nothing that you can apply to your grate will resist the action of fire. If you find black lead unsatisfactory, you might try Berlin black.

PUNCH and JUDY (Ontario).—Good Friday came on the 13th of April in 1838, but never since. In the year 1900 and in 1906 that day will again fall on the 13th of April. Christmas cards may be pasted on fans and screens. We are glad that you consider our paper to have increased in interest.

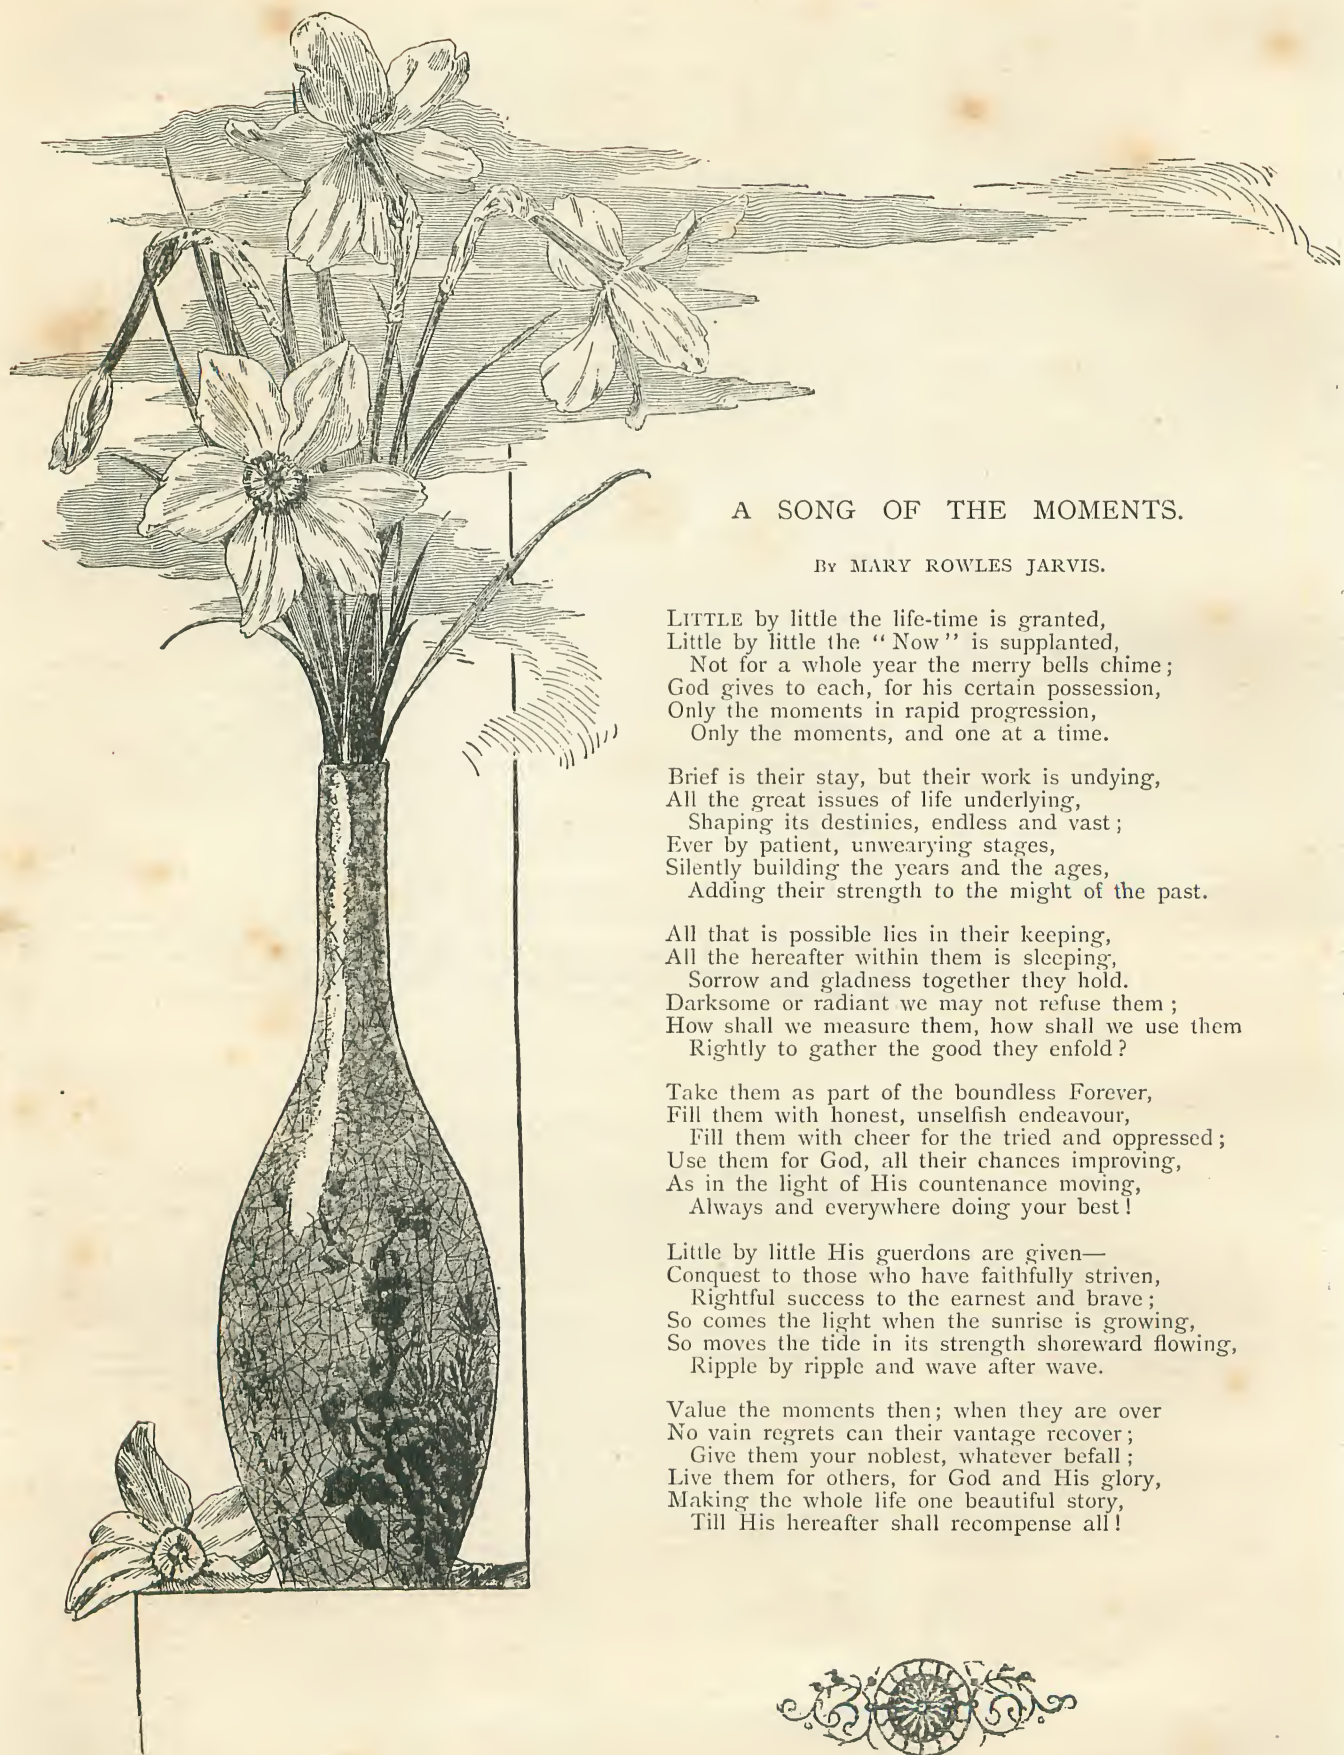

MABEL KATHLEEN.—It is impossible that we should decide such a matter for you. If you prefer the man who has lost an arm to your own suitors who possess both of theirs, you had better give him the preference; it is a purely personal matter. The loss does not, it would seem, stand in the way of his earning his livelihood. Yet £100 per annum is not much to marry upon, if wholly dependent on his health; perhaps you can add to it yourself.

MEUTRA GWEN.—We should like our answer to be favourable, but regret to say that the verses are not sufficiently original. We think you might succeed better in some other pursuit than verse-making.

SARA M.—We believe that no eclipse of the sun will be visible in these British Islands until August 11th, 1999; nor, probably, seen in London for upwards of 500 years. A possible totality may occur, however, over a line drawn from the Isle of Anglesa, across Northumberland, on June 29th, 1927, but that would in any case be so slight as scarcely to deserve the name of a total eclipse. Those desiring to see another will have to go abroad to have that gratification. What is called "the dark day" in the United States of America was May 19th, 1780, which extended all over New England. It is no novelty here!

PUSSY.—As a member of the English church he ought to comply with her rules; and the new dedication of himself, to which you refer, would prove a valuable means of grace as well as a witness for Christ. Yet it is not essential to his being admitted to the Lord's Table; and he should examine his motives to be quite sure that he has not been seeking an excuse for absenting himself from it.

E. E. E. (Cape Colony).—We know all about the appliance to which you refer, and strongly advise you never to use it again. It is as it were a stepping-stone to what is highly dangerous and evil; and many who have made a toy of it have discovered its real character, and destroyed it.

A SONG OF THE MOMENTS.

BY MARY ROWLES JARVIS.

LITTLE by little the life-time is granted,
 Little by little the "Now" is supplanted,
 Not for a whole year the merry bells chime;
 God gives to each, for his certain possession,
 Only the moments in rapid progression,
 Only the moments, and one at a time.

Brief is their stay, but their work is undying,
 All the great issues of life underlying,
 Shaping its destinies, endless and vast;
 Ever by patient, unwearying stages,
 Silently building the years and the ages,
 Adding their strength to the might of the past.

All that is possible lies in their keeping,
 All the hereafter within them is sleeping,
 Sorrow and gladness together they hold.
 Darksome or radiant we may not refuse them;
 How shall we measure them, how shall we use them
 Rightly to gather the good they enfold?

Take them as part of the boundless Forever,
 Fill them with honest, unselfish endeavour,
 Fill them with cheer for the tried and oppressed;
 Use them for God, all their chances improving,
 As in the light of His countenance moving,
 Always and everywhere doing your best!

Little by little His guerdons are given—
 Conquest to those who have faithfully striven,
 Rightful success to the earnest and brave;
 So comes the light when the sunrise is growing,
 So moves the tide in its strength shoreward flowing,
 Ripple by ripple and wave after wave.

Value the moments then; when they are over
 No vain regrets can their vantage recover;
 Give them your noblest, whatever befall;
 Live them for others, for God and His glory,
 Making the whole life one beautiful story,
 Till His hereafter shall recompense all!

CHAPTER XV.

THE CONSEQUENCES.

THE inn in which Eve was lying, in an upper room, the best the house could boast, and Farrar in the front parlour, was a picturesque house, with two fronts—one facing the river and the other the village street. Roses now in full bloom climbed over the rustic porch and round the lattice-windows, into the open lights of which they thrust their beautiful heads; the garden, gay with marigolds and hollyhocks, poppies and sweet-peas, sweet-williams, and many other old-fashioned flowers, ran down to the water's edge; while the entrance to the bar was the other side of the inn, and it was here that the carriage containing Mr. Leicester, Grace, and Mrs. Oldman drew up.

Some few women and a group of idle boys and girls, the latter with babies nearly as big as themselves, were clustering outside the inn, but the men were all at work, so there was no crowd which Mr. Leicester need have feared for his daughter. The shutters of the front parlour were closed, and just outside the inn stood Arthur Clifford, in a suit of clothes which the doctor he went to fetch had insisted on lending him. He was now talking in low, earnest tones to the said doctor.

Arthur came forward immediately to the carriage, and taking off his hat to Grace, assisted Mrs. Oldman to alight as gallantly as if she had been a duchess, saying as he did so—

"Eve is in bed upstairs, Mrs. Oldman; she is conscious, but the shock has been very great, and she must be kept as quiet as possible."

"Perfectly quiet. Don't let her talk at all. I'll see her again this evening. Mind, no excitement; and she must see no one but her mother till I come again," said the doctor, as Mrs. Oldman passed him.

"Farrar is lying dead in the only sitting-room; I am afraid I can't ask you to come in, Grace, to-day, though I thank you with all my heart for coming," said Arthur, taking Grace's hand in his as he leant over the carriage, while Mr. Leicester drew the doctor inside the inn to hear further particulars of the patients.

"I will come again to-morrow, if I may, and perhaps I shall be able to see Eve; but Arthur, father is terribly angry with you, and means to do all he can to prevent the marriage," said Grace, anxiously.

"He can do nothing; I am of age, and as soon as poor Eve is well enough I mean to be married; and that will, I hope, be to-morrow morning. Payne says if she is kept quiet to-day she may be all right to-morrow; but he is rather anxious about her, I fancy, by his manner, though he won't acknowledge it to me. But here comes your father."

"Grace, my child, just drive slowly up and down for a few minutes; I want to speak to Arthur, who will return with us to Windham," said Mr. Leicester, looking as grave as a man who has just been looking at a sight such as that in the inn parlour may be expected to look.

"No, thank you, sir; I don't intend to do that. I have sent to Yarmouth for my yacht, and I shall live on board until my marriage can take place, and that will, I hope, be to-morrow," said Arthur, decidedly.

"Nonsense, sir, nonsense! Go on, Grace. Just come this way, Arthur, please, and listen to reason," said Mr. Leicester, hooking his arm into Arthur's, and walking him off in the opposite direction from which he had sent Grace.

If all he had to say could be called reason, Arthur certainly listened to it, but he paid no more heed to it than he did to the song of the skylark over his head; and at the end of the interview, which lasted nearly an hour, and was only ended by the appearance on the scene of some men who came to hear all about the accident in their dinner-hour, he remained steadfast to his determination to marry Eve as soon as she was well enough.

"Very well, sir, then in that case we are strangers. I wash my hands of you entirely, and I shall write to your mother to that effect, and advise her to do the same," said the Rector, hotly, when he found all his eloquence had been in vain.

"She will probably do so without any advice from you, sir. Her prejudices of birth are as great as your own, and as a rule I share them. My case is an exceptional one."

"Of course, sir, such cases always are exceptional ones," said the Rector; and with this parting sarcasm, he jumped into his phaeton and whipped up the horse, before Grace had time to say a parting word to her old companion.

She saw by her father's tight-set lips that he was very angry, and she did not venture to ask what had happened, until the inward battle she knew he was having to subdue his anger, so as to be angry and sin not, was over; and it was not until they were close to Windham that Mr. Leicester spoke.

"Grace," he said, quite quietly, "Arthur Clifford is a stranger to us from henceforth, unless he breaks off this worse than ridiculous engagement."

"Oh, father, I don't think he ought to do that; it has gone too far for him to break it off now," said Grace, gently.

"Nonsense, Grace! you don't understand such things. A man in Arthur's position can't possibly marry an eel-catcher's daughter, or at least if he does he must do so at the cost of all his friends and relations. Remember what I have said—Arthur Clifford is a stranger to us; don't even speak of him to me for the present."

"Very well, father, I will try to remember," said Grace, who with all her love for her father, stood in great awe of him, and she dared not plead any more for Arthur, even if the occasion had been propitious, and it was not, for Mr. Leicester was angrier than Grace had ever seen him.

But when the Rector helped his daughter out of the carriage, he saw her blue eyes were filled with tears, and her pale cheeks were paler than ever; and thinking she cared for Arthur, his anger against him burnt fiercer than before, as he kissed Grace tenderly, and said in a low tone, "God bless you, my child!"

Grace smiled a sweet, sad smile, for she guessed her father's thought, and knew how wrong he was; and knew, too, how grieved he would be if he knew the truth—that she, like Arthur, loved one beneath her in social position; grieved—nay, perhaps, as angry—with her as he was with Arthur. Oh! he must never, never know it or guess it, for she could never bear to face his anger; it was bad enough to see him so angry with Arthur, but to anger him herself in that way, Grace would die rather than do it; nay, she would live, which was harder—live with the wish of her heart ungratified, sooner than so grieve him whom next to Adam Day she loved best in the world.

It was late in the afternoon when the Leicesters got back, for it was a ten miles drive to Bridgham from Windham, and they found Noah waiting to hear the latest news of Eve. He looked much disappointed when Mr. Leicester told him there was no chance of her being well enough to return home that night, for he had been counting the hours till he could go and fetch her.

"You see, sir, if once I can get her home here, and make her feel I love her better than ever, if possible, and not one word of reproach shall she ever hear from me, then I think she will learn in time to forget Mr. Arthur, and be happy with her parents again. People will say hard things of her, no doubt; but I'll shield her all I can, and Miss Grace will be kind to her, I know, and in time it will blow over. She must live it down, my poor little Eve! She has been rash and foolish; but she is as good a girl as ever lived, that I'll answer for."

"I am sure she is, Noah; and as far as I can I will never suffer a breath of suspicion against her. Do you mean to go over there to-night?"

"Yes, sir. Adam is to be at the ark by six, and then we are going by water. I have sent my boat up to the head of Muck Fleet; it won't take us more than an hour and a half to pull across Filton Broad to Bridgham, with the tide with us."

"Well, I trust you may bring back good news," said the Rector, as Noah took leave of him.

But when Noah and Adam reached Bridgham the news was by no means good. The first thing they saw was Arthur's yacht lying a little way from the gay inn garden; and Noah's face darkened as he saw it, for he knew it meant Mr. Clifford was still bent on marrying Eve, in spite of all the opposition he would meet with. On entering the inn the landlady told them the doctor had just come, and was now upstairs with Eve, whom she feared was not so well this morning; and as she was speaking the doctor came down, and on seeing Noah, whom he knew to be Eve's father, took him at once into his confidence.

"She is much worse to-night; very restless and feverish, quite delirious now, and she'll be worse before the morning; the shock and the excitement have been too much for her. I'll do my best for her, but it'll be a long illness. Her mother tells me she is strong and healthy, and has a good constitution, so I have no doubt she'll pull through; but we must be very careful; perfect quiet is absolutely necessary; she must see no one but her mother and the nurse I am going to send, and Mr. Clifford has undertaken to see that she has everything I order; he has gone for ice now."

"Mr. Clifford is very kind, but I cannot allow him to pay for anything my child may require; everything that is necessary she shall have, for what I cannot afford I know my friend here, Mr. Day, will lend me," said Noah, drawing his grand figure up to its full height, and looking so calm and dignified that he might well have sat as a model for any one of the old patriarchs.

"That, of course, you must settle between you; but if you'll take my advice you will allow Mr. Clifford to make this small reparation for what has happened; you see I know all about it, for he made a clean breast of it to me this morning; he means honourably, and is determined to marry your daughter as soon as she is well enough; and he is terribly distressed at this accident, which was through no fault of his. You must try and forgive him, poor fellow, Mr. Oldman, for I assure you he is not only very penitent, but he is in such a state of grief and distress, that if he does not take care I shall have him down with brain fever, as well as Miss Oldman, for which reason I would rather you didn't see him this evening, if you don't mind my saying so," said the doctor.

Noah took this as a hint that he might as well go home before Arthur returned; and since Mrs. Oldman could only leave Eve's bedside for a few minutes to speak to him, and he could be of no use, there was no object in remaining, so he and Adam returned to the boat. They pulled off in silence, Adam not knowing what to say, and feeling that in such a trial as this sympathy was perhaps better expressed by actions than by words, for Noah's grief was very great. He had gone, hoping to see his darling child, hold her in his arms, and assure her of his forgiveness; and he found her lying too ill to see him, perhaps in danger. But even this, hard as it was to bear, did not bow his noble head so low as the fact that Eve had deceived him, and made herself talked about. This grieved him far more than her bodily sickness; it wounded his pride, and at the same time revealed to him the fact that there was a fair amount of pride latent in his breast, though he had not before suspected it. Yes, he had been very proud of Eve—proud of her goodness and purity, proud of her beauty, proud of her cleverness; and at this pride a blow had been dealt. He had loved her so dearly, so tenderly, so fondly; had he loved her too well? Had he made an idol of her? Was this the reason that the Lord, who is a jealous God, had smitten him in this his tenderest spot? All this passed through his mind as he silently pulled his oar in time with Adam's, now and then dashing away the hot tears that coursed slowly down his rugged, weather-worn cheeks. No trial that could have befallen him could have touched him so nearly as this, but then he argued that was the very reason why it was sent; it showed how intimately God knew him, better even than he knew himself; it showed how dearly the Lord loved him, for "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth." And in the midst of his sorrow there arose a great joy in his heart—the joy of forgiveness, the joy of an accepted sorrow, the joy of resignation to God's will, the joy which rejoiceth in tribulation because it is the token of God's love, the joy of a loving, penitent heart which meekly and thankfully accepts the discipline of a loving Father's hand; joy far transcending all earthly joys, even as the sun, though veiled in clouds, far exceeds all other lights in strength and power; a gleam from the face of the angel of joy who, when the cry, "Nevertheless, not my will but Thine be done," went up from the garden of Gethsemane, was suffered—oh! blessed mission and thrice blessed messenger—to comfort the heart that broke on Calvary.

Such a gleam, reflected on the faces of all who have learnt that hardest and yet sweetest prayer, was now reflected on Noah's face, when Adam, resting on his oar as they left the waters of the Broad behind them, turned and suggested he should scull them the rest of the way home.

Noah consented, and moved to the stern, where, facing his companion, he said—

"I have been sorry company to-night, Adam, my lad. You must forgive me. I was just thinking how close the union between sin and suffering is. Sin is one arm of the cross, suffering the other; love the upright which binds them together. This is the beauty of Christianity; it unites the two by love into the perfect cross. Take away the love of Christ and they are but cause and effect, one following on the other as surely as night follows day."

"I have been silent too; but there are times when silence is more eloquent than words, and I thought this was one. I shall have to be present at the inquest on poor Farrar to-morrow."

"Poor Farrar! Grief is very selfish, Adam. I was so absorbed in my own trouble I had almost forgotten him, and yet it was his mad love for my poor little girl which drove him to it, poor fellow. Adam, I should like to ask you a question this evening, my lad. Has there ever been anything between you and Eve?" said Noah, after a short pause.

"No, never! We have been like brother and sister, and I love her dearly as I would a sister if I had one; but we have never cared for each other in any other way, though I have sometimes fancied you would not have been sorry if it had been so."

"It was the wish of my heart, lad—the dearest wish of my heart—to have you for my son. But God knows best, and it is well for us our wishes are not all granted."

There was a brief silence as the boat flew over the dark waters of the river, for the sun had set some time ago, and the soft, silvery, zodiacal light in the northern sky was all that was left of him; and then, perhaps, the dim light gave Adam courage, for he added, in a voice trembling with emotion—

"Father Noah, I have always shut up one chapter of my life from you; the time has come when I will open it. That chapter contains the story of my love for Miss Leicester. I have loved her since I was a little boy. Will you call me mad if I tell you I hope some day to be in a position to tell her what she already knows? I dare not say I hope to win her, because the social gulf between us is, I know, so great; but I mean to do my utmost to become worthy of her."

"Lad, lad! what next? You and Miss Grace; my little girl and Mr. Arthur! The world is turned upside down. Oh! hearts are unruly things. What did you all want to go running against nature and the right of things in this way for? Parson will never consent, Adam; no more than I will ever consent to see my Eve wedded to a gentleman; and Miss Grace, bless her, will never go against her father. But I daren't say as much as that for my little girl. She is a self-willed little creature, and I fear all I can say won't stop her, if Mr. Arthur is bent on having her."

"As he is, and after all that has passed, it seems to me it is the only thing to be done."

"No, Adam, no; two wrongs don't make a right. They ran away, and the Lord showed them they were wrong in doing so. It won't make it right to persist in marrying, and I'll never consent to it." And Noah's handsome face wore such a stern expression that Adam thought it wiser to say no more.

The next morning Noah was up with the dawn and out fishing till eight o'clock, when he went home to his solitary breakfast. He was still sipping his third basin of tea with his open Bible by his side, when a figure darkened the door of the ark and caused him to look up, and, when he saw who it was, to rise to his feet and draw himself up to his full height. It was Arthur Clifford, looking so grave and sad that it struck Noah he had grown from a happy, careless boy to a careworn man in the last forty-eight hours. But the ageing power of time is feeble compared to that of suspense and disappointment; passion is the best forcing-house for human nature if premature development is all that is desired.

"Mr. Oldman, I am the bearer of bad news. Eve is no better; but before I venture to come in, I wish to ask your forgiveness, for I know you must consider me as the cause of all your sorrow, though had everything gone as I wished, Eve would have been my wife at this moment instead of lying ill of brain fever at Bridgham. But say what you will, you can never reproach me as bitterly as I reproach myself for what has happened."

"For the accident, and the illness which it caused, I cannot blame you, Mr. Arthur; on the contrary, I have to thank you and Adam Day for saving my little girl's life; but for winning her affections and persuading her to elope with you, I do blame you severely, sir, but I forgive you; all I ask is that you will go away as soon as possible, and do all in your power to make her forget you if it should please God to restore her to health," said Noah, holding out his hand to Arthur, who advanced into the ark to take it, but stopped short in front of him at the close of this speech.

"That I can't do. Why, Noah, do you take me for a worse scoundrel than that poor fellow who is lying the victim of his own villainy in the inn at Bridgham? I always meant honourably to Eve; I meant to have married her yesterday morning; I mean to marry her now as soon as she is well enough. My fault has been in winning her secretly instead of openly, as she deserved to be won. I have always loved her since we were children together; I shall never love anyone else. If she lives, I shall marry her in spite of all anyone may say; if she dies, I pray that I may die too, unfit as I am to do so, for life without Eve would be unbearable."

And, overcome with all he had gone through, Arthur sat down, and leaning his head on the table, sobbed like a child, and Noah, with the fine instinct of a gentleman, eel-man though he was, left the ark, and became occupied with his pike-liggers, which were hanging outside, until he heard Arthur rise and move to the door, when he joined him, and holding out his hand again, said—

"Mr. Arthur, I am truly sorry for you, and from the bottom of my heart I forgive you; but, sir, I will no more let you marry Eve if I can prevent it, than I would have let you go for a sail alone in my boat when you were a child of ten and often begged me to do so. The chances are you would have been shipwrecked then if I had lent you my boat; and they are still greater that your life would be wrecked now if I gave you my daughter. If I know Eve at all she will not marry you now without my consent, whatever she might have done yesterday. Now, sir, I don't say it in anger, I say it in love for you both, and with the truest regard for your welfare, that I will never consent to your marriage; and if you think you have done me any wrong, all I ask you to do is to go away and forget Eve as quickly as you can."

"I cannot. As to our marriage we will leave Eve to decide that, and I cannot think she will break her promise to me—even at your command; but leave here till she is well enough to decide the matter I can't and won't. You have been frank with me, and I will be frank with you, so suppose we agree to let matters be as they now are until Eve is well enough to tell us what she wishes. That will not be for some time, I fear, for Payne tells me to-day it will be two or three weeks, even if she goes on well, before we can dream of moving her, and before I can see her."

"Very good, sir, so let it be then; at any rate, we understand each other, and I thank you for this visit."

And if Noah had been a peer of the realm, he could not have borne himself in a calmer and more dignified manner than he did throughout the interview.

THE MICROSCOPE AND OURSELVES.

SOME short time ago I gave a sketch of the general construction of a microscope, and briefly indicated the best and most effective way of manipulating an instrument such as I described. Sufficient information is conveyed in those articles to enable my readers to appreciate the means by which a knowledge of the various things, of which I have now to speak, is obtained. Hitherto our observations have been confined to those things which by their outward appearance gave us a desire to see their more intimate structure; but our microscope can do more than that for us: it can reveal to us in the most commonplace objects a beauty far beyond conjecture.

We will ask our microscope questions about common objects, by means of which we may discover what various parts of our very selves would look like under those wonderful piercing eyes of his. First let us take a little piece of bone. What an unlovely object, you think! and so it is, but let us take a well-prepared microscope specimen of a piece of bone that has been carefully ground very thin and mounted on a glass slide, such a specimen as we can buy at a microscope shop, and you will soon alter your mind.

What do you see now? Roughly you see an indefinite repetition of Fig. 1. Now let us select such a portion as is diagrammatically represented by Fig. 1, and let us commence at the centre. First of all there is a central circular hole; now this is a transverse section of a canal or tube, and is called the "central canal" or "Haversian canal," from Havers, the anatomist who demonstrated it. Now immediately surrounding this central canal is a circular layer of hard, mineral, bony substance, and what we see is a transverse section of this layer, which is arranged round the central canal like a scroll of paper round a ruler; from being a thin layer it is called a "lamella," and from its arrangement with reference to the central canal it is said to be "concentric."

FIG. 1. AN HAVERSIAN SYSTEM OF BONE.

But what are those dreadful-looking, beetle-like objects in Fig. 1 that we next see? These are all a part, and a very important part, of this structure, and I shall have something to tell about their raison d'être presently. If you look carefully at your specimen you will notice that these dark objects, which are really empty spaces, are placed between the "concentric lamellæ," and extending from each space are little branches which permeate the lamellæ, and communicate with one another at various points. These spaces, from their supposed resemblance to little lakes, are called "lacunæ"; the small branches "canaliculi," little canals.

Now, taken collectively, what I have just described goes to make an "Haversian system," and the whole structure of a compact bone is but an accumulation of parallel Haversian systems, like so many tubes lying side by side.

And now a word about the lacunæ. You must know that the specimen we have been looking at has been subjected to a process known as "maceration," whereby all the animal matter is eliminated, and only the mineral framework remains—"the skeleton of the bone," we might call it. You remember that when I described low-life organisms I spoke of amoeba, a one-celled creature with its pseudopodia or processes. Well now, if you can imagine an amoeba living in each lacuna, and spreading its branches out through all the canaliculi, you will have a tolerably accurate notion of the state of things in bone. The central canal contains the vessels which mainly nourish the bone, and with this canal the little canaliculi communicate, thus carrying nourishment to the lacunal cells, and so forwarding it throughout the bone. Now round the bone is a sheath which also carries nutrient vessels, and this sheath is called the "periosteum," from two Greek words meaning "around" and "bone." With this sheath the canaliculi nearest the edge of the bone communicate, and thus we see how the bone is kept alive. And now, what has our microscope taught us? It has taught us that in this ugly piece of bone there is a beauty of purpose, a magnificence of architecture, a knowledge of the exigencies of the case and how to meet them. Bone requires strength; what could be stronger than this concentric arrangement? What would those who make our big guns say?

Bone requires vitality. What could be more elaborate or complete than its lacunal cells, each locked up in its little strong-room, delicate in structure yet free from injury.

Another point in the structure of bone which may interest you, and which serves to point out the extraordinary provisions which Nature makes, is one which was first demonstrated by Dr. Sharpey, and it is this: running obliquely through the concentric lamellæ, and bolting them together, are a set of fibres, as indicated in Fig. 2; this serves to strengthen the apposition of the lamellæ in a remarkable way, and is a process of rivetting. So much for our piece of bone. Yet stay; our microscope friend who prepared the piece of bone took something away from it which he has made into another specimen. What was that something? A piece of gristle from the end. "And is that worth preparing?" you may ask, in horrified surprise. "Yes, and worth looking at too!" Gristle is not a nice word; let us call this substance by its technical name, "cartilage." And now we have a specimen under the microscope; and first let me tell you how it has been prepared. A very thin section has been sliced off by a machine known as a "microtome"; this has been stained in carmine, the preparation of which stain I have already given, and the specimen has been mounted, after the manner already indicated, in glycerine.

What do we see? We see a general pinkish substance which looks like ground glass, and in this we see a number of cells, each encapsuled. You see that this structure is much simpler than bone—there are no processes to the cells, there is no concentric arrangement, no lamellæ. But this ground-glass substance helps to form an excellent buffer for the end of the bone. The ground-glass appearance of the section has given it its name, "hyaline cartilage."

Like bone, it has a nutrient sheath, the "perichondrium," but it has no central canal; its cells, however, subserve the same purpose in this structure as did the lacunæ cells in bone. Fig. 3 represents a section such as we have observed. Now all cartilage does not present exactly the same appearance as the above specimen, but is variously adapted according to the functions required of it. Thus, where great strength, immobility, and resistance is required, the hyaline groundwork is replaced by a structure better calculated to provide these qualities. Let us look at a section (see Fig. 4). The cells are of the same shape as in our hyaline specimen, but perhaps smaller; and now instead of a hyaline groundwork we have one having a general wavy outline, which is characteristic of a substance, very strong, inelastic and resisting, known as "white fibrous tissue," a tissue which goes to form the "leaders" of the wrist and other strong tendons.

Again, where elasticity more than immobility is required we find the groundwork again modified, this time in the direction of "yellow elastic tissue." This differs from the white fibrous tissue in that the wavy outline is absent, the colour is yellow instead of white, and the fibres are branched. Fig. 5 represents this structure. Now we have seen three important modifications of this apparently uninteresting "gristle," "hyaline," or ordinary cartilage; "white fibro-cartilage," as the second variety is called; and "yellow elastic cartilage," which we have just looked at.

When you go to the microscope shop to buy a specimen of bone "mounted dry," as they term it, you will notice that the label is very probably written in French, as most of these bone specimens are prepared in France. The shopman will almost certainly show you the brother specimen to the bone—a specimen also for the most part prepared in France—I mean a thin section of a tooth. We must acknowledge our microscope powerful and wonderful indeed, if it can give us a pleasurable interest in an object associated for the most part with painful recollections at some period of our existence. Yet so it is; and this offending and dreaded member is beautiful indeed if we look at it with our microscope's eyes.

Let us first of all look at our specimen with a low power. We see that the tooth is divided into a "crown" (Fig. 6), which is thick and strong, a constricted portion, the "neck," and a long thick part, the "fang."

Now let us look with a higher power at the crown, and let us begin our observations at the edge of this part. We see a clean homogeneous-looking structure, which may appear to consist of a number of hexagonal plates (Fig. 7, a). This is the hardest part of the tooth, the part which gives it its shining whiteness—the enamel. You will notice how this hard part protects the rest of the tooth from injury during the performance of its functions. It really consists of a collection of minute hexagonal rods; the hexagonal appearance is apparent in transverse sections, as in Fig. 7, a; the rods are shown in Fig. 7, b.

FIG. 7. (a) ENAMEL RODS, TRANSVERSE SECTION. (b) ENAMEL RODS.

Next we come to that tissue which forms the greatest part of the tooth—the ivory or "dentine" (Fig. 6, b). This you will see consists of a number of minute tubes running from the central cavity at c to the edge of the tooth; each of these tubes at its commencement measures about 1-4500th of an inch in diameter.

As you move your specimen you will notice that at a point the enamel no longer exists; this is the neck of the tooth. Next you will notice a layer of tissue presenting somewhat the characters which I have described as peculiar to the structure of bone, but lacking the systematic arrangement which we found in our specimen of that tissue. This bears the same relation to the dentine of the lower half of the tooth that the enamel does to the upper. This layer is called the "Crusta Petrosa," and helps to fix the tooth in its socket.

But what is this large central cavity in the tooth? Is it not like the central canal in our bone specimen? Certainly; and this "pulp cavity" (Fig. 6, c) contains the nutrient vessels and nerve (!), the severance of which gives such pain on removal, and a number of cells, like our lacunal cells in bone, all destined for the nourishment of the tooth.

And see what a great provision there is for such nourishment! Turn your attention to the dentine; see how great a part of the tooth substance it forms! And now I have to tell you that these minute dentine canals are all provided with delicate processes from the amoeba-like cells in the pulp cavity, like the cells that live in the lacunæ of bone! The dentine tubules are the canaliculi of the tooth. Again, the same beauty of purpose, the same great care and forethought, the same adaptation of structure to function, all tell of the perfect Mechanician, the perfect Physicist, the perfect Creator! How carefully ought we to guard these beautiful structures given to us! Yet how careless are many of us in their preservation in daily life! The enamel of the tooth must protect the underlying dentine in which the nourishing elements live, and the knowledge culled from our microscope gives us an intelligent idea of the reason for taking care of that visible part of our teeth—the enamel.

We have begun with the "dry bones," as it were, of human microscopy; later I shall hope to tell of things of greater interest.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XIV.
BESSIE SNUBS A HERO.

"So you are going, after all," was the only remark made by Edna, as she caught sight of Bessie's grey gown. "Well, be quick; I have nearly finished my luncheon. I thought you were never coming, and there was no time to lose."

"I will not keep you waiting," returned Bessie, whose healthy young appetite failed her for once. "I am not hungry."

"Nonsense!" said Edna, with restored good-humour. "You will find this mayonnaise excellent. You have had a long ride, and the drive to Staplehurst will take nearly an hour. We shall have a lovely afternoon for our expedition." Edna was chatting in her old lively fashion. She really looked exquisitely pretty this afternoon, and she seemed to take a delight in her own naughtiness. Her eyes sparkled mischievously every time she looked at Bessie's grave face. She was as frisky as a young colt who had just taken his bit between his teeth and had bolted. Her spirits seemed to rise during her long drive, and she talked and laughed without intermission. Bessie tried to respond and to make herself agreeable, but her efforts failed signally. She looked forward to the afternoon as a long martyrdom to be endured; the thought of Mrs. Sefton's and Richard's reproachful faces came between her and all enjoyment. Edna took no notice of her unusual gravity; she had gained her end, and obliged Bessie to bear her unwilling company, and so she was satisfied. It was almost a relief to Bessie when the drive was over, and they found themselves at Staplehurst. Polo was to be played in a large parklike meadow belonging to Staplehurst Hall. As they drove in at the gate, two or three of the officers who were to play were walking about in their bright, silk jerseys, while their ponies followed them, led by their grooms. One came up at once, and greeted the young ladies.

"I was on the look-out for you, Miss Sefton," he observed, with a smile that he evidently intended to be winning, but which Bessie thought was extremely disagreeable. "I knew you would not disappoint me, even if Sefton proved obdurate."

"Richard had some stupid farming engagement," returned Edna, "so I brought Miss Lambert instead. Is your mother on the ground, Captain Grant?"

"Yes; let me take you to her," he replied, with alacrity; but it was some time before Jack and Jill made their way to the central point where the ladies were sitting. Several of the officers joined Captain Grant, and there was quite a triumphal procession through the field. Edna sat like a little queen guiding her ponies, and distributing smiles and gay speeches. Admiration and pleasure were as the breath of life to her; she was at once peremptory and gracious; she looked down at her escort with a sort of benign amusement. When Captain Grant handed her out of the low chaise, she made her way through the ladies with the air of a princess.

A tall, high-coloured woman with dark hair, and dressed in rather bad taste, held out her hand and welcomed her warmly.

"My dear, I am so glad to see you; Jem told me you were sure to come. Is this Miss Lambert? Put those chairs closer, Jem. And so your mother could not come. Never mind; I am used to chaperoning young ladies, though I never had girls of my own."

Edna answered civilly, but Bessie soon perceived that Mrs. Grant's conversation was not exactly to her taste. She spoke in a loud voice, and as most of her remarks were about her boy Jem, as she called him, his extraordinary cleverness and good luck at polo, and his merits as a son and officer, it was extremely desirable that they should not be overheard; but Mrs. Grant seemed quite indifferent to the amused looks of the ladies round her, and her broad, good-natured face beamed with smiles as Jem made a fine stroke and won the goal.

"He rides better than any of the men," she exclaimed, proudly. "I'll back my boy against any of them. Oh, look, Miss Sefton, Singleton has hit the ball away—no, Jem is galloping after him, he means to carry it. Yes—no—yes! they are through! Bravo, Jem, bravo!" and Mrs. Grant clapped her hands excitedly.

In spite of her uneasiness, it was impossible for Bessie not to become first interested and then absorbed in the game, and for a little while she forgot all about the Grange. She had never seen polo played before, and she was carried away by the excitement of that fascinating but perilous game; the mad rush of the horses across the grass, the quick strokes of the players, the magnificent riding, and the ease and grace with which the officers guided their ponies and leant over their saddles to strike the ball; the breathless moment when young Singleton rode alone with all the others pursuing him wildly; no wonder Bessie felt enthralled by the novelty of the sight. She uttered a little scream once when the horses and riders all crushed together in a sort of confused mêlée.

"Is anyone hurt?" she exclaimed, in much distress; but Edna and Mrs. Grant only laughed.

"You must come with me and have some tea," observed Mrs. Grant, when the match was over. "My lodgings are just by."

Edna hesitated for a moment, and Bessie touched her arm—

"It is already five," she whispered.

"Do you see those dark clouds? We shall have a thunder shower soon; I think it would be better to start for home."

"And be caught in the rain," replied Edna, with a shrug. "And we have no umbrellas nor waterproofs. No, Bessie, we must take refuge at Mrs. Grant's until the shower is over. Come along, don't make a fuss, I do not want to go any more than you do, but it is no use getting wet through; we cannot help it if we are late for dinner." And so saying Edna again joined the talkative Mrs. Grant.

Bessie said no more, but all her uneasiness returned as she followed Edna. Mrs. Grant had temporary lodgings in the High Street, over a linendraper's shop. She ushered her young guests into a large, untidy-looking room, with three windows overlooking the street. One or two of the other ladies joined them, and one officer after another soon found their way up the steep little staircase, for Mrs. Grant was noted for her hospitality. She called Edna to help her at the tea table, and Bessie seated herself by one of the windows. No one took much notice of her; her good-natured partner at tennis, Leonard Singleton, was not among Mrs. Grant's guests.

Captain Grant brought her some tea, and offered her cake and fruit, but he soon left her to devote himself exclusively to Miss Sefton. Bessie felt very dull, and out in the cold, and yet she had no wish to join the gay group round the tea table. The room felt close and oppressive; the first heavy drops were pattering on the window; two or three children were running down the street with a yellow dog barking at their heels.

"You will get wet; shall I close the window?" observed a voice behind her, and Bessie started and looked round at the tall, solemn-looking young officer, who had been introduced to her two hours previously as "Captain Brough-ton, not of ours, Miss Lambert."

"Oh no, I prefer it open, it is so warm," replied Bessie, hastily.

"Oh, ah, yes. Are you fond of polo?"

"I never saw it played until this afternoon; it is very exciting, but I am sure it must be dangerous."

"Nothing to speak of, an accident now and then—man half killed last Thursday, though."

"Oh dear, how dreadful!"

The solemn-faced officer relaxed into a smile.

"Well, he might have been killed outright in battle, don't you know; accidents will happen now and then; it is just luck, you see, and Owen always is such an unlucky beggar."

Bessie refuted this with some vivacity. She explained that though it might be a man's duty to die for his country, it was quite another thing to imperil a valuable life on a mere game; but she could make no impression on the solemn-faced captain.

"But it is an uncommonly good game, don't you know," he persisted, and Bessie gave up the point, for Captain Broughton's mind seemed as wooden as his face.

"It was no good talking to such a man," she observed to Edna as they drove home; "he said 'Don't you know' at the end of every sentence, and seemed so stupid."

"Are you talking about Captain Broughton?" asked Edna, calmly. "My dear Daisy, it is not always wise to judge by appearances. Captain Broughton is not specially amusing in conversation, but he is a brave fellow. Do you know he wears the Victoria Cross for his gallantry in saving a wounded soldier; only a private, too. Yes; though he was wounded himself, he carried him off the field. He was a village lad—one of his own tenants—who had followed him out to India, and when another ball struck him he just staggered on."

"Oh, dear!" groaned Bessie; "this is a punishment to me for judging too quickly. To think I had the opportunity for the first time in my life of talking to a hero, and that I called him stupid! This is a case of entertaining angels unawares. But if one could only know they were angels."

Edna only laughed at this; but Bessie found food for uncomfortable reflection all the way home. The rain had ceased at last, but not before Edna had grown secretly conscious of the lateness of the hour. It was nearly seven before the weather allowed them to start, and for the last half hour she had stood at the window quite oblivious of Captain Grant's entreaties that she would make herself comfortable, and evidently deaf to his unmeaning compliments, for she answered absently, and with a manner that showed that she was ill at ease.

The moment the rain ceased, she asked him peremptorily to order her pony chaise round.

"Mamma will be getting anxious at this long delay," she said, so gravely that Captain Grant dare not disobey her.

"You will come over next Saturday and see our match with the Hussars," he pleaded, as she gathered up the reins.

"Perhaps; but I will not promise," she returned, with a nod and a smile. "Oh, dear; how tiresome these last two hours have been! You have not enjoyed yourself a bit, Bessie. I am so sorry!"

"Oh, never mind," returned Bessie, wearily, and then they had both been silent. Neither was in the mood to enjoy the delicious freshness of the evening; that clear shining after rain that is so indescribable, the wet, gleaming hedges, the little sparkling pools, the vivid green of the meadows; for Edna was feeling the reaction after her excitement; and Bessie, tired out with conflicting feelings, was thinking regretfully of her unsatisfactory conversation with Captain Broughton.

"It serves me right, after all," she thought, penitently. "Father always says that we ought to take trouble to please even the most commonplace, uninteresting person, not to let ourselves be bored by anyone, however ungenial they may be, and of course he is right. I was just fidgetting about the weather, and how we were to get home, and so I did not try to be entertaining." And here Bessie made a mental resolution to be more charitable in her estimate of people. She had no idea that Captain Broughton had said to himself as he left her, "Nice little girl, no nonsense about her; not a bad sort after the women one sees; can talk to a man without looking for a compliment; like her better than Miss Sefton."

Just as the drive was drawing to a close, Bessie roused up from her unwonted depression. They had turned out of the narrow lane, and a wide sweep of country lay before them, bathed in the soft tints of the setting sun. A mass of golden and crimson clouds made the western heavens glorious, the meadows were transfigured in the yellow radiance, every hedge-row and bush seemed touched by an unearthly finger, a sense of distance, of mystery, of tranquil rest seemed to pervade the world.

"Oh, Edna, how beautiful! If only one were an artist to try and paint that."

"Yes; it is a fine evening," remarked Edna, carelessly. "Thank goodness, there is the Grange at last. Yes, there is Richard, evidently on the look-out for us. So I suppose they have finished dinner."

"Did you think we were lost?" she asked, with a little air of defiance, as her brother came forward and patted the ponies.

"No," he said, gravely; "I told my mother the rain must have detained you. It is a pity you went, Edna. Sinclair has been here two hours. He came down in the same train with mother."

"Neville here!" And Edna's look changed, and she became rather pale. "What has brought him, Richard?"

Richard shrugged his shoulders, and replied that he had not the least idea. He supposed it was a whim. It was evident that Edna was not too well pleased at the news. A little hardness came into her face, and she walked into the house without taking any notice of Bessie.

As Bessie stood hesitating for a moment in the hall, Richard followed her. He had not even looked at her, and poor Bessie felt sure that his manner expressed disapproval.

"Will you not go into the drawing-room, Miss Lambert?"

"Oh, no. Mr. Sinclair is there, is he not? I would rather go upstairs and take off my things. I am very tired." And here Bessie faltered a little.

But to her surprise Richard looked at her very kindly.

"Of course you are tired. You had that long ride; but Edna would not think of that. Take off your things quickly and come down to the dining-room. Dixon will have something ready for you. There is some coffee going into the drawing-room. You will like some?"

"Oh, yes, please," returned Bessie, touched by this thoughtfulness for her comfort; after all he could not be angry with her. Perhaps she would have time to explain, to ask his opinion, to talk out her perplexity. How comfortable that would be! Bessie would not stay to change her dress, she only smoothed her hair, and ran down. Richard was waiting for her, and Dixon had just brought in the coffee. When he had gone out of the room she said, eagerly—

"Oh, Mr. Sefton, I am so glad to be able to ask you a question. You were not vexed with me for going to Staplehurst with your sister?"

"Vexed!" returned Richard, in a tone that set her mind at rest in a moment. "You acted exactly as I expected you to act. When mother showed me your note I only said, 'I never doubted for a moment what Miss Lambert would do; she would go, of course.'"

"Yes, I only hesitated for a moment; but oh! what a miserable afternoon it has been!" And as she touched on the various incidents, including her tête-à-tête with Captain Broughton, Richard listened with much sympathy.

"I never dreamt for a moment that Edna would go after all, but it was just a piece of childish bravado. The foolish girl does not think of consequences. It is a most unfortunate thing that Sinclair should turn up at this moment; he is a little stiff on these subjects, and I am afraid that he is terribly annoyed."

"Did Mrs. Sefton tell him all about it?"

"My mother? No; she would have given worlds to hide it from him. Edna told him herself that she was going in her last letter. Oh, you don't know Edna," as Bessie looked extremely surprised at this; "her chief virtue is truthfulness. She will defy you to your face, and trample on all your prejudices, but she will never hide anything."

"And she actually told Mr. Sinclair!"

"Yes; she did it to tease him, I believe, because his last letter did not please her. Sinclair has to put up with a good deal, I can tell you, but he wrote back in a great hurry, begging her not to carry out her plan. Sinclair told us both this evening that he could not have written a stronger letter. He told her that he had good reasons for wishing her to see as little as possible of Captain Grant. And when he came down just to give her a pleasant surprise, as he had a leisure evening, it was quite a shock to him to find his entreaties had been disregarded, and that she had actually gone after all. He is excessively hurt, and no wonder, to find Edna has so little respect for his wishes."

"It was a grievous mistake," returned Bessie, sorrowfully. "I don't believe Edna enjoyed herself one bit."

"No, it was just a freak of temper, and she chose to be self-willed about it. I hope she will show herself penitent to Sinclair; she can turn him round her little finger if she likes; but sometimes she prefers to quarrel with him. I really think Edna enjoys a regular flare up," finished Richard, laughing. "She says a good quarrel clears the air like a thunderstorm; but I confess that I don't agree with her."

(To be continued.)

EYAM AND ITS MEMORABLE WOE.

PART II.

As we have previously said, it is not our intention to dwell for any length upon the details and incidents of the plague, or the many painful events which marked its malignant course. William and Mary Howitt, the Rev. J. P. Neal, William Wood, and others have recorded these, so we will hurry on to describe the existing relics and memorials still to be seen at Eyam.

The road from Stony Middleton to Eyam, commonly called "Middleton Dale,"* we have already described; and leading out of this at right angles, within a few hundred yards of the village of Eyam, is the "Delf" or "Delve," a wild and romantic valley, in the midst of which rises a lofty grass-clad mound, crowned by the strange cavern or grotto called "Cucklet Church," the place where Mompesson assembled the villagers after the closing of the parish church. It consists of a huge mass of rock, which is hollow, forming a cavern with four entrances, two on the north and two on the south. The interior bears such strong evidences of the action of water, that in all probability it was at one time a vast natural cistern, which was violently rent open by the water, and which, in its escape, tore open the great apertures now forming the entrances to this most singular cavern.

The name "Cucklet Church" is said only to date from the time that Mompesson used it for religious purposes, though it is not impossible that it may in olden times have been a hermitage or chapel of some kind; in fact, it is difficult to understand why Mompesson should have selected for purposes of worship a place so very difficult of access, without it previously possessed some religious or sacred associations attached to it.

The delf or dell comes to an abrupt termination about two hundred yards nearer to the village beyond "Cucklet Church," and is closed by one of the most startling pieces of scenery in this country; two huge rocks seem to have been hurled from their bases, and, meeting together midway, they form a low, triangular, pitch-dark cavern, through which rushes a wild mountain-torrent; the cliff-like rocks above and beyond are torn open and rent asunder by a great jagged cleft, and through this ragged and broken aperture is seen a streak of sky, whilst the whole is overshadowed from above by a thick growth of trees. It is impossible to conceive anything more savagely gloomy or more wild; one absolutely feels a creeping sensation through one's flesh when looking at this, and a chill of neighbourhood and knows well its traditions, told the writer that there is a story current amongst the older inhabitants of the village that Madame Stafford of Bradshawe Hall, the ruins of which still stand near the village, was here concealed for six weeks from the pursuivants and soldiers sent to convey her to prison because of her religious opinions in the reign of Elizabeth; here she was secretly fed by some of the inhabitants of the village, who sympathised with her.

* The parish of Eyam extends quite up to the village of Stony Middleton, so that the whole of "Middleton Dale" is really in Eyam parish.

A narrow and very steep footpath conducts one from the "delf" or dell to the village, which we enter through a gate leading on to the green opposite to the old hall, a singularly well-preserved example of Jacobean architecture, with heavy stone mulioned windows and low-pitched gables. The old forecourt of the house still exists, and is entered by a gateway with square piers, carved with "Cartouche" panels and crowned by urns. About a hundred yards farther on to the right is the church and churchyard; and a little way from the fine ancient cross, which we have previously described, and shaded by an old dwarf yew-tree, is the square, high tomb of Catherine Mompesson, erected to her memory by her devoted husband. On the flat stone which covers it is the following inscription—

Catherine, wife of William Mompesson, rector of this church,
daughter of Randolph
Carr, Esquire, lately of Cocken, in the county of Durham. Buried

the 25th day of the month of August, in the year of our Lord 1666.

At the foot of the tomb is an hourglass, with extended wings, deeply cut in stone, and beneath the inscription—

CAVETE: NESKITIS: HORAM:

"Beware, ye know not the hour!"

At the opposite end of the tomb are the words—

"Death is my gain."

almost horror upon regarding it. Those lines of Præd's come vividly before the mind—

"Bold was he who hither came
At midnight, man or boy;
For the place was cursed by an evil name,
And that name was the devil's decoy."

That some painful story of affliction or suffering should be attached to this place, or that it should be haunted by sad memories, one is only too prepared to believe. The rector of the parish, who is a native of the

THE OLD HALL.

There are scroll-work pilasters at the corners of the tomb, plain shields at the sides, and stone posts at the angles of the steps upon which it stands.

Catherine Mompesson was probably the only person buried in the churchyard after the isolation of the village and the closing of the churchyard itself.

A CHAIR IN THE CHANCEL.

A very few yards from the grave of Catherine Mompesson is the little wicket in the clipped laurel hedge leading to the garden of Eyam Rectory.

Unfortunately, the house itself was almost entirely rebuilt and very much enlarged by a rich rector about a century ago. Not only is this to be regretted upon historical and artistic grounds, but also for economical reasons, as this large pretentious house has saddled the living with expenses in the way of repairs, furniture, etc., which are most undesirable; in fact, this wealthy parson of the last century has bequeathed "a white elephant" to his successors. Of course, from an historical point of view, simply irreparable damage was inflicted by the erection of this pretentious and incongruous parsonage. A few portions of the old rectory inhabited by the Mompessons are, however, still to be seen incorporated in the modern house; the most important of these is the staircase, with its prettily carved oak bannisters. It is impossible to look at this without recalling to mind the domestic life of Catherine Mompesson. We know from her husband's letters what a perfect wife and mother she was; and we can almost fancy that we see her in her earlier and happy days playing and romping with her children as she takes them up this staircase to their nursery. Then occurs to the mind her sad parting from these little ones, and one pictures to oneself the children brought down ready dressed for departure, and placed, for the last time on this earth, in the arms of their sweet and loving mother, who impresses upon their lips the last kiss, and commends them to the care of God, with a certain presentiment in her mind that they shall meet no more until "this mortal has put on immortality." This passes away from the mind, and one sees a nobler figure pass down the staircase. Catherine, tried by suffering, walking literally in "the valley of the shadow of death," with the pestilence raging round her in a world of horror and of gloom, bent upon some noble errand of mercy, to carry comfort and consolation to the sick and dying. Then again we see her feebly climbing the staircase, assisted by her husband, he, broken-hearted, as we know from his letters, with a certain knowledge in his mind that God is about to remove from him the greatest blessing and consolation of his mortal pilgrimage. Again we can almost fancy we hear that scuffle of feet upon the staircase, and some heavy burden being brought down. It is indeed a precious burden, for it is the body of one who has "spent herself for the love of the Lord:" a body from which a sweet soul has gone to its Maker, purified from all earthly taint by a charity, a self-sacrifice, a devotion to Christ's poor, a sympathy with suffering, and a readiness to endure all things and to suffer all things for His sake. She was laid in the grave by loving hands, for everyone loved her; she was mourned for with the tears of sincerity, for to whom had she not been gentle, kind, and considerate? There is not a person throughout the whole length and breadth of England who could regard this old staircase without feeling that, like Jacob's ladder, it has been "trodden by angels' feet." Much as one feels tempted to dwell upon the considerations and memories called up by this old staircase, and thoughts of that "angel in the house," Catherine Mompesson, we must hurry on to notice other relics and scenes of that affliction which converted her from being a sweet girl-mother into a heroic, self-sacrificing woman, cheerfully ready to lay down her life in the holy cause of succouring and consoling suffering humanity.

Upon entering the church at Eyam we shall find attached to the new porch a most interesting and singular-looking poor-box, which is a relic of the time of the plague. A plain oak pulpit is also pointed out as that from which Mompesson preached, but truth compels us to say that it is not in a style of work at all consistent with this theory. In the chancel of the church, however, there is an undoubted relic of the time of the plague in the form of a solid old carved oak arm-chair which belonged to William Mompesson, and is inscribed in ancient letters, MOM. 1665. EyJM. The word MOM. is of course short for Mompesson, and the date 1665 is the very year in which the plague broke out. EyJM is probably the old way of spelling Eyam. On the back of the chair is a rudely carved crest, which is too much damaged to be quite intelligible. Probably this was a library-chair, and was from its somewhat rude execution made in the village. It was one of the few pieces of furniture that was spared from the general burning of all household goods ordered by Mompesson after the cessation of the plague. Perhaps it was spared on account of some hallowed recollection connected with the history of his sweet and saintly wife; anyway, it is an object of the greatest possible interest.

A little to the west of the churchyard is the house known as the Plague House, from the fact that the tailor, to whom the packet of goods was addressed which caused such fearful havoc in Eyam, was at the time lodging here. The house has been for the most part rebuilt since the event here recorded, but the old kitchen still remains. Just outside the village to the west are to be seen the ruins of Bradshawe Hall, where the Staffords resided, and concerning one member of which family is connected the strange story which we have already related in describing the dell. An heiress of this family married one of the Bradshaws, from whom this house took the title of Bradshawe Hall. Bradshawe the regicide was one of the descendants of this family, who appear to have been occasionally residing here at the time of the plague.

We must now ask our readers to accompany us to the opposite end of the village, or, rather a quarter of a mile beyond it, where, after passing through a wood and ascending a steep hill, we shall find ourselves in a somewhat bleak stretch of land surrounded on all sides by lofty hills, with the two villages of Stony Middleton and Calver lying in a valley to the southward; here, enclosed by a rough stone wall, we shall find seven tombstones, which are known as the "Riley

Graves." One is a large square tomb with a slab on the top of it, and is inscribed as follows:—

John Hancock, senior, buried August 7th, 1666.

"Remember, man,
As thou goest by,
As thou art now
Even once was I.
As I do now,
So must thou lie.
Remember, man,
That thou must die."

Wood, in his history, makes the sixth line "So must I lie," but the word on the tombstone seems to be thou. Of course the inscription is nearly illegible, but we fancy, after having carefully examined it, that Wood is wrong. On the sides of this tomb are the words "Vigilate: Orate; horam nescitis"—"Watch and Pray; ye know not the hour!"* evidently a favourite text of Mompesson's, as we find it on his wife's tomb. The other graves have perfectly plain headstones, with the following inscriptions:—

Elizabeth Hancock, buried Aug. 3rd, 1666.

John Hancock, buried Aug. 3rd, 1666.

Oner Hancock, buried Aug. 7th, 1666.

William Hancock, buried Aug. 7th, 1666.

Alice Hancock, buried Aug. 9th, 1666.

Ann Hancock, buried Aug. 10th, 1666.

These altogether form the record of a whole family destroyed by the plague, and it was the mother, who in one week buried with her own hands her husband and six children, who was—shall we say mercifully?—spared.

CATHERINE MOMPESSEON'S GRAVE.

There is one other relic of the plague which we must mention before concluding our subject. About half a mile from the Riley graves, rather to the northward, and at the foot of the hill known as "Sir William," is a little stone cistern with a heavy slab over it. This is known as Mompesson Well, and is one of the places where the goods supplied to the villagers during the plague were deposited, the goods themselves being placed on the stone above, and the money, when payment was needed, in the little stone trough beneath, so that the water would cut off all chance of contamination from those removing it. It was of course arranged that the recipients of the goods should never by any chance be present when the articles were being left.

We have now completed our sad and mournful subject. Sad it undoubtedly is; suffering and death, especially that caused by a loathsome and hideous form of disease, must always be a painful theme for human beings to dwell upon. How terrible, malignant and appalling the plague was may be gathered from the fact that when Mompesson left Eyam in 1669, i.e., three years after the plague, to take the living which had been presented to him by Sir George Saville, of Rufford Abbey, the inhabitants of the village of Eakring refused to admit him to reside in the village, and Sir George Saville had to erect him a house in his own park, where he lived until Mompesson's own character endeared him to the flock over which he was called to preside, to such an extent that they were only too anxious for him to take up his abode in their midst.

* "When you shall be called away," is of course understood.

Before concluding this article upon the plague at Eyam, it is but just that we should acknowledge that many of the facts herein stated are taken from Mr. Wood's excellent history of Eyam, which is still sold in the picturesque little cottage which he inhabited during his industrious life.

Few villages have had the advantage of such a painstaking chronicler, and we recommend any of our readers whom we may have sufficiently interested in our subject, to make them desire further information, to purchase Wood's book and study it out for themselves. We are especially indebted to him for the letters of Mompesson from which we have made extracts, and for the statistics of the plague.

In conclusion, we will point out to our girls what seem to us to be the chief lessons to be derived from the painful history we have related. In the first place we see how noble a virtue is self-sacrifice, and how God rewards it; for the noble and heroic conduct of the inhabitants of this out-of-the-way village absolutely extinguished one of the greatest scourges which had for centuries visited this land, carrying death, desolation, and horror wherever it went. Their devotion and their generosity conquered this appalling destroyer. We read in history of great warriors commanding troops "who knew not fear"; but what were their conquests compared to those who annihilated "the plague," and delivered us (under God) from such an enemy? But another and even higher lesson to be learnt from the acts and death of Catherine Mompesson, one which is full of consolation and encouragement, is the fact that God will, if we only wait upon Him, strengthen us to carry out our duty, however painful and however arduous that duty may be. We see in the case of Catherine Mompesson a highly-born, carefully brought up girl, of delicate health (for her husband tells us in his letters that she had a tendency to consumption), suddenly called upon to make the most heroic sacrifices, to send away her children whom she most tenderly loved, to devote her life to nursing and visiting those suffering from the most appalling and deadly of all diseases, feeling at the time almost certain that in her case her own death would be the result. Yet seeing that this was her duty she cheerfully abandoned everything that could make life pleasant, and even consented to what must have caused the bitterest pang to her sweet maternal heart—the separation from her children, in order to "wait upon the Lord" and do His work. How God strengthened her to go through this terrible ordeal, and to make these great sacrifices, is the most instructive lesson taught by the history of the "Memorable Woe of Eyam."

[THE END.]

THE ROMANCE OF NATURE; OR, THE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS, PLANTS, EARTH, AIR, SEA, AND SKY.

By JAMES MASON.

II.—MORE FOLKLORE OF ANIMALS.

AT the end of our last article we were speaking about birds, and had mentioned several curious superstitions connected with nightingales, cuckoos, owls, ravens, magpies, crows, and pigeons. We shall begin this one with our familiar friends, swallows and martins.

For swallows or martins to build in a window corner, or indeed anywhere about a house, has long been considered a lucky omen, and any trouble they cause is patiently borne with under the belief that their presence brings prosperity. A resident in Suffolk, writing in Chambers's "Book of Days," mentions that soon after setting up housekeeping for himself he was congratulated on a martin having built its nest in the porch over his front door. "The more birds," it used to be said, "the better luck." To tear down a nest once it was built was looked upon as a daring of the Fates, sure to be followed by a great calamity in the family within a twelvemonth.

To associate misfortune with doing unkind turns to swallows may be looked upon as a relic of paganism. These birds were sacred to the household gods of the ancients, and their preservation was a matter of religious concern. They were held in high honour as the harbingers of spring, and it must be allowed that they have always done their best to secure the affection of the human race by the trustfulness with which they build their nests under the eaves of our homes.

Some people say that swallows and martins never come to a house where there is strife, which, if true, shows their good sense. When they forsake a house they have once frequented the occupier may expect misfortune. When they fly down the chimney, as sometimes happens, death, it used to be held, may be looked for.

Such is the folklore connected with swallows and martins. As objects of superstitious regard even more interesting birds are robins and wrens. These two are frequently linked together in the popular mind, perhaps in consequence of the notion that they act as partners in the kindly business of covering with moss or leaves the dead bodies of any of the human race that may be left exposed to the heavens. We meet with a reference to this in one of Webster's tragedies, published over two hundred and seventy years ago—

"Call for the robin redbreast and the wren,
Since o'er shady groves they hover,
And with leaves and flowers do cover
The friendless bodies of unburied men."

In the old ballad of "The Babes in the Wood," robins, it is true, are alone mentioned, but that may have been because there were no wrens on the spot. To injure either bird is exceedingly unlucky, and even mischievous boys, when they light upon the nest of either, stay their destroying hand.

"You must not take robins' eggs; if you do you will get your legs broken," is the saying in Suffolk. And accordingly their eggs are never seen on the long strings of which boys are so proud.

"How badly you write," a visitor said one day to a boy in a Suffolk school. "Your hand shakes so that you can't hold the pen steady. Have you been running hard, or anything of that sort?"

"No," said the boy; "it always shakes. I once had a robin die in my hand, and they say that if a robin dies in your hand it will always shake."

According to an Essex rhyme—

"The robin with the redbreast,
The robin and the wren;
If ye take out o' their nest
Ye'll never thrive again.

"The robin with the redbreast,
The martin and the swallow,
If ye touch one o' their eggs
Bad luck will sure to follow."

And a Cornish proverb says—

"He that hurts a robin or a wren,
Will never prosper sea or land."

Whilst ill-treatment is sure to be avenged, kindness shown to these birds is as certainly repaid, and many a crumb has been thrown them in a superstitious expectation of favours to come.

In Northamptonshire it is asserted that the respect shown to the robin by man is shared by the animals of the wood. The weasel and wild cat, they say, will neither molest it nor eat it when killed. "One cause," says a collector of folklore in that county, "for the veneration in which it is held may be the superstition which represents the robin as a medium through which mankind are warned of approaching death. Before the death of a person a robin is believed in many instances to tap thrice at the window of the room in which he or she may be."

The red breast of the robin is accounted for by a pretty legendary story. When our Saviour was bearing His cross a robin, touched with compassion, took one of the thorns from His crown, and as it did so the blood dyed its breast, which has been of a ruddy hue ever since.

The wren is known in ancient rhymes as "the king of all birds," and the title to royalty rests on his defeat of the eagle in a trial which would fly highest. The story, as it is told both in Ireland and Germany, runs that the birds once upon a time resolved on electing a king, and the choice was to fall on him who could mount highest in the air. The success of the eagle seemed certain, but the wren made up his mind to try whether cunning was not more than a match for size and strength. He contrived to hop unperceived on the eagle's back just as the competitors started. The eagle never felt the wren's weight, but soared aloft till he had exhausted his rivals and was out of sight to most of the onlookers. At last he began to descend, and as he did so the wren sprang off his back, and with a twitter of triumph easily gained the victory. His performance was noticed by some of the more sharp-sighted fraternity below, who, though they were puzzled to explain how he did it, could not deny the fact that he had achieved the highest flight; whereupon the wren was proclaimed with all due solemnity the king of birds. The name for it in many countries is an acknowledgment of its sovereign position; in France it is "petty king" and "hedge king;" in Germany "hedge king;" in Holland "little king" and "little winter king;" in Italy "little king;" in Sweden "fowl king," "alder king," and "sparrow king."

The ancients held the wren in great reverence; they believed it to be the heavenly messenger that brought fire to the earth, though it disputed this honour with the eagle. According to the "Popular Traditions of Normandy," in performing this kind service its plumage was unfortunately scorched, but the other birds, in consideration of what it had done, made up this loss, each of them presenting it with a feather, except the owl, which has ever since been ashamed to show himself in the daytime.

There are exceptions, however, to the high esteem in which the wren is held. In Ireland, the Isle of Man, and elsewhere, dislike to it was carried to great extremes, and it was the barbarous custom to hunt this royal and innocent little songster. The hunting of the wren took place on Christmas Day, St. Stephen's Day, and New Year's Day. In Ireland the "wren boys," as they were called, decorated themselves with various coloured ribbons, and went round with the slaughtered birds, soliciting money for the service they pretended they had rendered. The Irish aversion to the wren is founded on a tradition, one version of which states that during the Rebellion a party of Royalists, tired out after a day's skirmishing, fell asleep, the sentinel also indulging in a nap. The enemy approached, but a wren tapped three times on a drum that stood near the sentinel, which awoke him and saved a surprise, the result being that the rebels were defeated.

We come now to superstitions of the farmyard, of which a great number are current even in this enlightened nineteenth century. Old beliefs die as hard as old practices, and in country places, not so very remote either, the most foolish and unfounded notions often flourish and are likely to flourish for many a day.

Eggs have given rise to many curious items of folk-lore. The time when they are laid is of importance with the superstitious. Eggs laid on Good Friday used to be believed in the West of Ireland never to go stale. Should eggs be brought over running water there is no use attempting to hatch them, for they contain no chickens. In Northamptonshire, "in what is technically termed 'setting a hen,' care is taken that the nest is composed of an odd number of eggs. If even it is thought the chickens would not prosper. Each egg is always marked with a little black cross, ostensibly for the purpose of distinguishing it from the others, but also supposed to be instrumental in producing good chickens, and preventing any attack from the weasel or other farmyard marauders. The last egg the hen lays is carefully preserved, its possession being supposed to operate as a charm upon the well-doing of the poultry."

It is a bad omen to bring eggs into the house after dark, or to take them out either. "The other day," says a correspondent of the Stamford Mercury, writing on the 29th of October, 1852, "a person in want of some eggs called at a farmhouse in East Markham, and inquired of the good woman of the house whether she had any eggs to sell, to which she replied that she had a few scores to dispose of. 'Then I'll take them home with me in the cart,' was his answer, to which she somewhat indignantly replied—

"'That you'll not; don't you know the sun has gone down? You are welcome to the eggs at a proper hour of the day; but I would not let them go out of the house after the sun is set on any consideration whatever.'"

The first egg laid by a pullet is, in some districts, secured by a young man in order to present it to his sweetheart—the luckiest gift it is believed he can give her. When children were first sent in the arms of the nurse to visit a neighbour, they were often presented with an egg, together with salt and fine bread. The egg, if preserved, was held to have an important influence on the future good fortune of the child.

After eating eggs what should be done with the shells? Do not burn them, say the superstitious, for if you do the hens will cease to lay. Do not leave them whole, say others, but always crush them up. The reason for this, Sir Thomas Browne informs us, is to prevent witchcraft: “lest witches should draw or prick their names therein, and veneficiously mischief their persons, they broke the shell.” In the West of England it is said you should make a hole in the shells before throwing them away, otherwise the witches will use them as boats, and so put to sea and wreck ships. In Holland the shells are broken lest “the witches should sail over in them to England.” “The English don’t know,” remarks a Dutchman, “under what obligation they are to the Dutch for this custom.”

A new-laid egg affords a means of gaining information about coming events. “The person anxious to be enlightened about his future,” says the Rev. T. F. Thiselton Dyer, “perforates with a pin the small end of an egg, and lets three drops of the white fall into a basin of water, which soon diffuse themselves on the surface into a variety of fantastic shapes. From these the fortune-teller will predict the fortunes of the credulous one, the character of his future wife, and a variety of particulars concerning his domestic happiness.”

The custom of distributing eggs at Easter used to be universal among Christians—“pace” or “pasche eggs” they were called. Gebelin in his “Religious History of the Calendar” tells that this practice is to be traced up to the theology and philosophy of the Egyptians, Persians, Gauls, Greeks, and Romans, among all of whom an egg was an emblem of the universe, the work of the supreme divinity.

Christians used the egg at Easter on account of its retaining the elements of future life, as an emblem of the Resurrection. The eggs were stained with different colours, and were thus decorated, says one writer, “as a religious trophy after the days of mortification and abstinence were over, and festivity had taken their place; and as an emblem of the return of life, certified by the Resurrection, from the regions of death and the grave.”

A crowing hen is not considered lucky. There are several proverbs which speak of it as equally objectionable with a whistling woman. “A whistling woman and a crowing hen are the two unluckiest things under the sun” is the saying in Cornwall. In Scotland it is “Whistling maids and crowing hens are no canny about a house.” In France the proverb runs “Une poule qui chante le coq, et une fille qui siffle, portent malheur dans la maison.” It has been suggested, and with some show of reason, that so far as the fair sex are concerned, these sayings are only meant as a suggestion that masculine qualities in woman are not desirable.

When the hens take to amusing themselves by crowing, no house it is said can thrive, and the only way to escape the threatened misfortune is either to kill the birds or sell them. In Mr. James Napier’s book on the folk-lore of the West of Scotland, published in 1879, he says, speaking of a crowing hen, “Only a few years ago I had such a prodigy among a flock of hens which I kept about my works, and one day it was overheard crowing, when one of the workmen came to me, and with a solemn face told the circumstance, and advised me strongly to have it destroyed or put away, as some evil would surely follow, relating instances he had known in Ireland.”

Cock-crowing is a different affair, and has all the credit that belongs to blowing one’s own trumpet in a legitimate manner. It may occasionally be a sinister sound—at dead of night, for example—when it is held to be an omen of death, but as a rule the rooster’s clear utterances have nothing about them to make anybody afraid.

When a cock crows with its head in at the door or even turned towards the door, that is the attitude of a prophetic bird; it is as much as to say, “You may look for a stranger.” When it crows to announce the breaking morn, “fiends, ghosts, and sprites that haunt the nights” creep back to their dens or vanish into thin air. The ghost in Hamlet, it will be remembered, “faded at the crowing of the cock.” This notion that at cock-crowing midnight spirits return to their proper sphere, was long prevalent in country districts, and gave great comfort to labouring people, who without it would have been apt on going early to their work to imagine everything they saw or heard to be a wandering ghost. It is a very old superstition, for we find it mentioned as a tradition of common belief by the Christian poet, Prudentius, who flourished in the beginning of the fourth century.

At Christmas-time the cock is specially useful. He is then supposed to crow all night long, and by his vigilance to scare away all malignant spirits, so that at that sacred season no evil influence can be exerted by them on mankind. This old notion has been beautifully put by Shakespeare in Hamlet—

“Some say, that ever ’gainst that season comes Wherein our Saviour’s birth is celebrated,
The bird of dawning singeth all night long;
And then, they say, no spirit can walk abroad;
The nights are wholesome; then no planets strike,
No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm;
So hallowed and so gracious is the time.”

Bees are the subjects of some strange superstitions. Should a swarm of bees settle on one’s premises, without the owner laying claim to them, it is unlucky. A collector of folklore in Suffolk speaking of his experience about the middle of this century, says, “Going to my father’s house one afternoon, I found the household in a state of excitement, as a stray swarm of bees had settled on the pump. A hive had been procured, and the coachman and I hived them securely. After this was done, I was saying that they might think themselves fortunate in getting a hive of bees so cheap; but I found that this was not agreed to by all, for one man employed about the premises looked very grave and shook his head. On my asking him what was the matter, he told me in a solemn monotone that he did not mean to say there was anything in it, but people did say that if a stray swarm of bees came to a house, and were not claimed by their owner, there would be a death in the family within the year; and it was evident that he believed in the omen. As it turned out, there was a death in my house, though not in my father’s, and I have no doubt but this was taken as a fulfilment of the portent.”

It is said to be a bad sign if a swarm of bees alight on a dead tree, or on the dead branch of a living tree. Another superstition, and a pleasing one, is that if you quarrel about bees they will not thrive. A clergyman in the South of England speaking about this, tells the following anecdote:—

“I was congratulating a parishioner,” he says, “on her bees looking so well, and at the same time expressing my surprise that her next door neighbour’s hives, which had formerly been prosperous, now seemed quite deserted.

“‘Ah,’ she answered, ‘them bees couldn’t du.’”

“‘How was that?’ I asked.

“‘Why,’ she said, ‘there was words about them, and bees ’ll niver du if there’s words about them.’”

“This was a superstition so favourable to peace and goodwill in families, that I could not find it in my heart to say a word against it.”

Stolen bees also will not thrive, but pine away and die.

It is a curious observance in many rural districts of England, that when a death takes place, the event is formally intimated to the bees, they are invited to the funeral, and a piece of crape, by way of mourning, is placed upon their hives. If these marks of confidence and respect are not shown, it is held they will all fly away.

A correspondent of Notes and Queries mentions that a lady friend calling upon some poor people who lived at Hyde Green, near Ingatstone, in Essex, inquired after the bees. The old woman of the house replied:—

“They have all gone away since the death of poor Dick, for we forgot to knock at the hives and tell them he was gone dead.”

Another correspondent of the same periodical mentions being at a neighbour’s house when the conversation turned upon the death of a mutual acquaintance a short time before. A venerable old lady present asked, with great earnestness of manner, whether the bees of the deceased—and he had been a great bee keeper—had been informed of his death. No one appeared to be able to answer the old lady’s question satisfactorily, at which she was much concerned, and said:—

“Well, if the bees are not told of his death, they will leave their hives and never return. Some people give them a piece of the funeral cake; I don’t think that is absolutely necessary, but certainly it is better to tell them of the death.”

The same superstition is met with in some parts of France when the mistress of the house dies; the formula being much the same as our English one—to tap thrice on the hive, repeating these words, “Petites abeilles, votre maîtresse est morte.” In Lithuania, when the master or mistress of the house dies it is thought necessary to give notice of the fact to the bees, horses, and cows, by rattling a bunch of keys, and it is believed that if this were omitted the animals would die.

The sale of bees is looked upon as a very unlucky proceeding, and they are generally transferred to another owner by barter. If you want a hive you may easily obtain it in exchange for a small pig, a bushel of corn, or some other equivalent. “There may seem little difference in the eyes of enlightened persons,” says one writer, “between selling and bartering, but the superstitious beekeeper sees a grand distinction, and it is not his fault if you don’t see it too.”

The folklore of spiders is a large subject, but we must content ourselves with mentioning only a few of the more interesting features connected with it. In some houses, though its web is brushed down without ceremony, the spider itself is treated with friendliness and allowed to go on its way uninjured. This arises from a belief that ill-luck will quickly overtake those who either kill or hurt it. As the proverb says—

“If you wish to live and thrive
Let the spider run alive.”

“The regard which is paid by many to the life of the spider,” says the Rev. T. F. Thiselton Dyer, “is in all probability due to the influence of an old legend, which tells how, when Christ lay in the manger at Bethlehem, the spider came and spun a web over the spot where He was, thus preserving His life by screening Him from all the dangers that surrounded Him."

It used to be held in many districts of Scotland that should a servant wilfully kill a spider, she would be sure to break a piece of crockery or glass in the course of the day.

Spiders have long played an important part in charms for the cure of disease. In Norfolk, a cure for whooping cough is to take a spider and hold it over the head of the child, repeating three times, "Spider, as you waste away, whooping cough no longer stay."

The spider is then hung up in a bag, and as it gradually dries up the cough disappears. A rural remedy for fever used to be to shut up a spider in a nutshell and hang it round the neck.

A clergyman in Somerset mentions that one of his parishioners suffering from ague was advised to catch a large spider and shut him up in a box, for as he pined away the disease would wear itself out. "A few years since," says a correspondent of Notes and Queries, "a lady in the South of Ireland was celebrated far and near for her cure of ague. Her universal remedy was a large house-spider alive, and enveloped in treacle or preserve. Of course the parties were carefully kept in ignorance of what the wonderful remedy was."

There is a superstitious notion that spiders bring prosperity. This is chiefly said of a little spider known as the "money-spinner," which is held to have an important influence on one's bank account. To obtain full advantage of its power over riches it must be thrown over the left shoulder. From this superstition the quaint Thomas Fuller draws the following very wholesome moral; it will form a weighty conclusion to this article.

"When a spider is found upon our clothes, we used to say some money is coming towards us. The moral is this: such who imitate the industry of that contemptible creature may, by God's blessing, weave themselves into wealth and procure a plentiful estate."

ON AN ERRAND.

A little fellow was sent a message by his mother to a lady. When he had delivered it he did not seem in a hurry to go; and the lady noticing this, asked him if there was anything else his mother had bidden him say. She was not prepared for his reply—

"She said I wasna' to seek anything for coming, but if ye gave me anything I was to tak' it."

THE MASTER.

The herd of scribes, by what they tell us,
Show all in which their wits excel us;
But the true master we behold
In what his art leaves—just untold.

FASHIONS IN HAIR.

False hair was much used in the Middle Ages. The share allotted to each by nature was not considered sufficient, even for the comparatively simple head-dress of plaits coiled over the ears and laid against the cheeks. And they dyed their hair, too, those mediæval ladies, sometimes black, but most often yellow. They adored yellow hair. The heroes of their romances were nearly all provided with crisp curls of gold, while the heads of villains and traitors were usually of a fiery red. They somehow connected red hair with wickedness, and such unfortunate creatures as were afflicted with locks of that hue, took great pains to hide their deformity.—Miss Alma Tadema.

HOW TO GET ON.—If we see rightly and mean rightly, we shall get on.—Ruskin.

SELF-SACRIFICE.—Some good people seem to think that because self-sacrifice is a noble thing everything in which self is sacrificed must be good and right; but our views of sacrifice, like all others, are often dim and confused. Sometimes self is sacrificed most when it appears to be giving up least, and vice versa.—Hare.

TOP-DRESSING.—"It is all very fine," said a recently married man, who was reading an essay on the "Culture of Women," just as a heavy milliner's bill was presented to him, "it is all very fine this cultivation of women, but such an item as this for bonnets is rather a heavy charge for top-dressing, in my judgment."

THE EDITOR'S WIFE.—There was a clever editor, who had a little wife, who scissored all his X's as became an editor's wife. And when his fertile pen gave out, she used with might and main to ply the shears with vigour, till his head was clear again. And nobody knew, save the editor's gal, that his articles were not orig-i-nal.

USEFUL LETTERS.—"Letters," says an old writer, "are the very nerves and arteries of friendship—nay, they are the vital spirits and elixir of love, which in case of distance and long absence would be in hazard to languish and moulder away without them."

FRIEND AND FOE.

Dear is my friend—yet from my foe as from my friend comes good.
My friend shows what I can do, and my foe shows what I should.

VIRTUE AND VICE.—We derive from nature no fault that may not become a virtue, and no virtue that may not degenerate into a fault. Faults of the latter kind are the most difficult to cure.—Goethe.

A SURE RECORD.—There is no way for us to discern our names written in the Book of Life but by reading the work of sanctification in our own hearts. Lord, let me but find my heart obeying Thy calls, my will obediently submitting to Thy commands; sin my burden, and Christ my desire—I never crave a fairer or surer evidence of Thy electing love to my soul.—Flavel.

THE LOVE OF LIFE.

An old man coming home from the woods somewhat overloaded, threw down his burden, and, in the anguish of fatigue, called for Death. Death appearing, asked what were his commands.

"Only," said the old man, "to—help me up with this wood."

DO AS YOU WOULD BE DONE BY.

The great Duke of Wellington scorned to take a "bargain" wrung out of another's necessities. A suggestion was once made to him to purchase a farm in the neighbourhood of Strathfieldsaye, which lay contiguous to his estate, and was therefore a valuable acquisition, to which he assented. When the purchase was completed his steward congratulated him upon having had such a bargain, as the seller was in difficulties and forced to part with his farm.

"What do you mean by a bargain?" said the Duke.

"It was valued at £1,100," answered the steward, "and we have got it for £800."

"In that case," remarked the Duke, "you will please to carry the extra £300 to the late owner, and never talk to me of cheap land again."

IN TRAINING FOR WIVES.—It seems at times odd enough that, while young ladies are so sedulously taught all the accomplishments that a husband disregards, they are never taught the great one he would prize; they are taught to be exhibitors; he wants a companion. He wants neither a singing animal nor a drawing animal, nor a dancing animal; he wants a talking animal. But to talk they are never taught; all they know of it is slander, and that "comes by nature."—Godolphin.

THE WEALTH OF NATURE.—If a man could make a single rose we should give him an empire; yet roses and flowers no less beautiful are scattered in profusion over the world, and no one regards them.—Luther.

FOR LOVE ALONE.

CHAPTER II.
HAVING EVERYTHING.

IN a very short time Miriam had, outwardly at least, settled down among the Leighs as one of the family. She by her own wish was governess to the two youngest girls. Hitherto Margaret had taught them, but as Mrs. Leigh was quite an invalid, she was glad to be free to wait on her mother and look after household matters. The schoolroom was a pleasant room, its broad, low window looking on to the garden. Such a garden! with big shady trees, and old-fashioned flowers—flowers that you looked for as old friends, flowers that came up in the same old places, with the same old faces, year after year; tall, grand, white lilies, and great bushes of sweet pale pink roses; and then the pansies—

"The beautiful Puritan pansies!"
Oh! how many there were!

As yet the garden only gave promise of what its beauties would be as the season advanced. Spring was now giving place to summer, and the roses were budding.

"Don't you love Sunday, Miriam?" asked Netta, the youngest of Miriam's pupils.

She was leaning on the window sill of the schoolroom, listening to the bells ringing out from the old grey church tower, away across the garden, and a field, golden with buttercups.

"I like it very well," answered Miriam. "I like it for the same reason that most people would give, I expect, if they spoke the truth, because I have less to do."

"But Hope Maxwell and Margaret have so much to do on Sunday, and yet they love it. Hope goes twice to the Sunday-school, and then she reads to poor old blind Ford, and very often has some of her boys to practise the hymns, and then she always finds time for a walk with her father, and—"

"We are not all Hope Maxwells, Netta, my dear, and consequently we are not all perfection," interrupted Miriam. "And now if you don't mean to be late for church you had better start this minute; the others have gone, and I am going now."

Hope Maxwell was the girl that Miriam had seen in the train on the day of her journey to Littleborough, and so much admired. She was a friend of the Leighs, and they all loved her. Miriam heard so much said in her praise that, in a spirit of opposition, she declined to see any good in her.

Hope Maxwell was at church that morning, quietly though handsomely dressed, with her tall, handsome father by her side. He almost worshipped his only child, and thought that the world did not contain her equal. Miriam tried to pay attention to the sermon, but—

"Her thoughts were with her heart,

And that was far away."

And yet it was a sermon well calculated to recall wandering thoughts.

Many wondered why the Rev. John Rivers cared to waste his wonderful eloquence on a congregation for the most part composed of small farmers, with slow, heavy minds, and who looked on church-going as the proper thing for Sunday, when you couldn't do anything else.

Someone had once said something of the kind to him, and he had answered, with his worn face all aglow—

"Waste my eloquence! Is it possible to waste one talent when it is used in God's service? Are not the souls of these farmers as precious in His sight as the souls of more richly-gifted men? In whatever corner of the vineyard my Master sees fit to place me,

He expects me there to do my very best to win souls to Him. Never talk to me of wasting what is given to God."

This bright, sunny Sunday morning his text was taken from Ezekiel xxxiii. 2: "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live. Turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways, for why will ye die?"

Miriam looked at Hope Maxwell, and thought of the time when her father was with her. Oh, how happy she had been in those days! How easy it was then to be loving and lovable. No wonder they all thought Hope so good, she had everything to make her happy, and she had never known trouble.

"He doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men."

These words recalled her mind to the sermon; they seemed to be spoken in answer to her thoughts. She had, almost unconsciously perhaps, been thinking that God had dealt hardly with her, and that He was too high and holy to feel for her in her trouble. Now, as she listened to the message sent to her through the preacher, her aching heart was soothed and comforted. But even yet she did not freely open her heart to receive the peace that might have been hers. Perhaps no one was more fully able "to comfort them which were in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith he himself had been comforted of God," than the preacher. He had been through great and bitter sorrow, and had known what it was to be comforted by "the God of all comfort."

Miriam still in her heart resented the happiness of others, and by so doing she prevented peace flowing as a river into her soul. She walked home in silence, leaving the children to talk to each other.

When they were all assembled at dinner, in the pleasant sunny dining-room, someone remarked how pretty Hope Maxwell had looked that morning.

"Yes, I think she grows more beautiful every time I see her."

The speaker was Herbert Leigh, Dr. Leigh's eldest son; he was studying for the medical profession, and had only come down to Littleborough the night before to stay a few days.

This was the first time Miriam had seen him. He was tall and broad, had thick dark hair and keen grey eyes.

"And she is as good as she is pretty," said Margaret, carrying on the conversation about Hope Maxwell. "Her mind is as lovely as her face."

"It is very easy to be good when one has everything on earth one wants," said Miriam, unable to keep silence. "I wonder if she would be as lovely and good without her present surroundings! People are generally a good deal influenced by their circumstances. This world's riches go a good way towards making one sweet-tempered."

Herbert's grey eyes regarded her attentively during this outburst, and he said, very slowly and quietly—

"Don't be bitter, Miriam; it is so very easy to say bitter things, and with some people it passes for cleverness. Charles Dickens once gave the same advice to a man who wrote in that sort of way. He said it was so much harder to say kind things; it was a pity to be bitter, it was so easy. You may think it sounds clever to be cynical, but it is a very shallow and surface sort of cleverness."

"I was only speaking the truth," said Miriam, defiantly.

"No, I beg your pardon. You were speaking what you think to be the truth; but I am ready to answer for it that, stripped of all earthly comforts, Hope Maxwell would still keep that which is to her far above all worldly things—her trust in God."

Herbert's words were received in silence. His eldest sister alone knew the effort it cost him to speak. She had long ago read the secret of his deep yet hopeless love for Hope Maxwell. There was very tender and true sympathy between him and Margaret; but on this subject he had never spoken even to her. The hope of some day winning Hope Maxwell for his wife had been a spur to him in all his work, and it was a bitter blow when, on her return from a visit of some months' duration to London, he heard of her engagement to a young officer. Hope herself had never dreamt of his having more than a warm brotherly regard for her. She had grown up with the Leighs, and, after her own relations, they were the first to be told of her engagement. Believing that his secret was hidden from all eyes, Herbert bore his trouble manfully in silence. Margaret gave all the silent sympathy she dared, but, divining his wishes, she never spoke, and he knew and was grateful.

After that Sunday Miriam kept her opinion of Hope Maxwell to herself. She was a little afraid of airing her cynical notions before Herbert. His keen grey eyes seemed to read her right through, and she knew that he detected a false ring about such speeches, and guessed that it was the troubled sea of her restless heart that caused it to cast up mire and dirt.

Margaret said one day to her mother, with a sigh—

"I wish Miriam was a more genial nature; I had so looked forward to her coming, I hoped she would have been like a sister to me, but she is so cold."

"She has had a great deal of trouble, poor girl," answered gentle Mrs. Leigh; "we must be very patient with her."

"I daresay she won't like this invitation to the Maxwells' tennis party, because she is asked with me; she is sure to think she ought to have had a card to herself."

Mrs. Leigh smiled.

"I should think she could not mind having her name put with yours, dear. But take the card to her."

Miriam was in the schoolroom giving Netta and Milly their lessons. Margaret put the invitation card down before her, and said, playfully—

"Now you must go; I will not take any excuse. The last time they asked us you contrived to get out of it, this time you really must go."

"You are very kind," said Miriam, coldly, "and the Maxwells are very good to ask me; but some people have to be asked sometimes when they are not wanted."

Her words were confused and her lip trembled.

"Nonsense, Miriam!" said Margaret, rather sharply. "You know perfectly well that the Maxwells do want you to go; it is unkind to speak in that way."

"Very well, I will go if you wish it," answered Miriam.

Margaret took up the card and went away to answer the invitation in the affirmative for herself and her cousin.

How little she knew all that was to come of that tennis party.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

TWENTY-ONE.—Lady pupils are boarded, lodged, and trained, for one guinea a week, for not less than six months, at the Children's Hospital, Great Ormond Street, W.C. Nurses (aged from seventeen to thirty-five) are taken at seven shillings and sixpence a week. For further information as to terms and rules, apply to the lady superintendent. Should you prefer the Evelina Hospital for Children, Southwark Bridge Road, apply to the lady superintendent there. Ladies are trained from the age of twenty-one to thirty-five at the former hospital, and probably so at the latter. You ought to have had all the usual children's complaints yourself, and should be strong and healthy.

L. SINCLAIR.—The Royal Holloway College, at Mount Lee, Egham, Surrey, admits young women upwards of seventeen years of age. The terms for tuition, board, and lodging amount to £90 per annum. The principal is Miss Bishop, and the secretary is J. L. Clifford Smith, Esq.

MOTHER.—For your feeble-minded and weakly boy you might obtain careful treatment and home comforts at Miss Arkell's institution, Lynchmere, Maberley Road, Upper Norwood, S.E. You had better see the place, and then obtain the necessary references. He might get on better away from home and under special training.

ELAINE and CAWDOR.—Women are admitted by the new Supplemental Charter of 1878 to all degrees, without exception, in arts, law, medicine, science, and music. The age must be "sixteen years complete" on admission to the matriculation exams. held in January and June. The matriculation fee is £2, and the exams. for it are held at many provincial centres, as well as in London, and the degree exams. at a few of them. Address Registrar, University of London, Burlington Gardens, W.

DUNSTABLE.—At the North Eastern Hospital for Children, 8, Goldsmith Row, Hackney Road, E., you would be eligible, from the age of eighteen, for training as a nurse. The engagement is for three years, at a salary of £12 per annum, with board and lodging, laundress, and partial uniform. The salary rises after the period named; and of course the nurse might change into an adult hospital when sufficiently old for admission, and so perhaps obtain a higher rate of salary. Apply to the lady superintendent.

MISS B. WINDER.—We are happy to meet your wishes, so far as we can, by no longer recommending your Educational Girls' Societies to our correspondents, as you have "given them up entirely."

ONE WHO IS WAITING and BLANCHE should avail themselves of one or more of the numerous Private Educational Correspondence Societies, which are, many of them, described and the addresses given in the little Dictionary of Girls' Clubs, often before mentioned (Griffith and Farran). Perhaps the Sulhamstead Girls' Question Club (Miss Thoyts, secretary, Sulhamstead, Reading, Berkshire) might suit you. Otherwise write to Miss Ellman, the Rectory, Berwick, Sussex, and consult her, telling her in what branches you need assistance. 2. Picture rods off which the lacquer has worn can be restored at moderate expense; or you could paint them yourself to suit the colour of the walls.

COOKERY.

BRENDA and A DEVOTED READER will find Phillis Browne's "A Year's Cookery" (Cassell and Co.) a good and inexpensive cookery book; also the "Girl's Own Cookery Book," price rs. 56, Paternoster Row, E.C. In both will be found recipes for soups without meat and vegetables. Nichols and Co., 23, Oxford Street, W., publish two or three penny vegetarian cookery books, we believe.

MARIANNE.—Freshly-fallen snow makes pancakes as light as the use of fresh laid eggs would do. Make your batter as usual, only omitting the eggs; and when ready to commence frying the pancakes, take up lightly as many heaped tablespoonfuls of snow as you would have taken of eggs, and stir quickly into the batter, and you will find our statement correct, the snow making them as light as the eggs would have done. You will have plenty of opportunity for trying this recipe in your cold home in Manitoba. We were glad to hear from you.

A SAILOR'S DAUGHTER.—To ice cakes the icing must be very well beaten, till it is thick enough to lie on the cake without running. Put a large tablespoonful of it on the centre of the cake, or more if the cake be large, dip a table knife in boiling water, and spread the icing with it over the whole of the top of the cake, perfectly smoothly. Dip the knife repeatedly in boiling water during the process, and drain before using it. Ice the sides in the same manner.

EDITH M.—We recommend you to procure the Girl's Own Cookery Book, published at our office (rs.). For sponge cakes, see pages 352, 399, and 494, vol. i., "G.O.P." We cannot repeat ourselves, as it is very uninteresting to our other readers.

HOUSEKEEPING.

ROSALIND D'ALMEIDA does not say of what the stain on her table is. Lemon juice will clean alabaster; apply with a soft rag. Also a little spirits of salts, applied with a cloth, will take out spots of ink from wood.

PUDLEY.—Terra-cotta may be cleaned with turpentine, and then with soap; and plaster casts can be cleaned by making a very thick paste of starch, and spreading it all over the cast with a soft paint brush. Let it dry, and remove it when it scales off the cast easily in hard flakes. 2. Your window-plants want more light, more air, and a regular supply of water. The room is perhaps too warm.

YOUNG BOHEA.—So long as the milk is not put in the tea, and it is only "cold tea," it will keep good for any time, if bottled and corked closely, we should think.

PEARL, BIRDIE, and MOLLY-CODDLE.—"Pearl," who is a doctor's daughter, says that she has found palm oil, a deep yellow ointment to be got at any chemist's, excellent for chapped hands. If the anointing be persisted in every night, summer and winter, it will cure the worst chaps, and make the hands soft and white. If the chaps should be very bad, first wash in hot water, then apply a little of the oil, rubbing it on; and put on a pair of gloves of at least three sizes too large, tying them on at the wrist. The oil stains linen, and is hard to get out. We thank our kind "Pearl," for many of our girls suffer much from chapped hands.

MUSIC.

MAID OF CWM.—The article entitled "How to Play the Violin" appeared in vol. i., page 232. We cannot recommend the learning of any instrument without a few preparatory lessons, because bad habits are acquired, which must be corrected afterwards, and even the method of holding or laying the hands on it may be improperly done. You should not say, "has I see." It would seem from such a mistake that you should be devoting your attention to learning correct English, and how to spell, rather than spending your time on a mandolin, guitar, or violin.

C. SKINNER.—Refer to the article on violin-playing, of which we have spoken in our answer to "Maid of Cwm."

STUDENT OF MUSIC.—The viola is an instrument well suited to women, and repays the trouble of learning it. In France it is called the alto; with us it is sometimes called the tenor. It has lately regained its position in orchestral music, such as assigned to it by Beethoven, Haydn, and Mozart, in the eighteenth, and Mendelssohn in the present century. The latter composer, as well as Mozart, were performers upon it. It is a less difficult instrument to learn than its cousin the violin, but a master should be engaged for at least a few lessons.

MISCELLANEOUS.

PERPLEXED.—"A deed of settlement with trustees" is quite practicable, and your money could thus be settled on you and your children; but it must be drawn up by a competent lawyer.

I. W. S., GERTRUDE MOXHAY.—In America a thick coat of violet powder is commonly applied to protect the skin from sun blisters, a little vaseline being rubbed first to the face. The sun there is very hot.

"BATTEL ROLL."—The only way of getting the spelling of the name of your ancestor changed in the book you name would be by writing to the publishers, to inquire whether they could manage it for you in the next edition. We never heard of any "name being given to those families still existing who can trace an unbroken pedigree to 1066 A.D.," and whose names are written on the "Batteil Roll." Of course, if any such existed they would be Normans, as the names were those inscribed on the Roll at St. Valery, before the expedition started. When called over, the day after the Battle of Hastings, the number amounted to 629. The "Roll of Battel" is not often quoted, we believe, as an authority, because the monks of the abbey are considered to have mutilated the document and added names to it. The "Rolls of Arms," however, in England, date from 1250, and they are found perfectly reliable as to names, titles, and armorial bearings; they are in the Herald's College.

GRANNY.—Certainly you may share your hymn-book with anyone next you on a chance occasion; but it would be better for expediency sake to keep an extra one for so good a purpose.

MARIE BELL.—We have not tried nor seen the effect of dried galls applied to chilblains. We have given many good and safe remedies, which see by reference to our indexes. Always add the prefix to your name on a visiting card; it is bad "form" (to use a new term now well understood) to omit it.

A SUFFERER AT SEVENTEEN.—A pint of very hot water taken directly you rise seems an excellent remedy for digestive troubles, and you might try it without fear of injury.

A WAITING ONE should apply for information up to present date at the Dominion of Canada offices, Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W. She will obtain at the offices several little guides as to "Farming in Canada," "A Year in Manitoba" (by W. and R. Chambers). Also our own little manual by the Marquis of Lorne, "Canadian Life and Scenery" (56, Paternoster Row, E.C.) Manitoba is considered a healthful locality, notwithstanding the extremes of heat and cold. We could not possibly say whether your daughters would obtain any situations supposing that the farm proved a failure; if you mean as governesses, we think not. Middle-aged women as housekeepers, cooks, and nurses are more likely to find situations than young inexperienced girls.

MADCAP VIOLET must, we think, make up her mind to stay at home, and turn a bright face upon her difficulties there, as she is too young for any "nursing" yet. Perhaps she is impatient and tiresome herself. "ONE LITTLE MAID FROM SCHOOL" should have her name put on her father's card, or on a card with her sister's below it, thus: "Miss Smith—Miss Mary Smith." 2. Dumb-bells of 1 lb. to 2 lb. each would be quite heavy enough.

JEANETTE.—There are very few women who have adopted dispensing as a calling, but a larger supply would create a larger demand, and we are told that doctors in the country would gladly welcome a woman dispenser when their wives are obliged, from some cause or other, to desist from helping in this way, as some few can. In instances where women have gone into the business they have done well, and as you seem to have excellent opportunities for training under your father, we should advise you by all means to qualify yourself fully.

GATTIE.—The Religious Tract Society, 56, Paternoster Row, E.C., publish a tiny volume called "Till the Doctor Comes," which would be useful to you.

SKYE.—We could not help with suggestions for a prize competition. It would not be right.

VERA sends us a poem beginning
"The sun had set in the golden West,
Down in the West went he;
Leaving behind him a golden flush,
And a darkness some long to see."

It is not equal to good prose, dear Vera, but we have no doubt it amused you to think you were writing poetry.

WHITE CLEMATIS.—We cannot give the private names and addresses of our contributors.

IONA.—By the alteration of the calendar in 1582, by Gregory XIII., the first Sunday after the full moon immediately following the 21st March was fixed on as the day for observing Easter. Ascension Day in 1877 was on the 10th of May.

MARIGOLD's father and mother are her safest guides at her present age, and ought to be consulted.

MISTEEN.—We regret that we cannot inform you.

AUDACES JUVAT.—There is an opening, apparently, for domestic servants in all the colonies, but none for educated women, unless they choose to become "lady-helps," and do the work under that name. We could not advise you on the subject.

PHYLLIS had better see the doctor again and discover whether her general health may affect her eyes, or whether he would advise her consulting a skilled oculist for her impaired sight. Perhaps her spectacles are not of the right sort.

QUEEN MAB wishes to rule rather than to be ruled; this we can easily gather from her letter, and even her assumed name betrays it. We fancy that she needs a firm hand over her. She inquires, "What means can be taken to get rid of a very strict governess?" This is a suggestive inquiry! If "Mab" have any cruelty or injustice to complain of, let her inform her mother of it, or her father if she have no mother. It is only from her parents that she can obtain relief. For all advice on the subject of the complexion, refer to the articles by "Medicus."

PEG.—A bride is under no obligation to provide any requisites for her new home. The bridegroom is expected to provide a furnished home for his wife, and to have all in readiness for her reception, as well as a fair provision for her support, agreed upon by her parents with him, before he undertakes the serious responsibility of taking her from her parents and her own natural home. In France, amongst the bourgeois and lower orders in general, the intending wife provides the house linen and her own, and the man all the furniture and other requisites of the house.

C. I. W.—We regret to say that we scarcely ever receive a poem, however brief an effort, from our girls that could be taken into a prize competition. They are almost invariably defective, as regards the common rules of versification, and altogether without beauty or originality. It is with regret that we must report unfavourably of yours.

B. L. M.—We are happy to name the English Literature Society, of which the Rev. F. Jarrett, Tooley Rectory, near Barnstaple, is the secretary. We are glad to hear of the use and pleasure our paper has been to you and your friends.

THE SNOWDROP.

HAIL ! timid messenger of Spring,
Thou dost glad tidings with thee bring,
Of lovely things for us in store,
Of wintry storm and tempest o'er.

Fair herald of thy beauteous race,
Venturing to smile in Winter's face;
How tremulous with hope and fear,
How spirit-like thou dost appear !

And yet on thy pale purity
What saddening thoughts are traced for me !
Oh ! bitter tears that I have shed,
Since last I saw thee bend thy head.

Still doth thy voice seem from a clime
Ne'er trodden by the steps of time ;
Art thou the spirit of that Spring
Of which immortal Hope doth sing ?

NOAH'S ARK.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

By DARLEY DALL, Author of "The Shepherd's Fairy," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

MRS. OLDMAN'S CONFESSION.

FOR three weeks Eve was very ill, and saw no one but the doctor, her mother, and the nurse; and a great part of the time she was delirious, and knew no one; then she took a turn, the fever left her, and she began to recover with marvellous celerity. During the three weeks Noah went over every evening to ask for her, and when she was asleep crept in his socks upstairs into her room to gaze with tear-dimmed eyes on the beautiful face, with the hectic flush of fever on the delicate cheeks, and cool bandages round the pretty head, whose lovely hair the doctor was once or twice disposed to sacrifice, but Mrs. Oldman would not consent.

Eve's first words when the fever left her were to ask for her father, but the doctor would not suffer her to see him until she was stronger, and when he did give a reluctant consent, he warned both father and child that there must be no scene and no discussion of the past or the future.

As a matter of fact, there was no discussion at all. When Noah came in, Eve, who was lying on a sofa by the lattice window, held out her wasted arms and said—

"Father, forgive me." And Noah took her to his breast and said not a word, and then the two sat in silent ecstasy, until all too soon Mrs. Oldman came in to say the time was up and Noah must go.

After this Noah came every evening, but by common consent they neither of them alluded to what had happened, or to Arthur Clifford, but talked of what Noah had done, what fish he had caught, what birds he had shot, the choir practices at which he was a regular attendant, of Grace Leicester and her kindness in coming as frequently as she had done to inquire for Eve—of everything, in fact, except of the subject which lay uppermost in both their hearts, and on this point they were silent.

Meanwhile, Arthur was getting very impatient to see Eve, but the doctor postponed the meeting from day to day, on the ground that any undue excitement might bring on a relapse; but it was plain he would not be put off any longer, so about a month after the accident Arthur was told Eve was well enough to be moved, and that he might see her that day.

"I can't make her out," said Mrs. Oldman, who had become Arthur's strongest ally, and had certainly kept her promise to do all she could both to prevail on Noah to consent to the match and to keep Eve aware of her lover's constancy. "I can't make the child out; she fared to listen to all I say about you, and she lies and looks at your yacht by the hour together, but never a word have she spoke about you ever since she has been ill; except when she was wandering, your name has never crossed her lips. She'll talk of her father fast enough, and of poor Jack Farrar and of Adam Day; she has asked to see him once or twice, but she never so much as mentions you, Mr. Arthur. There is some women as take a deal of manœuvring, and there is some as likes to be taken by storm; my belief is, Eve is one of these last, so if I was you I should go up to-day and say to her, 'Eve, the doctor says you can be moved, there is my yacht just at the bottom of the garden, and there is my friend at Yarmouth waiting to marry us, so we'll start to-morrow morning.' You see, sir, after all that has passed, the sooner you marry her and take her away from this place the better; it'll never do for her to go back to the ark first."

Arthur was fully of Mrs. Oldman's opinion, and only too anxious to carry out her suggestions; but when he saw Eve he found, to his amazement, a new obstacle to their marriage had sprung up. Eve positively refused to marry him without her father's and Mr. Leicester's consent. She had had plenty of time to reflect during her illness, and although her love for Arthur was as strong as ever, she dare not, as she expressed it, fly in the face of Providence, and persist in disobeying her father after the solemn warning she had received.

"And what's the child going to do, then?" said Mrs. Oldman, feeling, as she described it, fit to drop at this news.

"Going to ask her father about it this evening, and I know what Noah will do, Mrs. Oldman—he'll persuade her to give me up, and go home with him to the ark to-morrow, and she'll do it, too," said Arthur, despondently.

"She won't, Mr. Arthur; I'll stop that as sure as my name is Mary Oldman. Oh, dear! oh, dear! what a heap of trouble it would save if she'd only consent to go quietly off to-morrow morning and be married! But there, she was always such a child for her father! How you ever got her to go off the first time passes my understanding. Deary me! what a world it is! And, mercy me, what a wicked woman I have been! But there, it is no use talking; I have talked for these twenty years without mending matters. It'll have to be done, cost what it will, that is plain enough."

"It may be to you, but it is Greek to me. What will have to be done?" said Arthur.

"You and Eve married. But leave it to me; we shall hear what Noah says to-night, and then if he won't give his consent, I'll see what I can do."

Noah came in the evening, and, as Mrs. Oldman had foreseen, utterly refused to consent to the marriage, telling Eve Mr. Leicester was as much opposed to it as he was, and ending in persuading Eve to go back with him to the ark the next day, promising to get Miss Grace to drive her home.

"And what time be Miss Grace coming, pray?" said Mrs. Oldman, when Noah informed her of his plan.

"About six o'clock, in the cool of the evening; Eve must not be out in the sun," said Noah, who was beaming with happiness at the prospect of Eve's speedy return.

"Humph! Well, maybe you'll see me over before that; so if you are going out fishing, just leave the key under the old stone; there is a deal to do in the ark before Eve comes home."

The next morning Mrs. Oldman was up early, and having given Eve her breakfast, told her she was going on business, and would not be back for several hours. The idea of her mother, who rarely went out except to church or to the village shop, going out on business struck Eve as odd, and the mysterious and important air she assumed was still more peculiar; but Mrs. Oldman was evidently not disposed to throw any light on her proceedings, and started on her expedition, leaving Eve smiling in spite of her sadness, and she was feeling very sad; but the thought that she was doing right was strengthening her in her resolution to follow Noah's advice.

Eve was in that state of convalescence when each new conscious access of strength is a joy, and so the thought of leaving the room in which she had been confined so long, and going home, was in itself a joy, and to obey her father's wishes in the first flush of their reconciliation was a sweet if a sad pleasure; for it could not overbalance the pain she felt in leaving Arthur, though she felt sure he would be constant to her and remain in the neighbourhood. The truth was, Eve was not strong enough to face the future; she could not think much in her weak state, and she did not realise that to say she would not marry Arthur without her father's consent meant to give him up; on the contrary, she had a vague idea that things would go on very much as they had done before. Arthur would, she supposed, remain at the Rectory, and they would meet as they had done before, except she should always tell Noah where she was going. Those old days had been very happy ones, and though they seemed so long ago, they were not really far off; they would return, and things would go on very much as before.

So thought Eve, but she was too young to know that the past never returns. Things can never be as they were before.

Arthur Clifford, on hearing that Mrs. Oldman was going to Windham, had offered the previous evening to take her across the broad in his yacht, but she had a righteous horror of every sort and kind of boat, and had declared she would rather walk ten miles any day than go five by boat; but when she was about to start on her long trudge, she found Arthur at the door in a dog-cart which he had hired, and he now insisted on driving her to Windham.

* East Anglian for seems.

"It'll be all right, sir, never you fear, when once I have spoken to parson; he'll agree to the marriage fast enough, you'll see; but I want to go home first, if you have no objection."

"None whatever; in fact, I could hardly drive you to the Rectory, for Mr. Leicester and I are cuts just at present; but if only I could persuade Eve to marry me, he and my people too would all come round, I am sure. Let me take her abroad for a year, and she'll hold her own with the stateliest dowager in the county."

"So she will, and so she ought, for she is equal to the best of them, though I say it as ought not, and my old man would never forgive me if he heard me," said Mrs. Oldman; and so blind is love, that Arthur saw nothing remarkable in this speech.

Then after a hot and dusty drive through the quiet roads and sleepy villages, whose stillness is one of the most characteristic features of the broads, they reached Windham. Arthur put his horse up at the inn, while Mrs. Oldman made her way to the ark.

Noah was out, but he had hidden the key in the appointed place, and letting herself in, Mrs. Oldman proceeded to make an elaborate toilet, such as in her eyes befitted so auspicious an occasion as a visit to the Rectory and a private interview with the Rector. Then having fortified herself for the interview with some cold tea and bacon, she at length started for the Rectory. She was dressed in a coloured chintz dress, which had been laid up in lavender for fourteen or fifteen years, a white shawl with a coloured border, in which she had been married, her best bonnet, and a pair of silk gloves which Eve had given her years ago, but no occasion festive enough to justify their use had ever occurred; she carried a clean pocket-handkerchief, neatly folded in her gloved hands; and a fashionable young lady would have been right in maintaining she must have come out of the ark! She did come out of the ark, literally, at any rate.

She was very hot when she reached the Rectory; hot from her walk, and hot, too, at the thought of the coming interview, which, had she known French, she would have described as un mauvais quart d'heure.

"Is Mr. Leicester in the way? Oh, then will you please to ask him if I can speak to him alone for a few minutes," said Mrs. Oldman, as she reached the back door after a long mental conflict, in which she had debated with herself whether the importance of her visit would not justify her in going to the front door, but with a fine discrimination she decided the importance of her visit did not affect the lowliness of the visitor's estate, so to the back door she went.

The folded handkerchief did a deal of duty, without being unfolded, as Mrs. Oldman followed the servant through some passages to Mr. Leicester's study, which she entered with knees that shook under her as she made her curtsy. Mr. Leicester, who was writing at his table, rose, and put a chair for her opposite himself, and seeing from her dress and manner the occasion was not an ordinary one, he inquired after Eve, to give his visitor confidence to state her business.

He was a reserved man, and though greatly beloved by his humbler parishioners, his manner was cold and distant, though, as they knew, a warm and sympathetic heart beat under that cold exterior.

"Eve is better, sir, thank you, much better. The doctor wishes her to be moved away from Bridgham at once."

"So I understand; and my daughter has promised Noah to drive her home this evening."

MITTENWALD AND ITS VIOLINS.

By EMMA BREWER.

CHAPTER IV.

"Speechless alive, I heard the feathered throng;
Now, being dead, I emulate their song."
From the Italian.

WE have seen how the violin industry was established in Mittenwald, and have been witnesses to the manner in which the wood is selected. We will now follow this up by going through Herr Neuner's violin factory, and into the homes of private makers, which will enable us to see how the wood is used and how the work is set about.

The Mittenwaldians have good models from which to work—viz., those of Stainer, Amati, and other Italian masters—which were brought to the little town by Klotz, their teacher, when he returned from his sojourn in Italy, and the people have wisely adhered to them. This may be the secret of their success, for it is far better to have a good pattern to work from than to seek for information in books, and it is certain that in violin-making the best books to consult are the models of the great masters, on whose tables of wood their laws and principles are engraved.

The laws are the same whether they have to do with the smallest of violins or the largest double-bass, the identity of the rules being determined by those of the proportions.

The structure of the violin is the result of long experience, skill, and thought, and in so perfect a manner has it been handed down to us by the Italian masters, that it seems impossible to improve upon it.

We have only to read the lives of those who devoted their time and genius to the perfecting of this instrument to see what persistent industry they brought to bear upon the work, and how passionately they loved it.

There is a little sketch of Stradivarius, describing him as tall and thin, wearing on his head a white cap, and in his work a white leather apron over his clothes, and concludes by saying that as he was always at work, he was never seen without his white apron.

One can almost see the picture of the man sitting up in the garret opposite the old church, working day by day for half a century, and pouring his longings, his passions, his love, his power, and his fancy into those exquisite lines and curves which appeal so strongly to our sense of the beautiful.

An enthusiastic lover of music, mounting this same garret not so long ago, said to himself as he looked round, "Here, up in the high air, with the sun his helper, the light his minister, the blessed soft airs his journeymen, through the long warm summer days worked Stradivarius!"

But he was not the only master whose life and energies were given to the perfecting of the violin, as we shall see later on.

The changes to be noticed in our violins when put side by side with those of the great masters is a somewhat larger sound board, in order to bear the increased pressure caused by the diapason being higher than in former times, and a little longer neck, owing to the greater length of string.

We are so accustomed to think of the violin as a whole, that if we were asked on the spur of the moment to say how many parts there were in it, we might probably count on our fingers the top, bottom, sides, neck, bridge, pegs, and button, and think we had told all.

These would not, however, express by a great many the number of parts which make up this graceful and harmonious whole. There are as many as fifty-eight, and it is necessary that all should be perfect.

If by chance any one of these members should get out of order, or suffer in any way, the whole body of the violin would be sick. There are no separate interests; each part depends upon, and is helpful to, the other. Each, too, has its own burden to bear; the spirit that lay hidden in the wood would not only lose all its sweetness and power to charm, but would transform itself into a screech owl, if the various parts of the body in which it resides were not healthy and in harmony.

The body of the violin is like our own in this respect: that if one member suffer all the members suffer with it. It is like it, too, in that each has its proper place and function, and that all the parts are set in motion by, and are obedient to, a will power.

The analogy may be carried yet further. Neither one nor other can live without air—air regulated and in constant action. To deprive them of this would be to destroy life. We breathe through the pores of the body, so does a violin.

There is, however, this exception to the analogy, that whereas our bodies will in a few years crumble to dust, the body of the violin knows no decay. It grows more beautiful day by day, and gives forth sweeter sounds as the years go by. You may lay it aside for years, but it will awake to life and sweetness the moment the will power is brought to bear upon it. In a sense, it never grows old.

True, it may be stained with age and use, but this only adds to its honour and value, for, as Wendell Holmes beautifully expresses it, "it is stained through and through with the concentrated hue and sweetness of all the harmonies which have kindled and faded on its strings."

No wonder it exercises a fascination over people, and that they love it with an affection oftentimes beyond that they give to their friends; for who is there or what is there belonging to us that would accompany us to prison, to loneliness, or to festival, careless as to place or condition, so that it be with us? And what is there of all our possessions that can so suit itself to our position and moods as our violin?

I was once speaking with Herr Ludwig Straus before he came to England to delight us at the Monday Popular Concerts, and I remember a phrase of his as he was taking his violin lovingly out of its case. "I shall never marry; this [touching his violin] has all my affection; it is wife, friend, everything to me; it knows when I am sorry, and mourns with me; it knows when I am glad, and rejoices with me; it never scolds, it never tires of me."

How dearly Paganini loved his beautiful "Guarnerius," his only friend and companion, is easy to see by the acute agony he suffered when obliged to submit it to Vuillaume for an operation. Each crack and blow went to his soul, and he trembled all over.

Of course I know that everyone has not this intense love for a special violin, and I would quote as an example Molique, a pupil of Spohr, who was not only a splendid violinist, but a composer also. He did not in the least mind whose violin he played on. He would frequently come to a concert where he was to take a leading part without his violin, borrowing one from the orchestra; but this is a rare exception.

It seems that the violin has now and again exercised the physician's power of healing. Lord Beaconsfield told the story of a man of position being suddenly seized by violent illness, and instead of sending for a physician, desired the attendance of a band of violinists, who "played so well in his inside that his bowels became perfectly in tune, and in a few hours were harmoniously becalmed."

But all this time Herr Neuner has been waiting to conduct us through his factory. First we went into some large rooms where we saw stores of maple and pine-wood already cut, dried, and ready for use.

A curious feeling came over us as we stood there with our newly-acquired knowledge of the mysterious properties of wood, and the power they were likely some time or other to wield over us. We half expected to see some shadowy forms, or hear some ghostly sounds; but we remembered they had not yet taken the form in which a human voice or stroke of a hammer would meet with a response—the spirit within was for the present fast bound.

What we actually saw were pieces of trees of high character—trees which had done nothing in their lives to destroy the spirit and power within them, the infallible proofs of which they bore about them, in the perfectly regular rings spoken of in the last chapter.

We passed into another room, where men were busy over these pieces of wood; each had a pattern from which to work; this pattern, whether for the back or belly, was laid on the wood, so that it could not shift its position, and outlined with a dark pencil.

The wood was then passed on to a set of workers, whose business it was to cut away all outside the pencil mark, and leave only the shape of the top or bottom table.

These shapes were given to the most experienced and talented workmen to mould them into the required form. For this work they had various sizes of instruments, which looked like cheese scoops, and with them they obtained the various gradations of thicknesses, and gave to the backs and bellies that graceful arch which pleases the eye so much.

The slightest irregularity in performing this part of the work would render all the rest imperfect. If the bellies and backs be too much arched the elasticity of the wood does not get free play; if they be too thick the wood would give out too shrill a sound, and if made too thin the result would be too deep a tone.

We could not understand this, as we had always believed just the contrary, and asked to have it explained. Herr Neuner said that ours had been the general belief until research and experiments had proved the opposite to be the fact.

He then took two plates of the same material and exactly the same diameter, one, however, being twice as thick as the other, and, to my surprise, the tone drawn from the thin plates was an octave lower than that given out by the thick one!

We lingered long in this room, there was so much to interest us. The work here could be done by no hard and fast rule; there was nothing to guide the hands but genius and experience.

It was here we learned that the utmost attention must be given to the gradations of the thicknesses in the belly and back of the violin, and that in this operation lies principally the talent of the artist.

It has been said with truth that "the thicknesses of the upper and lower tables are like the wheels of a machine, the dial movements of a watch, or the clockwork of a pendulum."

Our guide explained that the workman could not with impunity decrease or amplify the thicknesses even by an atom. If too thick they oppose to the pulsation and movement of the air too much resistance, and if too thin they do not oppose enough.

In the latter case the vibration stops and the notes get rigid.

The bottom and the upper table contradict each other if the thicknesses be wrong. There is trembling where there should be resistance, the left sounds to the prejudice of the right, and the right to the prejudice of the left.

Again we saw that the workman had to use his discretion about the thicknesses in another way. For example—suppose the wood for the belly were extra hard and dense, he would make it thinner; but if very soft, light, and dry, he would make it thicker; and on this point there is no theory or strict rule.

In fact, Herr Neuner declared that the fault of the large majority of violins was that the thicknesses were badly calculated by workmen not up to their work.

We did not pick up this knowledge all at once, but went from the factory to the homes of the private makers, and to the violin school in the town, where we heard lessons given on the structure of the violin, and illustrated by the work in the hands of the pupils.

The falsification of the thicknesses is easy to prove. There is no more need to take a violin to pieces to find this out than to melt down a five-shilling piece in order to test its genuineness. "The bow will be the touchstone, the sound the condemnor, and the ear the judge."

If the table bends under the bridge, if the violin does not keep in tune, if the strings give out uncertain sounds, it is generally because the belly and back are too tight—the first step in the construction is wrong, and therefore not to be remedied.

In forming the two tables, the maker must secure equality of action, facility of respiration, and full volume of sound. If the arch be not sufficiently high, three things are lost, viz., quality of tone, solidity of the instrument, and elegance of shape.

The results of wrong or faulty thicknesses are given by an old writer in the following words:

"The first strings will be ear-piercers, the second will sound like kettledrums, the shrill thirds will talk through the nose, and the fourth strings will be iron bars."

Stradivarius experimented for forty years on the shape and thicknesses of the two tables, and so well was he rewarded for his pains, that his instruments are to this day the most esteemed for the power of their tone.

The Italian masters generally have been described as mathematical builders, from their nice and minute observation of the proportions most conducive to power, tone, and elegance. They never abandoned themselves to the caprice of chance. Each piece of wood fashioned by their hands reveals the most profound thought. It is certain that each master thought for himself, and never gave lodging in his mind to what is called luck or chance.

When with painful efforts a master traced new routes for himself, more or less direct, the various parts of his work were just as much subject to rules and principles as in the old road.

"If," says Abbé Sibire, "the efforts of those clever, capable men were not always master-strokes, they advanced the science for the future; and far from imputing blame to them for their deviations, we ought to be obliged to them, for some of their involuntary errors, arising from inexperience, have become to us sources of light."

Nicholas Amati, in whose house and studio the young Mittenwaldian Klotz was educated, and who stands second only to Stradivarius, his pupil, gave unremitting attention to the minutest portion of the art he loved so well. With his increased knowledge and experience, he learned that the two most important things in constructing a violin was the choice of wood and knowledge of the gradations of thicknesses in the upper and lower tables. To this last he devoted himself, and the result was, that he gradually departed from the form and model from which his family had worked, and made changes both in the arching and the thicknesses of the backs and bellies, till he arrived at those beautiful instruments known as the "Grand Amatis," and made for himself a name which will live as long as the world loves music.

Seeing and hearing all this, made us understand a little of the importance of the work we were watching. But here were only two individual parts out of the fifty-eight necessary for the whole, and besides they would be of no service as long as they stood alone and unsupported by the other members, however beautifully they were finished off, and we expected now to be taken to the room where the supports of these two tables were being made.

Not so, however; we had forgotten a very important thing indeed, which was the making of the two mouths or f holes on the upper table.

Each master had his own idea about these all-important sound holes, and therefore they vary somewhat in form and position. Looking at these with a critical eye, you may almost pronounce at once the name of the master.

The piercing of these holes requires scrupulous care and attention, and are worked from a pattern. The table is divided accurately in the centre, which is the respondent to the sounds; if this were not done the air would be rarer on one side than on the other; it would enter and depart in unequal portions, and draw out the sound without dividing it as exactly as it is required.

For this work you must have compass in both eye and hand, as any irregularity would seriously affect the position of the sound-post, and render that of the bridge impossible.

As lookers-on we are constantly impressed with the fact that on the intimate relation of all the parts together depends the success of the instrument. Each must correspond to and balance the other, and if the workman knows his work he will constrain each part to do this.

Our guide now proposed to take us to the room where the sides or bouts were made; but lest we should weary our readers, we postpone our visit there to the next month.

PIANOFORTE DUETS AND PIANOFORTE DUET PLAYING.

LIVING COMPOSERS.

GRATEFUL task is now before me, inasmuch as there is a mass of lovely material to draw on for this paper.

Naturally it is to be expected that, simultaneously with the development of the compass of the piano, a development of the importance and number of duets would inevitably occur.

This has undoubtedly taken place, for although Schubert undeniably has beaten the record in point of beauty and variety of duets, yet taken collectively the duets of living composers are far more important and numerous than those of bygone days. Take only Dvorák with his ten books. But gently! I must not anticipate. Dvorák's duets are too good to be hastily talked about. Let us keep them till last, and give them the full measure of our admiration and respectful criticism.

I really don't know where to commence—they are all so lovely. However, by way of a good start, let me pay a tribute to the genius and musicianly qualities of an English composer—Algernon Ashton—who is entitled to our grateful thanks for his lovely English, Scotch, and Irish dances, and also his march and tarantella. These are not easy pieces, but the wealth of imitation and counterpoint combined with the melodies so happily and melodiously in the three different styles, make them well worthy of the earnest study of the duettist.

Let me express a hope that this talented composer will render us still more under an obligation by writing a duet sonata.

I should mention that all these works are published by Simrock of Berlin.

Brahms—ah! a little word of complaint—not as to the duets themselves—who doesn't know Brahms' Hungarian dances, but who (save a few earnest amateurs) know they are really and truly written as pianoforte duets (in four books)?

Now, my dear readers, don't let our violinist friends claim these as their own inheritance. They may tell you, "Oh, yes, Hungarian dances: Brahms' 'Joachim.'" Nothing of the sort, fair reader! They are Brahms' pianoforte duets, which he permitted Joachim to arrange for the violin, and I believe the composer himself has scored them for the orchestra.

Dvorák himself has—Hush! wait till further on, impatient pen.

Brahms has also written his "Songs of Love" waltzes, Op. 52, for pianoforte duet, with voices ad libitum; but his new "Songs of Love," Op. 65, are written for four voices and pianoforte duet accompaniment.

I find on referring to Simrock's catalogue that book 3 of the Hungarian dances is scored by Albert Parlow, and book 4 by Dvorák, and that all four books are arranged for cello and piano by Piatti.

I do not think it would be out of place to mention that Cipriani Potter's favourite amusement was playing pianoforte duets; and I know Miss Grace Sherrington and her niece, the accomplished singer, Miss Ella Lemmens—now, alas! lost to the concert stage—made it a favourite recreation; and I have heard that it is also a pastime of some of the members of our own Royal family.

Coming back now to business, I must mention some charming pieces of Nicodé, Op. 7, also some valse caprices, Op. 10, and his Op. 26, a ball scene (valse), not difficult but charming music (published by Augener).

The cousins Philipp and Xaver Scharwenka have contributed a good deal to art in this form. I have four books of Philipp Scharwenka which are all very lovely and not too difficult.

A polonaise in E minor is perhaps rather intricate, but a minuet in G major, a Hungarian piece, and a most enchanting valse in E flat major, will I am sure be voted just the thing for an "at home" or friendly gathering. The valse I am especially in love with. It is numbered Op. 30, No. 2; they are all published by Breitkopf and Härtel, and can be obtained here (as can all the foreign music mentioned) at Messrs. Pitt and Hatzfeld, 62, Berners Street, Oxford Street, W., who keep them in stock; whereas I think the other foreign music importers would be obliged to send abroad for them, thus causing a delay of at least a week.

I know of the famous conductor and composer, Reinecke of Leipsic, three fantasias published by Augener, of which the third, called "A Northern Ballad," is most spirited and original. His Op. 46, music to Hoffman's "Nutmackers and Mouse-king" is for four hands on the piano.

There is also of his a collection of pieces, Op. 54, of which the treble is written in a compass of five notes only, in one position of the hand. They are most charming, and are just the thing for little Mary or Alice to play with her big sister!

Julius Röntgen has some pieces, Op. 4; an Introduction, Scherzo, Intermezzo, and Finale, Op. 16; Theme and Variations, Op. 17, etc.

I am coming soon to the great duet writers of the present age by an ascending order of beauty, and next I think the veteran Niels W. Gade is entitled to be mentioned for some charming marches and poetic tone-pictures.

May I be allowed to mention a composer who died, alas! just as his immortal opera had established its beauty and originality? Need I say I mean Bizet? He has given us in his short span of life a suite of twelve duets, called "Jeux d'Enfants," from which the orchestral "Petite Suite" is taken, which consists of five pieces, Nos. 2, 3, 6, 11, 12, from the Pianoforte Duet Suite, scored for orchestral use by the composer; but the music belongs to us, my dear duettist readers—it is ours by right of birth.

Now for another great suite—Rubinstein, "Le Bal Costumé"—enough to make the most staid old grandmamma want to have a dance.

Of course this again is mostly played on the orchestra, but it is nevertheless written for us as a collection of pianoforte duets.

Let us hope that ere long the great pianist composer will give us some more duets from his untiring pen, and if they may be in dance rhythm, still greater will be our happiness and content.

I now speak of music, at once sweet, contrapuntal and original.

There are some valse duets of Gouvy (in two books) which have only to be known in order to carry all before them in this line.

Next to the valse of Chopin and Schubert I do not think anything in this particular dance rhythm has been written to equal them. They are irresistible in their gaiety and abandon. There are also of his some short pieces, Op. 59, and some Variations, Op. 57 and Op. 52.

The Norse composer Greig has impressed his striking personality upon some books of Norse dances, valse caprices, symphonic pieces, and the music to Peer Gynt, which was written in duet form.

When I speak of Moszkowski I mention a name that must be endeared to every girl in the land who has heard his sparkling and melodious "Spanish Dances" (two books), German Rounds from Foreign Parts, etc.

Moszkowski is quite a young man. When I saw him conduct his "Joan of Arc" at the Philharmonic, some two seasons ago, he was then, I believe, only 30 or 31.

We certainly anticipate a great amount of pleasure from his forthcoming works, and let us hope he will not neglect the form in which he first won such popularity in England.

I know also of his "four four-handed pieces," Op. 33, Children's March, Humoreske, Tarantelle, and Spinning Song. The tarantelle I consider one of the best and most original pieces of the kind.

A respected professor, Mr. Li Calsi, once did me the kindness of playing some of these duets at a concert. When I took them to him to rehearse, after the tarantelle, he immediately exclaimed (with his characteristic impetuosity), "Oh, what a beauty!" and immediately played it through again.

The same composer's "German Rounds" also greatly pleased him. I have kept Dvorák's duets to the last, with an incredible display of patience. There are ten books of these efforts of genius—

Four books of Slav dances, two books of legends, two books of bagatelles, and two books from the Bohemian woods.

I could dilate for a long while on the beauty and originality of this music. The piquant rhythm, the fascinating melody, the scholarly and inexhaustible counterpoint, immediately excite and engage the attention and reverence of the listener or executant.

I can only say, get them—all if you can, but get them, any of them, if you want a musical treat of a thoroughly new kind.

They are the greatest works of the kind, in my opinion, ever written, and I give that as my deliberate opinion after fourteen or fifteen years' experience of duets and duet playing.

I cannot do more than mention that there exist duets of César Cui, Massenet, Welterlin, von Bulow, Gernsheim, Goldmark, Huber, Taubert, Volkmann, Wuerst, Bachmann, Lack, Spindler, etc.

I shall in my next devote some space to the consideration of arrangement—an important subject in our music life of to-day.

OUR BESSIE.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY, Author of "Nellie's Memories," "Esther," etc.

CHAPTER XV.
SHE WILL NOT COME."

BESSIE did not enter the drawing-room that evening; she felt that her presence would be decidedly de trop under the circumstances. She made the pretext of fatigue the reason for retiring to her room early, and Richard accepted the excuse as though he believed in it.

"Well, I daresay you will be more comfortable," he agreed. "My mother will be sure to come up and wish you good-night. Confess now, Miss Lambert, are you not wishing yourself at home this evening?"

"No, of course not," replied Bessie, briskly. "Have you not promised me another ride to-morrow?" But all the same, as she went upstairs, she thought a talk with her mother and Hatty would have been very soothing. She was sitting by her window thinking over things in general, when there was a tap at her door, and Mrs. Sefton entered.

"Richard told me you were tired and had gone up to bed," she said, more kindly than usual. "I am so sorry, my dear, that you have had such an uncomfortable afternoon. Edna has been very naughty—very naughty indeed; but Richard and I feel very grateful to you for accompanying her."

"I thought it was the right thing to do, Mrs. Sefton."

"Yes, of course, there was nothing else to be done; but it was a foolish freak on Edna's part." Mrs. Sefton spoke in a worried voice, and her face looked tired and harassed. Bessie said as much, and she replied—

"Oh, yes; I am worried enough. I have had a fatiguing day in town, and then when Neville and I entered the house expecting a welcome, there was Richard's moody face and your note to greet us. And now, to make things worse, Edna chooses to be offended at Neville's coming down in this way, and declares he meant to be a spy on her. She won't say a civil word to him, and yet it is for him to be displeased; but I think he would waive all that if she would only own she has acted ungenerously to him. I must say Neville is behaving beautifully. He speaks as gently as possible; but Edna is in one of her tempers, and she will not listen to reason."

"I am sorry," replied Bessie, looking so full of sympathy that Mrs. Sefton relaxed from her usual cold dignity.

"Oh, my dear," she said, and now there were tears in her eyes, "I am afraid it is all my fault. I have indulged Edna too much, and given her her own way in everything; and now she tyrannises over us all. If I had only acted differently." And here the poor woman sighed.

Bessie echoed the sigh, but she could think of nothing to say that could comfort Mrs. Sefton; she was evidently reaping the effects of her own injudicious weakness. She had not taught her child to practise self-discipline and self-control. Her waywardness had been fostered by indulgence, and her temper had become more faulty. "What man is there among you whom if his son ask bread, will give him a stone?" asked the Divine Teacher; and yet there are many parents who offer these stony gifts to their children, loading them with false kindness and indulgence, leaving evil weeds unchecked, and teaching them everything but the one thing needful.

"Oh, how different from mother!" thought Bessie, when she was left alone, and recalled the time when her young will had been over strong, and there had been difficult points in her character, and yet how sensibly and how tenderly her mother had dealt with them.

She had never been blind to one of her children's faults, and up to a certain age it had been her habit, on the eve of their birthdays, to talk quietly to them, pointing out their failings and defective habits, and giving her opinion on the year's improvement. "On a birthday one ought to begin afresh," she would say, "and make a new start." How well Bessie could remember these talks, and the gentle words of praise that generally closed them. She was almost sorry when she was too grown up for them, and quiet self-examination took the place of these fond maternal admonitions.

When Bessie joined the family at breakfast, she found Mr. Sinclair helping Edna with the urn. He accosted Bessie with much friendliness, and seemed pleased to see her again. She had been prepossessed with him at their first meeting, and she thought his manner still pleasanter on this second occasion, and she was struck afresh with his air of quiet refinement. He took part in the conversation with much animation, and talked more to Richard than to anyone else. Edna did not appear to have recovered herself; she took very little notice of anybody, and received her fiancé's attentions rather ungraciously. Bessie thought she looked as though she had not slept well; her eyes had a heavy look in them, as though her head ached. Bessie had her ride directly afterwards, and as Richard assisted her to mount, Mr. Sinclair stood on the steps and watched them.

"What are you and Edna going to do with yourselves?" asked Richard, presently.

Mr. Sinclair smiled.

"I shall do whatever Edna likes; perhaps she will drive me somewhere; she looks as though the fresh air would do her good. I shall have to go back to town this evening, so I must make the most of my day in the country."

The house was so still when they returned, that Bessie thought they had started for the drive, when she ran upstairs to take off her habit. She seated herself presently by one of the drawing-room windows with her work, wondering what everyone was doing.

Her work interested her, and she was quietly enjoying herself, when she heard quick footsteps in the hall outside, and a moment afterwards a door slammed.

"They have come back I suppose," thought Bessie, and she worked on, until the drawing-room door opened and Mr. Sinclair came in alone. He seemed surprised to see Bessie, but the next minute he had crossed the room hastily.

"Miss Lambert, will you do me a favour? I cannot find Mrs. Sefton, and I have no one else to ask."

"Certainly," returned Bessie, and she rose at once.

Mr. Sinclair looked pale and troubled, and his manner was extremely nervous.

"Then will you be so good as to beg Edna to come down to me for a moment; she has misunderstood—that is, I wish to speak to her—there is a slight misconception. Edna has gone to her own room."

"I will go at once," exclaimed Bessie, feeling convinced by his manner that something was very wrong. Edna must have quarrelled with him again. She ran upstairs and knocked at Edna's door, but received no answer; it was not locked, however, and after a moment's hesitation she entered. Edna had evidently not heard her; she was standing by the window in her walking dress. As Bessie spoke to attract her attention, she turned round and frowned angrily; something in her face made Bessie breathless with apprehension.

"What do you want?" she asked, harshly.

"Mr. Sinclair sent me," pleaded Bessie; "he is very anxious to speak to you; he begs that you will come downstairs. He thinks that there is some mistake."

"No, there is no mistake," replied Edna, slowly; "you may tell him so from me."

"Why not tell him yourself, Edna?"

"Because I have had enough of Mr. Sinclair's company this morning. Because nothing would induce me to speak to him again. I thought I had locked my door to prevent intrusion; but I suppose I forgot. Please give him my message that there was no mistake—oh, none at all."

Bessie hesitated, but another look at Edna's face showed her that any entreaty at this moment would be vain, so she went out of the room without another word.

Mr. Sinclair was standing just where she had left him; he looked at her anxiously.

Bessie shook her head.

"She will not come," she said, sorrowfully.

"Will not? Did she give no reason—send no message?"

"Only that there was no mistake; she repeated that more than once. Perhaps she will change her mind in a little while." But Mr. Sinclair did not seem to hear her.

"No mistake! Then she meant it—she meant it!" he muttered, and his face became quite changed. He had walked to the window, but he came back again.

"Thank you, Miss Lambert. I am very much obliged to you," he said, as though feeling he had been deficient in politeness; but before she could reply he had left the room.

The gong sounded for luncheon directly afterwards, but Bessie found the dining-room empty, so she sat down to her work again, and by-and-by Dixon brought her a message that his mistress was waiting. Mrs. Sefton was in the room alone; she motioned Bessie to a seat, and began to carve the chicken before her. No one else made their appearance; but Mrs. Sefton did not apologise for their absence. She scarcely ate anything herself, and made no attempt to sustain the conversation. She looked preoccupied and troubled, and as soon as the meal was over she begged Bessie to amuse herself, as she had some important business to settle, and left the room.

Bessie passed a solitary afternoon; but though her book was interesting, her attention often wandered. She was sure something was seriously wrong, and she felt vaguely unhappy on Edna's account. She could not forget Mr. Sinclair's face when she had brought him that message. It was as though he had received a blow that he scarcely knew how to bear.

Dixon brought her some tea, and told her that his mistress and Miss Edna were having theirs in the dressing-room. Later on, as she went indoors to prepare for dinner, she encountered Richard; he had just driven up to the door in his dogcart, and Brand and Gelert were with him.

"Where is Mr. Sinclair?" she ventured to ask, as he smiled at seeing her.

"He has gone," he replied. "I have just driven him to the station. Do you know where my mother is to be found?"

"I have not seen her since luncheon," answered Bessie. "I think she is with Edna."

"Very likely. I will go and see." And Richard sprang up the staircase three steps at a time. Bessie thought he looked tired and worried, too; and to add to the general oppression, a storm seemed gathering, for the air felt unusually still and sultry.

Edna did not join them at dinner, and the meal was hardly more festive than the luncheon had been. Mrs. Sefton hardly opened her lips, and Richard only made a few general remarks.

Bessie expected that her evening would be as solitary as her afternoon, but, rather to her surprise, Mrs. Sefton followed her into the drawing-room.

Bessie was just debating in her own mind whether she should ask permission to go up to Edna, when Mrs. Sefton beckoned her to sit down beside her.

"My dear," she said, "you are feeling very uncomfortable I can see, and you do not like to ask questions; you think something is the matter, and you are right. Edna is making us all very unhappy. She has quarrelled with Neville, and has broken off her engagement with him, and nothing that Richard or I can say to her will induce her to listen to reason."

"Oh, Mrs. Sefton, how dreadful!"

"Yes, is it not heart-breaking? Poor Neville! and he is so devoted to her. They were to have been married next spring, but now Edna declares that nothing would induce her to marry him. She will have it that he is jealous and monopolising, and that he distrusts her. Over and over again she told us both that she would be the slave of no man's caprice. Of course it is all her temper; she is just mad with him because he is always in the right, and she knows how ungenerously she has acted; but by-and-by she will repent, and break her heart, for she is certainly fond of him, and then it will be too late."

"And she has really sent him away?"

"Yes, she told him to go, that she never wanted to see him again; and he has gone, poor fellow; Richard drove him to the station. He says he never saw a man so terribly cut up, but he told Richard just at the last that perhaps it might prove the best for them in the end, that they were not suited to each other, and never had been, but that Edna had never shown him her temper quite so plainly before."

"Oh, Mrs. Sefton, how terrible it all seems! Can nothing be done?"

"Nothing," in a voice of despair. "Richard and I have talked to her for hours, but it is no use. She declares that it is a good thing she and Neville at last understand each other, that she will never repent her decision, and yet all the time she looks utterly wretched. But she will not own it; it is just her pride and her temper," finished the unhappy mother, "and I must stand by and see her sacrifice her own happiness, and say nothing."

"May I go up to her, Mrs. Sefton? Do you think she would care to see me?"

"I think she will see you now, and it is not good for her to be alone; but you will find her very hard and impracticable."

"I shall not mind that, if she will only let me be with her a little; but I cannot bear to think of her, shut up with only miserable thoughts to keep her company," and here Bessie's eyes filled with tears, for she was very sympathetic and soft-hearted.

"Then go to her, my dear, and I hope you may do her some good." And Bessie went at once.

Just outside the door she met Richard; he was on his way to the drawing-room.

"I am going up to Edna," she said, as he looked at her inquiringly. "Oh, Mr. Sefton, I am so sorry for her! She is making herself and everyone else miserable."

"I am more sorry for Sinclair," he returned, and his face looked very stern as he spoke. "She has treated him abominably. Wait a moment, Miss Lambert," as she seemed about to leave him, "there is no hurry, is there? and I have not spoken to you to-day. Do you think you are wise to mix yourself up in this? My mother is thinking more of Edna than of you, but you will do no good, and only make yourself miserable. Leave Edna alone to-night, and come and play to me instead."

"Mr. Sefton, I never thought you could be so selfish."

He laughed outright, as Bessie said this very seriously.

"Never trust any man; we are all of us selfish. But to tell you the truth, I was not thinking of my own enjoyment at that minute. I wanted to save you an hour's unpleasantness, but I see you prefer to make yourself miserable."

"I think I do in the present instance," returned Bessie, quietly.

"Very well, have your own way; but if you take my advice, you will not waste your pity upon Edna. She is flinging away her happiness with her eyes open, just to gratify her temper. You see I can speak plainly, Miss Lambert, and call things by their right names. Just out of pride and self-will, she is bidding goodbye to one of the best fellows living, and all the time she knows that he is a good fellow. She won't find another Neville Sinclair, I tell her."

"No, and it is just because she is doing it herself that I am so sorry for her," replied Bessie. "Please don't keep me, Mr. Sefton; you do not understand—how can you? If he had died, if anything else had separated them, it would be so much easier to bear, but to do it herself, and then to be so sorry for it afterwards, oh, how miserable that must be!" and Bessie's voice became a little unsteady as she hastily bade him good-night.

THE IDLE SERVANT.

From the painting by Nicholas Maas, in the National Gallery.

THE SERVICE OF BEAUTY

BEAUTY IN THE HOME.

WE have been considering the beautiful in its widest aspects—in Nature, in Art, and in Literature. Let us now confine it to a particular application, and one very important to us all—its relation to our homes.

This view of the beautiful concerns us women closely. Here we find a province in which are called forth our special gifts and qualifications in the "service of Beauty"—our sense of fitness, our love of order, our power of administration and readiness of resource, our retirement and leisure for cultivating the graces of life. It is the woman's presence and influence which make the home, in the deepest sense of that word, so rich in meaning. Without her, the fairest dwelling is but a place to lodge in; with it, the grass beneath and the open sky above may become a true home.

There is little need to fear that English folks will ever value their homes too lightly; the love of them is bound up with the national life, and is likely to last as long. But firm as it may be, this love is capable of being, and needs to be, elevated. It must be kept free from over-attention to physical comfort, from the tendency to luxurious materialism, from what may be called family selfishness, or it will tend to harm instead of good, and we shall be recalled in pain and sorrow from our low ideal to a vision of One who had not where to lay His head.

The outward aspect of our homes is a very important element in their constitution. Two reflections will help to bear in mind the solemn necessity of making them what they should be outwardly. First, that they reflect ourselves; secondly, that they help to mould our moral nature with a silent but incessant influence. I lately had occasion to enter a number of homes owned by women, the occupants being unknown to me. While waiting for an interview, I taxed my powers of observation to read the character of the inmates from the open book before me. With a little practice, one can gather quite an astonishing amount of reliable information. In the lower middle-class homes, the two things which I found most frequently marring their fair aspect were conventionality—resulting in dullness and discomfort—and a lack of feeling for form and colour, resulting in harsh contrasts, false ornament, and general unwhiteness—another name for ugliness. The good points were cleanliness, and the evident pride taken in the household gods. I was struck also with the gradual introduction of a higher standard of taste—the farthest ripples of the wave of æstheticism. Sometimes the contrast and mixture of the old style and the new was ludicrous; but one felt thankful that at least the change had begun, and that the old stiffness and want of harmony were giving way. In the higher-class homes it was easy to trace the refining influence of a true perception of beauty; in others, the love of material ease, or the crude results of wealth without taste.

There are few homes without the sweet presence of young girls. Probably each of them looks forward vaguely to a home of which she will have the forming. Meanwhile she must not be discouraged if her parents' home represents their tastes rather than her own. She has more than enough scope for her powers in brightening it, and in promoting and ministering to the love of beauty. Here are a few golden rules for guidance in this matter. We must first aim at order, in which I include neatness, cleanliness, punctuality, efficiency, in all the means and appliances for working, resting, and eating. Order carries a great many virtues in her train; if they rebel, she soon ceases to reign supreme. There can be no real beauty in a home untidy or dirty. What pleasure can we gain from sitting in a room hung with the finest pictures, if we are poisoned all the while by bad drainage, or afflicted in our sense of smell by a cook whose kitchen emits a whole houseful of evil odours? It is very essential to remember that beauty appeals to more senses than one.

After order, we may aim at decoration. In considering decorative art, we may find a golden rule suggested by the derivation of the word decoration from the same Latin root, decorus, which gives us decorous, fitting. Decorative art means art which is fitted to its purpose. In fine art we may say that an object is fit because it is beautiful; in decorative art, that it is beautiful because it is fit. In the latter the artist must find his limit in the purpose of the object which he is decorating. The term conventional in this connection implies an agreement or convention between the artist and Nature, as to how far he may imitate her, which must be only so far as to be consistent with the specific purpose of the object to be decorated. Ornament, according to the rule of the best art, grows naturally out of the fitness of the object, just as "beauty is Nature's signal of attainment."

Avoid all deception and shams in your attempts to decorate. No cultivated eye can possibly be gratified by anything which pretends to be what it is not. Morris says, "Have nothing in your houses which you do not know to be useful, or believe to be beautiful." From what a mass of lumber and hideous objects the carrying out of this simple rule would relieve many of us!

Aim at nothing which cannot be well carried out. It is delightful to have quantities of flowers and plants about us; but if we have not large rooms or time to attend properly to their cultivation and renewing, it is better to have a few which are not in the way, and always in perfect order.

A few simple directions for furnishing and decorating a room will illustrate these rules.

Let the purpose for which the room is to be used be kept in mind throughout, that your aim may be clear and consistent in adapting it as closely as possible to the needs of its occupants, and in making its decoration appropriate to its use.

We will take a common living-room, to be occupied generally by the various members of a middle-class household. Consider its capabilities as to height, light, position of door, windows and fireplaces, so as to make the most of it.

Have the woodwork all as good as possible, but real. Plain deal is better than imitation oak. Let ceiling and walls be washed in some soft tint, and varnished, or better still, painted. Keep the whole subdued in tone, bearing in mind that the room is to serve as a background. Choose a tint to light up well by gas or candle light. Beware of gas in your room, but if you have it at all let it be in branches on the walls, and always shaded. If possible, have movable lamps and candles in a brass chandelier.

Let the grate be well set, decorated with tiles and a tiled hearth, the mantelpiece high, with an over-mantel. Have your floor stained and varnished in a border 1½ ft. wide, cover the rest with India matting, and put good Eastern rugs here and there.

Let the windows be hung with soft material which will drape well—of some plain warm tint; have the curtains bordered with good embroidery, and cut just to the ground. Hang them by rings on a brass rod, without cornice. Have chairs of the best wood you can afford, and of a shape practical, comfortable, and good to look at, and which it is not fatal to tilt back—chairs in which you can sit up to write or work, and easy chairs in which it is impossible to be uneasy, at least physically. Have a couch broad, flat, and long enough to lie down upon, and cushions serviceable as pillows upon occasion. Have this furniture well stuffed, and covered with plain, good material, which will not quarrel with your walls and curtains.

Let the table be square-cornered, and substantial; do not place it in the middle of the room, and as its raison d'être is to hold things, do not cover it with fixtures, that you cannot put anything down upon it.

Have a writing-table of similar character, well furnished with writing materials, and low book-shelves, accessible to all, without doors, the top of which will serve to hold china, or any such decoration.

Bear in mind that there is a strong tendency on the part of enough to become too much, and keep out of your room unnecessary accumulations. Having got the essentials, be chary of adding to them.

Have as many good pictures, however simple, as you have room for, but hang up nothing merely to cover the walls. Good copies are better than poor originals.

Have some beautiful needlework, but never place it where it can seem superfluous or in the way. Do not have embroidered chair-backs too delicate to be touched, nor tables so highly polished that it is a social sin to risk scratching them, nor anything so fine as to impede the children's free movements.

Aim at as much simplicity as is compatible with comfort, and as much beauty as you can fairly and thoroughly enjoy.

We do not always realise what a strong influence our surroundings send back upon us. As we make them, so they make us. Perhaps we have all felt at some time the pleasure, the delicious restfulness, of entering a room thoroughly harmonious to every sense and need; but we differ very much from each other in sensitiveness, and from ourselves at different times. We are apt to become blunted to our surroundings, to imagine that they do not affect us because they are familiar. It may be unconsciously, but still I maintain we are affected for good or ill by everything about us. We can hardly live in the presence of a work of art without insensibly absorbing its beauty. We cannot live in sight of ugliness without our taste being jarred and hurt, or else vitiated and lowered.

With some of us, false notes and discords in the music of the eye will produce a thrill of positive physical pain, but none are altogether unaffected by it, whether they know it or not.

It is for us women to shut out from our homes every harsh, repellent element—to bring into them every tint of loveliness we can learn or imitate from Nature and Art—to make them temples raised to the "service of Beauty," green oases in the barrenness of the hard and dreary world.

POETS OVER-SEA.

A GOSSIP ON THE RECENT POETRY OF AMERICA.

By GLEESON WHITE, Author of "Some Poetry we Read," "Ballades and Rondeaux," etc.

PART II.

MR. THAXTER has won full and lasting appreciation in her own land, and turning over the pages of "The Cruise of the Mystery," and her "Poems," two of the five volumes she has written, the wonder is that she is not better known here. Her delight in nature, and the pure, honest joy in living, make her verses not merely a pleasure, but a mental tonic. In these days of morbid self-questioning, and querulous askings if life itself is worth living, she strikes a true and rare note. Much study of poetry, many estimable people contend, unfits the student for everyday work; but such cannot be said of Celia Thaxter's lyrics: the healthful optimism of her praise of living, her exquisite nature-pictures and strong humanity, are no feigned sentiment. One look at her portrait shows that the peace and joy of her song is the outcome of a glad heart, that looks for the best, and therefore finds evidence of it everywhere. Nor are her poems merely "moral and emotional"; they are full of delicate movement and exquisite play of light that only the true crystal flashes. In despair of doing justice to the poet herself, or proving the truth of this praise, the following will at least show one side of her work, and become probably favourites here, as they are in the United States.

A ROSE OF JOY.

For a Betrothal.

As when one wears a fragrant rose
Close to the heart, a rosé most fair,
And while the day's life onward flows,
Forget that it is fastened there;

And wonders what delicious charm
Dwells in the air about, and whence
Come the rich wafts of perfume warm,
Subtly saluting soul and sense;

And then, remembering what it is,
Bends smiling eyes the flower above,
Adores its beauty and its bliss,
And looks on it with grateful love—

Even so I wear, O friend of mine,
The sweet thought of your happiness;
The knowledge of your joy divine
Is fragrant with a power to bless.

With the day's work preoccupied,
Vaguely, half conscious of delight,
Upborne as on a buoyant tide,
I wonder why life seems so bright.

Then memory speaks; then winter gray,
And age and cares that have no end
Touch one no more. I am to-day
Rich in the wealth that cheers my friend.

The last volume by Mrs. Harriett Prescott Spofford, entitled "Ballads about Authors," is a good idea, well worked out. Unfortunately for our purpose they are too large to quote, for the feeling that re-tells the old stories of Cowper and his hares, Collins burning his odes, Samuel Johnson in Uttoxeter Market, and the others, is most charming, and the rhythm and music of the pieces alike good. In an earlier volume there are not a few lyrics of great beauty. The three, picked almost at random, each show that a certain dignity of thought as well as pleasant words are characteristic of their author's work.

THE PINE TREE.

Before your atoms came together
I was full grown, a tower of strength,
Seen by the sailors out at sea,
With great storms measuring all my length,
Making my mighty minstrelsy
Companion of the ancient weather.

Yours! Just as much as the stars that shiver

When the frost sparkles overhead!
Call yours as soon those viewless airs
That sing in the clear vault, and tread
The clouds! Less yours than theirs—
The fish-hawks swooping round the river!

In the primeval depths, embowering
My broad boughs with my branching peers,

My gums I spilled in precious drops—
Ay, even in those elder years
The eagle building in my tops,
Along my boughs the panther cowering.

Beneath my shade the red man slipping
Himself a shadow, stole away;
A paler shadow follows him!
Races may go, or races stay,
The cones upon my loftiest limb
The winds will many a year be stripping.

And there the hidden day be throwing
His fires, though dark the dead prime be,
Before the bird shakes off the dew.

Ah! what songs have been sung to me,
What songs will yet be sung, when you
Are dust upon the four winds blowing!

MEASURE FOR MEASURE.

What love do I bring you? The earth,
Full of love, were far lighter,
The great hollow sky, full of love,
Something slighter.

Earth full and heaven full were less
Than the full measure given;
Nay, say a heart full—the heart
Holds earth and heaven.

CAVEFE, FELICES.

The orchards all a-flutter with pink,
Robins' twitter, and wild bees' humming,
Break the song with a thrill, to think
How sweet is life when summer is coming.

The maple burning a scarlet leaf,
The melting haze, and the south wind blowing,

Charm the sting from the touch of grief,
For sweet is life when summer is going.

Oh, sweet, so sweet that the heat grows chill,

Knowing the clouds will sweep the clover,
The leaf will redden, the bird sing still;
But for us how soon it will all be over!

Miss Minnie Gillmore (daughter of the well-known bandmaster of America) in spite, or perhaps because of certain exaggeration and redundancy inseparable from the enthusiasm of youth, has created in her "Pipes from Prairie Land" a book that is purely American, being daringly original, not to say ab-original, in its similes and phantasies. The wayward impulse of her lyrics, the naïve frankness of her humour, and now and again her American use of English as we know it, witches one almost against one's critical judgment. Her poetry might have been recited by the entirely lovable Miss Peggy, of the "Strange Adventure of a House Boat," that William Black created to steal away our hearts. The pleasure of this volume is a real one; aiming not at the highest, it amply fulfils its intention, and comes with the keen freshness of the western air laden with the perfume of the primeval forest, or, to be more accurate, with the glamour we who know it not associate with the Wild West itself (in spite of recollections of a certain circus at Kensington). After so much verve, "splendidly faultless, icily null, simple perfection, nothing more," this is in itself justification of Miss Gillmore's singing, but there is more than mere quaintness, more than novel treatment. I know not how her own country values this young lady's work, but to an Englishman it has more charm than a reproduction of Keats, or a faint shadow of Matthew Arnold. The following poem is a sample of her more serious work:—

LIFE.

A Song of a White Throne circled
By a girdle of white fire,
Once on the flame God breathed
Filled with divine desire.
Out, at his breath there flickered
A single tongue of flame,
Paling the golden planets,
Putting the sun to shame.
It flashed through the flashing Saturn,
It flamed through the flaming Mars,
Flooded the skies with glory,
Glanced down the glowing stars;
Burst on the six-day Eden,
And since has the world been rife
With fruit of that flame from heaven—
The God-breathed flame of life.

This is the initial poem of a "Quintette of Song," whereof the other numbers are entitled "Love," "Song," "Peace," "Death," and in their harmony, complete with singular grace and power, a conception at once beautiful in design and happy in its treatment.

From the ideality of this group to the Bret Harte-like humour of the section entitled "In the Original Key," is a far cry, yet perchance none of the many who have tried the method of that distinctly unique poet have so justified the adoption of his mannerisms. "A Pioneer Poet" and "A Border Romance" are full of the local colour we have learned to accept as a true reflection of the wild camp life of the Far West. Miss Gillmore's own address to her critics should also be quoted, since it shows at once her strength and the naïve youthfulness which atones for much.

I pray you hear my song of a bird,
My song of a bird fledged newly;
She plumed her wings on a sunny day,
And flew to the far, free west away
To mountains misted bluely;—

To heights that cloister the virgin snows;
To canyons by cool brooks purled,
To hills that warden the vale's retreats,
To grass-seas ridden by flower-fleets
With petal-sails unfurled.

When back one even, on homeward wing
She fluttered with long flight weary,
To kindred sheltered their nests among,
She shyly lifted a glad young song
Of mountain and of cyrie:—

Of twilight woods with their scents of pine,
Of the rose that rides the prairie,
Of still ravines where the cactus hides
And rivers tuning their rippled tides
To the west wind's vagary.

The wise birds listed her simple lay,
And sang, "She is joyous, truly,"
Her prelude-pipes soar no note above
The scale of youth, but she sings for love—
We will not carp unduly.

So the bird sang on, and year by year
More strong rose her song and sweeter;—
O! critics mine! may I pray you be
So kind as my fabled bird to me,
Whose voice is new to metre!

In a volume, "Afternoon Songs," Julia C. Dorr collects her later work, and as the poem that insists on quotation is rather beyond the limits of this article, it must say for itself all the pretty things one could say equally of many of its companions.

THREE LADDIES.

O sailors sailing north,
Where the wild surges roar,
And fierce winds and strong winds
Blow down from Labrador—
Have you seen my three brave laddies,
My merry, red-cheeked laddies,
Three bold, adventurous laddies,
On some tempestuous shore?

O sailors sailing south,
Where the seas are calm and blue,
And light clouds and soft clouds
Are floating over you,
Say, have you seen my laddies,
My three bright, winsome laddies,
My brown-haired, smiling laddies,
With hearts so leal and true?

O sailors sailing east,
Ask the seagulls sweeping by;
O sailors sailing west,
Ask the eagles soaring high,
If they have seen my laddies,
My careless, heedless laddies,
Three debonair young laddies,
Beneath the wide, wide sky.

O sailors, if you find them,
Pray send them back to me;
For them the winds go sighing
Through every lonely tree—
For these three wandering laddies,
My tender, bright-eyed laddies,
The laughter-loving laddies,
Whom they no longer see.

There are three men who love me,
Three men with bearded lips;
But oh! ye gallant sailors
Who sail the sea in ships—

In elf-land, or in cloudland,
Or on the dream-land shore,
Can you find the little laddies,
Whom I can find no more?
Three quiet, thoughtful laddies,
Three merry, winsome laddies,
Three rollicking, frolicking laddies,
On any far off shore?

In the preface to one of her volumes, Miss Ella Wheeler Wilcox owns to having published twelve hundred poems. Such a statement is enough to repel the best intentioned critic. Yet amid much work too hastily done, and mere facile rhyming not always correct in its prosody and metrical shape, there is evidence of a spontaneous feeling and graceful fancy. It is only just to own so much, but the deed is almost unpardonable. Twelve hundred poems—why, the masterpieces of the whole English tongue must needs be ransacked to make up half that number; and although courtesy both to sex and country demand reticence, yet protest must be entered against such a terrible example; for if the youthful face which greets us so pleasantly on the frontispiece be so deeply dyed with guilt, what in all conscience will be the account, if the long life, it is our duty and pleasure to wish the fair singer, be equally prolific for half a century more? Besides, how can a well meaning scribe show fair sample of such countless wares? So amid more worth quoting than at first reading seemed possible I take this one, "Esthetic," and regret that many more serious and successful attempts are for various reasons not possible to quote.

ESTHETIC.

In a garb that was guiltless of colors
She stood, with a dull, listless air—
A creature of dumps and of dolours,
But most undeniably fair.

The folds of her garment fell round her,
Revealing the curve of each limb;
Well-proportioned and graceful I found her,
Although quite alarmingly slim.

From the hem of her robe peeped one sandal—
"High art" was she down to her feet;
And though I could not understand all
She said, I could see she was sweet.

Impressed by her limpness and languor,
I proffered a chair near at hand;
She looked back a mild sort of anger,
Posed anew, and continued to stand.

Some praises I next tried to mutter
Of the fan that she held to her face:
She said it was "utterly utter,"
And waved it with languishing grace.

I then in a strain quite poetic
Begged her gaze on the bow in the sky;
She looked, said its curve was "æsthetic,"
But the "tone was too dreadfully high."

Her lovely face, lit by the splendour
That glorified landscape and sea,
Woke thoughts that were daring and tender:—
Did her thoughts, too, rest upon me?

"Oh, tell me," I cried, growing bolder,
"Have I in your musings a place?"
"Well, yes," she said, over her shoulder
"I was thinking of nothing in space."

In "The Heart of the Weed" (Nora Perry) are many charming songs, the space devoted to sonnets and the French metrical forms being very noticeable, for of those poets noted thus far none have touched the triolet, rondeau, or ballade, so popular in America to-day; but quotation is impossible. So, too, of "Clover Leaves" (Ella M. Baker), a garland of poesy gathered after the singer had joined the choir invisible.

And here perforce this first chapter must end, full of omissions, since poets like Edith W. Thomas, Lucy Larcom, Mrs. Fields, Mrs. Phelps, Julia Ward Howe, H.H. (Helen M. F. Jackson) Mrs. Mapes Dodge, and many another are omitted; but it is only want of space, not want of heart, nor lack of admiration for these and dozens of others that curtails the notice. In Stedman's "Poets of America" an ungallant critic is quoted who has a fling "at the plague of American authoresses;" satiety we know is apt to produce disgust, yet it proves only that too much of a good thing cannot be taken at once, not that too much is good for nothing. But conscious already of having exceeded the limit, the rest of the women singers of America cannot be even named here; fortunately every fresh shipment of the American magazines, that have so quietly but surely won a wide circle of friends in the mother country, brings echo of their melody to our shores, while to those who are not in the habit of perusing those periodicals, this brief foretaste may whet the appetite for the plentiful feast that awaits them.

VARIETIES.

THE COUNTRYMAN IN LONDON.

A native of Cumberland, who was the very mouthpiece of eloquence in his own county, visited London about half a century ago. When there he inquired at a shoemaker's shop for a pair of small shoes for his little girl at home, with pink heels, pointed toes, and cropt straps for clasps, which he expressed in the following provincial dialect:—

"I pray yee noo, han yee gatten any neatly, feetly shoen, poainted toen, pink'd at heel and cropped stroops for clposes?"

"Sir," answered the shopkeeper, "what's that you say?"

"Why, I pray yee noo" [repeats as before].

"The family who speak French," said the shoemaker, "live next door."

SEEKING WHAT IS GOOD.—"I always," says the mother of the great Goethe, "seek out what is good in people, and leave what is bad to Him who made mankind, and knows how to round off the angles."

AFTER MARRIAGE.

A poetical woman, who found the cords of Hymen not so silky as she expected, once gave vent to her feelings in the following touching stanzas. The penultimate line is peculiarly comprehensive and expansive:

"When I was young I used to earn
My living without trouble;
Had clothes and pocket-money too,
And hours of pleasure double.

"I never dreamed of such a fate,
When I, a lass, was courted—
Wife, mother, nurse, seamstress, cook, housekeeper, chambermaid, laundress, dairywoman, and scrub generally, doing the work of six or the sake of being supported."

TEMPERANCE AND EXERCISE.—Temperance makes the faculties clear, and exercise makes them vigorous; it is temperance and exercise united that can alone ensure the fittest state for mental or bodily exertion.

CARRYING OFF AN HEIRESS.

Several years ago, when running away to get married at Gretna Green was not an uncommon occurrence, a young man well-known in London went to consult a legal authority of Lincoln's Inn about carrying off an heiress.

"You cannot do it without considerable risk," said the lawyer, "but let her mount a horse and hold the bridle and whip, do you then get up behind her, and you are run away with by her, in which case you are safe."

The next day, the lawyer who gave such good advice found that his own daughter had run away in the aforesaid manner with his client.

RICH AND POOR.—How superior is a poor man with a rich spirit to a rich man with a poor spirit! To borrow the expression of St. Paul, he is "as having nothing and yet possessing all things." While the other presents the melancholy reverse, he is as possessing all things, and yet having nothing.

POULTRY KEEPING :

A RECREATION AND SOURCE OF INCOME FOR GIRLS.

By THEO.

A SILKY HEN.

PART IV.

MORE ABOUT FOOD.

WE have already learnt that if hens are closely confined they will require, after their morning meal, either a sprinkling of hard corn or soft food in the middle of the day; and also a grain meal about twenty minutes before retiring to roost.

The grain used must very much depend upon what the morning meal has been, as hens, like people, appreciate variety, and the right proportion of nutrients must be given. For instance, oats, which are specially rich in flesh-formers, should be given where the morning meal has consisted of potatoes and barley-meal, or some other less nitrogenous food. Do not for weeks together allow the food to be of a very fattening nature, and another time to be far too rich in flesh-formers. Oats, wheat, buckwheat, barley, &c., are all good, and may be used regularly. Always buy good sound grain, and never be put off with a second quality; in this, as in many other things, the best is the cheapest. Never mix the grains, but keep them separately, and if for any reason this is difficult to manage, only buy small quantities at a time, so as to have a different kind constantly.

In choosing the grains and meals for winter feeding, select those that show the largest proportion of warmth-giving material, such as wheat, barley, oatmeal. Indian corn, that favourite food to which the majority of hens are doomed, I have left out, because not only do fowls fed constantly upon it become lined internally with layers of coarse, yellow fat, but they are also rendered extremely liable to liver disease. As Indian corn is very warmth-giving, a little may be used in the winter months where the lighter breeds are kept, but the heavier breeds, such as Brahmas, Cochins, Dorkings, Langshans, etc., should never even be allowed to look at it.

All these grains and meals, although given as judiciously as possible, will not supply all the flesh-forming material which the hen needs for herself and her eggs, unless she eats such a quantity of them that she accumulates an excess of fats and other ingredients at the same time.

Now all over-feeding and disproportionate feeding is bad, entailing both useless labour on the part of the hen and loss to the owner, so care must be taken that the flesh-formers are given in some other form. Animal food is what makes up the deficiency. Fowls with a grass run require but little animal food given them in the summer, as they find it for themselves in the form of worms, slugs, and insects of all kinds; but during the winter months they must be regularly supplied with it. Where hens are in confinement, however, great care must be taken in this matter, or the egg-basket will be very scanty.

Where but few hens are kept enough can generally be provided from the house scraps, if all are jealously kept. These scraps should be cut up and given with the soft food in the morning, or else they may be given last thing at night after the corn. I here only, of course, speak of literal scraps, not of large pieces of wasted meat, which should never be found in any well-ordered household, and which if given ad libitum to the hens would kill them off in apoplexy in early youth. I may add, in passing, that nothing delights a hen more than to be allowed to pick the bones of her late comrades.

If there be no meat scraps, or not sufficient for the quantity of hens kept, some other meat must be provided not less than four times a week, and it is better to have a little daily.

Granulated meats advertised are good and are easier to use than livers, refuse meats, etc., but these latter, together with fish, are very good if they are well cooked and cut up small.

Spratt's Patent Meat Crissel is convenient, and a tablespoonful daily in the soft food will keep six hens in health.

Where hens cannot get at grass, green food must be provided fresh daily. Cabbages and lettuces are greatly relished, and should be hung up high in the run for the fowls to peck at.

Where there is no garden to provide these, an arrangement might be made with the family greengrocer to supply refuse vegetables. All green food must be fresh daily, as it so soon gets stale, and care must be taken to remove all old stalks, etc., from the run, as these soon decay and quite spoil the appearance of a nice, well-kept run.

Mr. Cook, in his "Poultry Breeder and Feeder," gives some excellent suggestions as to how to provide green food, among which are the following: Nettles, dandelions, watercress, a mangold-wurtzel or turnip cut in half in the winter. "Those who live in towns can grow rape, mustard, or maize. These can be grown in boxes with a little earth or manure, and must be well watered; the seeds spring up very quickly, and by having seven boxes, and sowing every day, there is a daily supply of green food."

Lawn-cuttings stored in a tarred, air-tight barrel on the silo principle are said to be very good for winter food. I should like to hear of someone that has tried them.

The other two necessities which must not be forgotten are lime for the shells and sulphur for the feathers. The lime is provided by means of well-slaked lime and mortar, or by cockle and oyster shells broken up small. I like cockle shells the best, as they are so easy to break up, and if two or three quarts are broken up small and stored in a tin box, a handful can be put into the soft food daily, thus ensuring the lime getting into the hen's system without the waste which throwing it upon the ground always involves.

Flowers of sulphur supplies the feather-making material, and is most essential during the moulting season. Care must, however, be taken in its use, as if an excess be given during cold, damp weather, it will be sure to give the hens cold. A slight sprinkling in the soft food three or four times a week, choosing the bright days, will be quite sufficient.

Before closing this part of the subject let me reiterate my principles, which, if followed out, will yield success to the enterprising poultry keeper:—

Regular, judicious feeding, with a good proportion of flesh-formers, careful mixing (very hot in winter), clean water, sharp grit, abundance of green food, and a good supply of lime.

Perhaps by this time my readers are becoming naturally anxious as to the question of profit in the poultry enterprise. The idea that poultry, however kept, must always fail, is, I hope, rapidly passing away. It has not quite gone, for many are the warnings that will come upon the devoted henwife; and even since beginning this series of papers I have been seriously asked how I can think of encouraging the readers of the "G.O.P." to embark in like folly! Nevertheless, I think it may be fairly stated that any hens kept properly will pay a fair percentage, which will increase considerably in proportion to the experience and interest of the owner.

The title of our paper is "Poultry Keeping as a Recreation and Source of Income." The "recreation" must come first; for unless the hens are a pleasure and interest they will never succeed to be a "source of income." For it must be acknowledged that there are few pursuits which need such personal attention on the part of the owner, as is shown by the fact that hens left to the management of inexperienced servants or happy-go-lucky younger brothers and sisters for any length of time will never pay, but will, on the contrary, lose considerably. I would therefore again ask my readers to think what they are doing, and not to attempt more than they themselves can see through.

A few hens kept well will succeed much better than a larger number perhaps crowded together and left pretty much to themselves, getting diseases which the owner, through lack of time, cannot attend to.

The "going away" question is an important one, for no girl stays at home always, nor should we wish her to do so even for the sake of the hens!

The best thing to do under these circumstances is to train someone of the household into the necessary work while at home, and then when going away to leave everything clean and complete, plenty of food in stock.

GAME FOWLS.

etc., besides giving clear, simple directions to the one left in charge. A kind, interested servant or an enthusiastic younger sister will often manage perfectly; but should there still be a slight loss it may be put down to holiday expenses.

Dorkings.—These birds are exceedingly popular in the market on account of their excellent table qualities. They have beautiful white flesh, and an abundance of breast meat and white legs, which latter is quite a consideration to London poulterers. These birds are of a square build, and have short unfeathered legs; they are specially large in size, the coloured variety being larger than the silver-grey, cuckoo, and white.

Dorkings are considered difficult to rear, and certainly do not thrive in close confinement, though with a grass run they do well.

They are excellent sitters and mothers, but should not be kept where eggs are an object, as they are but moderate layers.

Any girl, however, living in a warm situation, wishing to try her hand at spring chickens, could not have a better pure-bred fowl.

Game.—The word gamecock always brings before our imagination cock-fights with all their attendant horrors, and certainly a gamecock still maintains his superiority over all other fowls in this respect, and a hen will fight an intruder, whoever he may be, who meddles with her brood.

Our illustration shows a dubbed comb (cut off) cock, and this appearance is not for the sake of fashion, but in order that the comb may not be torn in accidental warfare.

Game fowls are splendid table birds, noted for their deep, full breasts, but they are worse layers than the Dorkings, and should not therefore be kept in confinement, or where eggs are required.

Silky fowls are more a fancy show-breed than anything else, and would certainly attract attention at a show, even to the absolute novice, by their strange appearance. The plumage is white and of a light hairy nature, which shines like silk, and the most curious part is, that not only are the comb and wattles of a deep purplish blue, but the skin and legs are of the same colour, quite giving the impression that the bird is seriously ill, until it is explained that that is the beauty of the creature. I should not advise anyone to attempt profitable poultry-keeping with this extraordinary, though interesting, breed.

The whole question of poultry farming is a vexed one at present, and is not in our province, for the cases we are considering are those where from six to twenty hens are kept by private families, either in close confinement or with a grass run.

It is at once apparent that where there are plenty of house scraps, a few hens will pay better in proportion than a larger number, for scraps cost nothing, but after they are used up all other food must be paid for.

It is usual in calculating expenses to throw the scraps in, but should the energetic henwife wish to proceed in a very business-like way, she may allow the household a few eggs weekly for them; but it should be remembered that she is after all only using up what would be otherwise absolutely wasted food.

In poultry books generally you will often find most startling profit tables, which are really more discouraging than otherwise, especially when the devoted reader finds her first experiences fall so very far short of the promised result. What we want to find out is the fair average profit from average results, and consequently the estimates given below are rather under than above what may be expected; and many readers, under favourable circumstances, will find that in a few years they will be able to do greater things. There are but few royal roads to honest money-making now-a-days, and profit must be the result of steady work, and in proportion to the amount of time expended.

DORKING FOWLS.

The advantage of poultry-keeping is that the time given to it is rescued, as it were, from wasted moments. A few hens need not take up more time than about thirty minutes daily, with an occasional hour given to the work explained in the chapter on houses and runs; and as this work is all in the open air, it is an actual benefit to girls, who but for this occupation would be sitting by the fire, or toiling at work, which they would only do all the better after this healthy change of air and thought; and I am sure that there are few occupations where the time expended would yield the same amount of pleasure, profit, and, above all things, health.

Where more time can be given, and there is a field or orchard at liberty, the henwife can, after her first experience, enlarge her borders and keep more hens and rear chickens, and so provide herself with quite a nice addition to her "pin money." Profit depends upon so many things—such as cost of food, market price of eggs, etc.—that no two experiences can be alike. Hens cost in food from 1d. to 2d. per head weekly, according to the number kept, and whether they have the use of a grass run and house scraps.

I do not take into account the original cost of house and run, as that must be considered as capital laid down which must be made to realise its interest. A yearly depreciation of the house and utensils, etc., must be also allowed for.

Let us take first the case of a few common fowls kept in confinement, where scraps are available:—

Six pullets at 3s. 6d.	£	s.	d.
Food at 6d. per week	1	1	0
Depreciation of house, etc.	1	6	0
			0	8	0

Profit	2	15	0
			1	7	0

840 eggs at 1d.	£	s.	d.
Value of birds at end	3	10	0
			0	12	0

Twelve good first-class pullets with grass run and house scraps.

Twelve pullets at 5s.	£	s.	d.
Food at 1s. 4d. per week	3	0	0
Depreciation of house, etc.	3	9	4
			0	12	0

Profit	7	1	4
			2	4	8

1,800 eggs	£	s.	d.
Value of birds	7	10	0
			1	16	0

These profits may be decreased by unforeseen misfortune, such as death and disease, which latter, however, seldom visits a well-kept small yard.

I should now like to show you a few ways in which these profits may be increased. Be very economical with the food, for remember that 1d. per week wasted means 4s. 4d. less profit in the year.

Never neglect the fowls in bad weather because it is unpleasant to yourself to go out. Always have a supply of pullets in the autumn, hatched not later than April 1st, so that you may have winter eggs, which realise such high prices.

Eggs during the spring and early summer are very plentiful, and fall in price from 14 to 18 for a shilling. They should then be preserved in lime and kept until the dear season, when they are perfectly good for cooking and even poaching, and can be sold for from 10 to 12 for a shilling.

When the stock is reared at home the expense will be still further decreased, especially where the more expensive breeds are kept; as for 12 pullets, about 24 chickens must be hatched, and the price realised by selling off the cockerels will just about balance the cost of the whole set, up to four or five months old.

A lady told me the other day that she had made £17 the first year that she kept hens. She lived near London, and kept 20 hens in a small run and no grass. She had plenty of scraps, and sold her eggs at 2d. each all the year round, and her chickens, etc., at 3s. each.

Our illustrations this month are of some of the less important breeds from an egg-production point of view, though they are some of the very best table birds.

FOR LOVE ALONE.

By LAURA L. PRATT, Author of "Plucked from the Burning," "Burton Brothers," etc.

CHAPTER III.

"NOT YOURS, BUT YOU."

MIRIAM stood before the glass in her room, fastening a crimson rose at her throat. She tried it first one way and then another, and finally dashed it down on the dressing-table. The next moment she took it up tenderly and put it in a glass of water.

"I won't wear a flower at all," she murmured, half aloud, "Oh, if I had only been a little bit pretty! Nothing looks well on me."

It was not merely petty conceit that caused her to utter this wish. The greatest longing in her heart was to please; not in itself a bad wish, but likely in her case to lead to bad results, because she was wholly looking and longing only for things external to make her pleasing. She had yet to learn that an utter forgetfulness of self is the surest way to please. At present self was always in her way.

She was dissatisfied with her appearance, and went downstairs to join her cousin, with her eyebrows drawn together in such a frown as to cause Herbert injudiciously to exclaim—

"Why, Miriam, what has put you out? You look as cross as two sticks."

"Never mind me. You needn't look at me," was the irritable answer.

Margaret, who was a great tennis player, was suitably dressed in white flannel, and was to return home to change her dress for the evening, when the game was over.

Miriam's discontent faded away before Hope Maxwell's cordial greeting. She looked a very vision of loveliness. Tennyson's words came to Miriam's mind as she gazed at her—

"A daughter of the gods;
Divinely tall,
And most divinely fair."

She was dressed in a soft creamy lace dress, with yellow roses at her throat. She had come across the lawn to meet them. When Herbert had shaken hands and walked on, and the three girls were alone, Hope kissed Margaret warmly; then, turning to Miriam, she kissed her also, saying—

"You must let me treat you as I do Margaret."

Miriam, as usual, made no response, but had Hope looked at her she would have been surprised to have seen tears in her eyes.

The grounds were very extensive, covering many acres, and beautifully wooded with grand old trees. The gardens were tastefully laid out and brilliant with flowers. Miriam was led off to the tennis ground, and Hope, who was not playing, sat down by her to watch the game. The conversation for some time was about the games and the merits of the players, but a remark of Miriam's led to more serious subjects.

"All games seem to me to be very much like life," she said: "victory to the strong, and defeat to the weak."

A grave look came across Hope's bright face. "Don't you remember we are told that the battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift?"

Miriam gave an impatient little shrug.

"Yes, I know; but don't we see that it is not so?"

"We are not permitted to see everything clearly here."

Miriam looked round on the beautiful grounds, and then back to the fine old house, with its broad terraces hung with roses, and its many windows glistening in the sunlight.

Then, without stopping to think, she gave utterance to the thought that was so often in her mind.

"I wonder, if all this were taken away from you, whether you would be as good then as they say you are now?"

Hope's fair face grew crimson.

"I am not good now," she said, gently; "but of this I am sure—our Lord will give strength to bear trials when He sends them, and I am content to leave all in His hands. Have you already heard that we may have to leave our dear old home?"

It was Miriam who reddened this time, but a feeling of shame caused her to blush. How unfeeling her words must have sounded to her companion! She turned to her and said, earnestly—

"Indeed I had not an idea that you were thinking of leaving the Grange." Then after a moment's pause she added, awkwardly—

"I am sorry if I have hurt you."

Hope smiled.

"Oh, you have not," she said; "but my father has lately lost a great deal of money, and we may have to let the Grange for a time; nothing is settled yet, but—" She broke off abruptly and rose from her seat. "If you will excuse me I must go to my father; I am afraid he has bad news."

While they had been talking, Colonel Maxwell had been standing a few yards from them watching the tennis players.

As he stood there a servant came from the house, with a telegram on a small silver waiter, which he handed to the Colonel. Hope was looking at her father, and she saw him take the envelope in his hand, and carelessly open it, talking to a young man near him as he did so. He glanced at it, and immediately a change came over his face. He almost staggered, and then, looking hastily round, as if hoping he had not been observed, he hurried towards the house. Hope followed him. He had gone, as she thought he would, to the library. He was standing by his writing table, one hand resting on it, and his bronzed face was strangely pale. Hope entered so quietly he did not hear her. She stole to his side and put her arm through his.

"Dear father," she whispered, "what is it?"

He started, and crushed the telegram in his hand.

"My darling, go away, will you. I—I—must be alone to think."

"Don't send me away, father dear; let me think with you; if it is bad news let me share your trouble; we have always shared everything, you know, since the day I ran to you to ask you to bring my mother back, and you took me on your knee, here in this very room, and told me that dear mother was with Jesus, and you and I must comfort each other." She laid her fair head on his shoulder, and looking up into his face, said—"Let me comfort you now."

"Oh, my child, my child! Would God you had your mother to comfort you!"

The anguish of his tone and the accent on the last word came like a flash of light to Hope; she raised her head and stood upright before him, her face white to the lips.

"Something has happened to Robert," she said, in a frightened whisper.

Her father only groaned in answer.

"Dear father," she said, "I can bear the truth better than this suspense; please let me read the telegram."

But Colonel Maxwell kept the paper crushed in his hand. The brave soldier, who had many times calmly faced death on the battlefield, could not find courage to tell his daughter that he to whom she had given her heart's deepest love was lying fathoms deep in an Indian marsh, drowned while wild duck shooting.

"Papa, please tell me what has happened," said the soft pleading voice again. "Is Robert—" a pause; then in a whisper she added—"dead?"

"Oh, my darling! perhaps not," exclaimed the Colonel eagerly; even not speaking the truth in his wild desire to impart some comfort.

Little by little, by maintaining outwardly a calm demeanour, Hope drew from her father all that he at present knew of the sad accident. That was little enough. Robert Atherton had gone some way up the country, wild duck shooting, with some fellow-officers. He was a keen sportsman, and had ventured too far on unknown and, as it proved, unsafe ground. Those with him had risked their lives to save him, but all in vain, and he had perished almost before their eyes. This was the brief yet sad news that the telegram contained, adding, "Further particulars to follow by next mail."

Colonel Maxwell knew his daughter too well to be deceived by her calmness. There was already a stricken look on her fair young face that made his heart bleed.

The sounds of merry laughter and bright voices came to them from the tennis-lawn. Hope gave a little start.

"I had forgotten," she said. "Will you ask them to go away, please, father? And I should like to be alone a little while."

"I will do just as you wish, but I don't like leaving you, dear," her father answered, looking at her anxiously.

She answered that loving look with a sad little smile.

"You will leave me not quite alone, but with the One whose presence will uphold me."

He kissed her tenderly and left the room.

After leaving his daughter Colonel Maxwell sent a servant with a message to request Herbert Leigh to spare him a few minutes in the drawing-room, and almost immediately Herbert was with him. In him the Colonel found a truly sympathetic listener, and he begged to be allowed to save the Colonel the pain of repeating the sad news to his friends, and to permit him to dismiss them. This kind offer the Colonel gladly accepted, only too thankful to be spared the hard task of telling the sad story again and again. Herbert Leigh went down the sunlit garden in a dream—one thought ever present with him, and yet resolutely determined to put it from him: Hope was free. But what was that to him? Should he not now prove himself her true friend by not thinking of himself at all, but only how to help and comfort her in her bitter sorrow?

He gathered all the guests together on the tennis-lawn, and then briefly told them of the terrible bereavement that had fallen on Colonel Maxwell and his daughter, and within half an hour the house, just before so full of bright, innocent happiness, was left still and silent, its drawn blinds speaking mutely of the grief within.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

COOKERY.

NO NAME.—To make hop yeast for bread, pare four large potatoes, and put them into two quarts of cold water with a double handful of dried hops, tied up in a cloth. Set all on a stove, and let it boil until the potatoes fall to pieces. Take them out with a skimmer and beat them into a paste with four tablespoonfuls of flour and a teaspoonful of sugar. Then add the boiling hops-tea gradually to the paste, stirring well to prevent the yeast being lumpy. Set aside until blood warm, and then add about half a cupful of good yeast. Stir well and put the mixture into a warm place to rise. When the effervescence which will take place has ceased, bottle the yeast, taking care to fill the bottles half full only, as they are liable to burst. We thank the kind contributor of this recipe, whose letter has been accidentally separated from it, so that we cannot give her name.

MISCELLANEOUS.

EMMA THOMPSON.—Giles, or Egidius, was a very eminent saint of the seventh century. He is thought to have been a Greek, who migrated to France, where he became a hermit in a forest in the diocese of Nismes. There is a legend that he was partly dependent on a heaven-directed hind which came daily to give him milk, and that the secret of the hermitage was discovered by the king of the country, who followed the animal in the chase till it took refuge at the feet of St. Giles. In the arms of the City of Edinburgh you will find to-day, acting as a supporter, the legendary hind of 1,200 years ago. St. Giles became the patron of cripples, because, the better to mortify himself from fleshly appetites, he refused to be cured of his lameness; and in ancient days there was a Giles church on the outskirts of every town, on one of the great roads leading to it, that the cripples might conveniently find it. Thus we have in East London St. Giles, Cripplegate. The parish church of Edinburgh was dedicated to St. Giles so early that all trace is lost of the period, and William Preston, of Gorton, when travelling in France, obtained an arm bone of the saint to be placed in the church, and he built an aisle to contain it, and he and his successors were to have the privilege of carrying the arm in all processions. In 1556 the Dean of the Guild in Edinburgh spent 12s. in "mending and polishing Saint Giles arm"; but the change of the Reformation was at hand, and in 1558, when the annual procession came about, on September 1st, it was interrupted by a riot, and the image was burnt, after which we hear no more of the St. Giles processions.

CURIOUS NELL.—No; the tax on bachelors is no longer in force in any European country. Widowers as well as bachelors were taxed by an Act passed in 1695. Single women, of course could never have been taxed for their celibacy, because they cannot marry at will.

ELLA and UNA.—The Book of Psalms, though not all composed by King David, are chiefly by him; and he is pre-eminently distinguished as "the sweet psalmist of Israel," upwards of seventy being attributed to him, if not more. We have no means of ascertaining by whom the majority of the rest were written. A few of them were composed after the return from captivity in Babylon. The Tables of Kindred and Affinity (in reference to forbidden connections by marriage) were drawn up in 1563, by Archbishop Parker, and were "set forth by authority" and made the Law of England, or rather of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

ERIN.—If so patriotic, how is it that you know so little of the ancient history of your native land? Moore, he spoke of "The harp that once through Tara's halls

"The soul of music shed," referred back to a period of from 900 to 950 years before Christ. The ancient kings, princes, bards, and clergy of Ireland made a great hall in a palace built on the hill of Tara, co. Meath, their place of assembly for consultation over the affairs of the nation. In the reign of Cormac the palace was 900 feet square, and no less than 1,000 guests were daily entertained there.

ITA.—Your kind acknowledgment of "religious help received" from our answers to your questions has gratified us much. We are specially anxious to be of use in this particular way.

BLUE EYES.—We do not know of any cure for short sight. It is usually strong sight, and out-looks long sight, which proves some compensation for the inconvenience experienced.

ISOBEL.—Ask continually for Divine help that you may be kept from backsliding. Live from day to day, and do not anticipate evils that may never come. If you rely on your own strength you will fall, but so long as your whole dependence is on the help of the Holy Spirit, contending in prayer, and an earnest effort to glorify God in your heart, words, and works, you will find Divine strength perfected in your weakness.

DOUBTING.—We have no lack of experimental evidence that ours is "a God who hears and answers prayer," and is "a very present help in time of trouble." The circumstance you name is certainly a case in point, and well corroborates the fact. "He is faithful that promised," and prayer (provided that the petition be one "according to His will"), if offered in the all prevailing name and in faith reposed on His own promises, will assuredly be answered. None of those who do not "doubt in their hearts" shall be disappointed of their hope.

LENA.—All nominated or assisted passages for emigrants to the colonies have been stopped. If you desire to emigrate you ought to go out with a sum of money in your pocket, and under the friendly direction of some society. Consult Miss Blake, secretary of the Female Middle-class Emigration Society, 187, Fulham Road, S.W.

FORGET-ME-NOT.—If you "wish to live for God" you must ask Him day by day to help you to rule yourself, your words, acts, thoughts, and temper; to make you obedient and grateful to your parents, and those they may set over you; to be diligent in all the work given you to do, either in the house or in your education; and to be reverent, prayerful, and attentive to reading your Bible. Do all as in the sight of your Saviour, and do all well to please Him. One thing, however, you might do in the way of work outside your own home, and yet without leaving it—you could join the Ministering Children's League. Write to the Rev. — Ridgeway, Vicar of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, W., and he will send you a paper about it. Of course ask your mother's leave to do so.

LETTY has not got the gift of composing poetry. She had better try to improve herself in writing correct English prose, and of mastering the difficulties of spelling.

R. HIGHTON.—It is our rule not to give advertising addresses. You might obtain what you wish (in the way of text decorations, etc.) by going to an ecclesiastical furnishing shop. They would either supply tin, wooden, or cardboard foundations, or painted and illuminated decorations, or inform you where you could obtain them.

SARAH.—Your friend should go to a dental hospital for what she requires. There is one in Great Portland Street, W. They could at least tell you the terms for supplying you.

BELLA can obtain plenty of small manuals for all kinds of letter-writing, if she inquire for them at a bookseller's; but in vol. viii. of the "G.O.P." she will find an excellent series of articles, by James Mason, "Every Girl a Business Woman," containing full instructions.

E. CHAMPION.—Perhaps the Ladies' Home, 53, Abbey Road, St. John's Wood, from 13s. a week (to 16s.) might suit your friend; board, lodging, and medical attendance are included in these terms. There is also a Home for Invalid Ladies at 23, Fitzroy Square, payments various; lady superintendent, Miss Trego. Likewise the Cottage Home of Rest, 2, Tilsey Villas, King's Road, Norbiton station, on S.W.R., close to Richmond Park; terms 7s. a week. Apply for form of admission to Mrs. J. M. Pearson, The Grange, Kingston Hill. At Ramsgate there is a Convalescent Home for Reduced Ladies, at 9, Albion Place; terms 10s. 6d. a week; apply to Miss Bennett.

L. F. B. AFRICANER.—Oakham, the chief town of Rutland, is near the Wreak, a river too small to be mentioned in ordinary geographies, and we think that is the reason that you have not found it.

AN EAGER ONE must take exercise, and wash her face well with soft water and soap, and restrict herself to a light nutritious diet, so as to look rosy and healthy in the face.

A SHOP ASSISTANT.—If the acquaintance be such as to justify the giving and receiving of photographs, there is no harm in doing so, when your mother approves. It has become a general habit, and is no longer a particular favour with a peculiar significance. Still, young women and girls should always be specially careful and modest in all their conversation with men.

SWEET SEVENTEEN.—We do not think there is anything equal to velvetreen as a material for reviving an old dress and making it look well.

HARD WORK.—The drapery of velvetreen would not need lining; of course it would be too heavy.

IGNORANT ONE's poems are not very valuable, but we are sure they give her great pleasure to write. You would say an hotel, a harmony.

A GIRLS' TOUR IN BRITTANY.

CHAPTER IV.

WHILE breakfast was being served, Mme. Gaillard showed us the most curious collection of antiquities found by her husband in connection with the menhirs and dolmens of this strange district. It has only comparatively lately been discovered with certainty, that these monuments of antiquity were used as burial-places, but now human skeletons have been discovered, together with weapons, drinking vessels, implements, gold ornaments and precious stones, all of which seem to have been laid in readiness for the soul's transit to the other world. The skeletons are found in the position in which the men died, there having been no attempt to straighten the limbs; in one case the hand was under the chin as in sleep.

Besides the prehistoric remains, there are the Gallic and also the Roman. M. Gaillard seems to have spent his whole life in the search, and his museum is arranged with great taste; his wife's vivid explanations give a double interest to the whole. We saw a very trumpery presentation to him from "l'Etat," consisting of two glass vases and a plaster bust of Sir Isaac Newton. It is to be hoped the State will make some more adequate recognition of his services in course of time.

The rain was heavier than ever when we started in our chariot (a canopied wagonette), with an inquisitive old French lady for companion. We parted with her at La Trinité, and continued our way towards Lockmariaker. We suddenly heard a shout, "Il n'y a pas moyen," and peeping out beheld a rough and uninviting-looking arm of the sea impeding our course. We were not sorry that the high tide prevented our adventuring ourselves on the ferry, for with the remarkable canopy of our carriage we might easily have been blown over on such a wild day, not to mention the fact that our horse later showed a talent for kicking. So there was nothing to be done but to turn back, and to visit Carnac only.

The rain and mist prevented our obtaining any view from St. Michael's Chapel; driving rain clouds and grey sky seem, however, rather in harmony than otherwise with the two fields of menhirs, which are not unlike graveyards filled with gigantic headstones. Delicately tinted lichens of grey, green, and burning gold, with yellow furze and bright bell-heather, have done their best to remove all trace of gloom; but for all that, the predominating feeling produced in the mind of the visitor to Carnac is one of solemnity and awe, which increase the more one wanders among the stones. At first one does not take in their vast size, extent, and number. They are now under the protection of the State as a "monument historique," and many of the once prostrate menhirs have been set up.

We had for guides a ragged little boy and girl, in whose merry blue eyes and black hair we thought we saw evidence of the cousinhood of the Irish and Breton races. Frequent Atlantic showers compelled us to seek the shelter of our curtained coach, from which we were turned out in a damp condition at various points to inspect dolmens. Perhaps it would be well to give by way of explanation the definition in Murray's handbook of these remains. "A menhir (long stone) is a monolith in the form of a rude obelisk set upright on one end, whose height much exceeds its breadth. A dolmen (stone table) is an arrangement of rude blocks, by which one or more upright stones are made to support a horizontal block or slab. Sometimes the supporting stones are wide slabs, so arranged as to fit close to one another, and so lofty as to allow a man to walk upright beneath the horizontal roofstone which they support. Some of them are sixty or eighty feet long."

We entered several by a long passage half underground, ending in a small square chamber.

But how can one dare to describe Carnac, when Mr. Matthew Arnold has felt and given to the world the very spirit of the place?

"Far on its rocky knoll descried,
Saint Michael's Chapel cuts the sky.
I climb'd; beneath me, bright and wide,
Lay the lone coast of Brittany.

"Bright in the sunset, weird and still,
It lay beside the Atlantic wave,
As though the wizard Merlin's will Yet charm'd it from his forest grave.

"Behind me, on their grassy sweep,
Bearded with lichen, scrawl'd and grey,
The giant stones of Carnac sleep,
In the mild evening of the May.

"No priestly stern procession now Streams through their rows of pillars old;
No victims bleed, no Druids bow—
Sheep make the daisied aisles their fold.

"From bush to bush the cuckoo flies,
The orchis red gleams everywhere;
Gold furze with broom, in blossom vies,
The bluebells perfume all the air.

"And o'er the glistening, lonely land
Rise up all round the Christian spires;
The Church of Carnac by the Strand
Catches the westering sun's last fires.

"And there, across the watery way,
See, low above the tide at flood,
The sickle sweep of Quiberon Bay,
Whose beach once ran with loyal blood!

"And beyond that the Atlantic wide!
All round, no soul, no boat, no hail;
But on the horizon's verge descried,
Hangs, touched with light, one snowy sail."

We returned to Plouharnel, and after rest and refreshment spent the remaining hour or two, before the train for Auray was due, in looking into the church and a small chapel, in which our good landlady informed us there was (what sounded like) "a barrel-roof"; reflecting she would not have expressed herself so clearly in English, we inquired again, and came to the conclusion that she meant a "bas-relief." Having the key handed to us, we duly found two very small bas-reliefs in the lonely little chapel above the beach. They did not detain us long, nor did anything else in the bare little building, which, barring a few tawdry decorations about the altar, might have very well passed for a Methodist chapel.

A small door in the gallery led up into the belfry, and there we rested awhile, letting our eyes wander down Quiberon Peninsula into the mists of the distance where lay the town of Quiberon, Belle Isle, and the bay of the massacred royalists. The peninsula is so flat and so narrow that it seemed as if in a great storm it must be impassable. And yet there is a railway the whole of its ten miles length. Very much we regretted that we had not gone to the town of Quiberon, as was our first intention, and which by economy of time might have been managed in the same day.

We were turned from this intention by some tourists going in a contrary direction from ourselves, who said, "Why go to Quiberon? There is nothing on earth to see when you get there." Whether to anathematise those tourists or be grateful to them is an unsolved problem. Quiberon Peninsula now remains in our memory as a mysterious-looking, precarious roadway, to a misty distance, where is a sea-surrounded town.

In the deepening twilight we turned into the church; its lack of beauty and interest was not visible in the gloom, but the white caps of the kneeling peasant-women were, and just in front of us were three of the White Sisters, whose softly-hanging, cream-coloured robes had delighted us in many a Brittany town before.

On returning to Auray we found the town still en fête. The square was brilliantly illuminated and crowded with people gathered to watch a torchlight procession. Before leaving next morning we drove round by the quay and river, and afterwards to the Convent of the Chartreuse, and to the Champs des Martyrs.

We were rather afraid of missing the half-past nine train, so although Ruth kept exhorting me to feel the emotions suited to the occasion, our hurried scamper across the Champs must have horrified the beggar who was appropriately whining "Ave Marias" at the gate.

At the Convent of the Chartreuse the nuns were at mass, and we were not sorry when our repeated appeals to the bell were unanswered. Our driver was scandalised that we did not show more anxiety to see the deaf and dumb inmates, and the bones of the martyrs. These last were the 4,000 emigrés who were treacherously shot, after laying down arms under promise of their lives, on the collapse of the ill-fated expedition to Quiberon in 1795.

We reached Vannes in half an hour by train, and at once repaired to the Hotel de France, and asked for a carriage to take us to the Peninsula of Rhuys. The rain had now passed off, and the day promised to be lovely. We were strongly advised to take a pair of horses, for the distance there and back would be about forty-four miles. As our expenses so far had been very moderate, we thought we would indulge in this unwonted luxury, and pay the 25 francs asked. (In our thirty-one days' absence we had spent about £18 each.) We soon left the quaint old town of Vannes behind, and crossed the first arm of the Morbihan Sea, which runs inland like a river. We had read in Mrs.

A BRETON.

Macquoid's book that on our route we should pass a cemetery, where were to be seen the little skull-boxes into which, after a certain time, the skulls of interred persons are placed, with the inscription, "Ci-git la tête de Monsieur" So-and-So. Our driver knew of no cemetery, still less of the skull-boxes, but at the first sight of a graveyard we insisted on alighting. Instead of the boxes we discovered a repulsive bone-house. Our driver must have been horrified at the ghastly tastes of Les Anglaises when, on passing a little cemetery an hour later, we again renewed our quest, with the same result. Evidently the little boxes (described as being like tiny dogs' kennels) have become too costly a luxury for the present generation, though the bone-house is still used.

As we pursued our way we soon began to feel the fresh breeze of the Atlantic, and to catch glimpses of its exquisite blue waters. By-and-by the ruined castle of Sucinio appeared in sight, the ancient pleasure palace of the dukes of Brittany, as its name "Souey n'y ot" indicates. It has figured again and again in history since its construction in 1250. A century later an English garrison occupied it, and was put to the sword by Du Guesclin. It must have been a magnificent structure, but gains nothing by its position, which is little raised above the shore.

Two bare-footed girls conducted us by perilous paths along the walls and to the tops of two of the towers, from whose dizzy but unfenced heights we took furtive glances at the magnificent view. It was not only our exalted position that made us uncomfortable, but the fact that the remains of the machicolated walls are built with deep perpendicular openings at short intervals, through which one catches glimpses of the depths below, and down which it would be exceedingly easy to slip, while clinging to the crumbling ramparts for support. It was through such apertures that Jeanne la Flamme and other heroines of history poured boiling oil on their assailants.

Continuing our drive by way of Sarzeau to St. Gildas we noticed vineyards for the first time since coming into France. Buckwheat (blé noir or sarazin) was less frequent, and the roadside crucifix was supplanted by innumerable stone crosses. We saw a very primitive method of winnowing corn, which illustrated the phrase, "The chaff which the wind driveth away." A man and a girl were standing on a small common, where the corn had evidently been thrashed; the girl handed the corn to the man, who stood on a low stool with his back to the wind, holding in his hand a coarse sieve. As the corn dropped through, the chaff was blown away, and the good grain fell to the ground.

The spinning wheel and distaff are most familiar objects in Brittany, and all the women and girls seem able to do the most elaborate knitting as they walk along, or drive the cattle home.

Except for its associations there is nothing very striking about St. Gildas, but for all that we longed to spend a week or two at the convent, with the sweet-faced sisters, wandering in their ancient garden, and drinking in health and strength from the Atlantic wave. They entertained us with coffee and bread and butter, and told us that they take in boarders, five francs each per day, for sea bathing (ladies, children, and married couples). As one of the nuns showed us their graveyard with the ages eighty-five and eighty-seven occurring often on the small wooden crosses, she remarked, "On n'est pas souvent malade ici."

The convent was originally a monastery, founded in the sixth century by St. Gildas, one of the many emigrant saints sent by Great Britain to Brittany. At his death the Cornish monks tried to claim his bones, which were, however, miraculously removed to prevent contention. In the twelfth century Abelard became abbot, but his gentle rule was ineffectual in restraining the wild manners and vicious habits of the monks, and he had at length to escape for his life. He wrote to Heloise, "I inhabit a barbarous country, the language of which is unknown and horrible to me; I deal only with a savage people, my walks are by the inaccessible shores of a wild sea; my monks know no other rule than that of having none."

While Ruth sketched, I was taken into the one shop of the village by its vivacious proprietress. As she remarked, "Ici mademoiselle on trouve un peu de tout." She told me that St. Gildas has been a bathing-place for thirty years, and that since "les Bonnes Sœurs" had taken in pensionnaires "il venait beaucoup d'Anglais." One family came two years ago, who lived for several months in a carriage on the seashore. The old woman had been inside it, and described it as fitted up with every luxury. The family consisted of several persons, including the grandparents; they had as well a small carriage, drawn by one horse, and a boat of such length that the cart which brought it could not turn round in the "Place." When the procession first arrived, headed by the travelling carriage, with four horses, it caused the greatest excitement in the primitive village. As my informant said— "Moi, je croyais que c'était un cirque. Ah, c'était une famille bien, bien riche, les messieurs étaient jolis, et les dames très aimables; ils ont beaucoup acheté chez moi."

At the end of our chat I bought for three sous each two models of the beautifully-shaped jugs used in the north of Brittany, and on our way home we first saw the most classic shape of all borne on a woman's head.

On the return drive we called at Sarzeau to see the house where Le Sage was born in 1688. Its owner, the mayor, was away, so we could not obtain admittance; but we looked through the keyhole of the garden-door, and gained a general impression of a very old-fashioned house standing back in a high-walled garden.

The pleasantest part of our day was the drive home. The tide was in, and the Morbihan Sea looked much larger. As we drove along the low-lying peninsula, with the sun fast reaching its setting, we caught glimpses of the Atlantic on our right hand, while the little inland sea, bristling with islands, its shores fringed with salt-works, lay on our left. By-and-by we lost sight of the ocean, and came nearer the coast of the Morbihan. The sky was flaming with gold and crimson, subdued by heavy clouds, the islands lay dark and sombre amid the brilliant colours reflected in the water, and every now and then a clump of trees, a windmill, or a church spire broke the level lines of the shore.

We spent the next morning in wandering about the ancient town of Vannes, the history of which dates from the time when Cæsar came in person, his ships having leathern sails, to subdue the unruly Veneti (Vannetais). It has indeed been asserted by historians that at a still earlier period Vannes colonised the Adriatic, and gave her name to the Venetians. It occupied a prominent part in the stirring history of Brittany in later days.

The streets are narrow and irregular, parts of the old city walls with three gateways still exist, as well as the Tour du Connétable, where Oliver Clisson was treacherously imprisoned in 1387.

We left Vannes at three o'clock, and had our first uncomfortable journey—to Nantes. Having lost a sovereign during our travels, it occurred to us to recoup ourselves by "the negative process" of spending less; so we took third-class tickets, a mistake never to be repeated.

FEBRUARY THE FOURTEENTH.

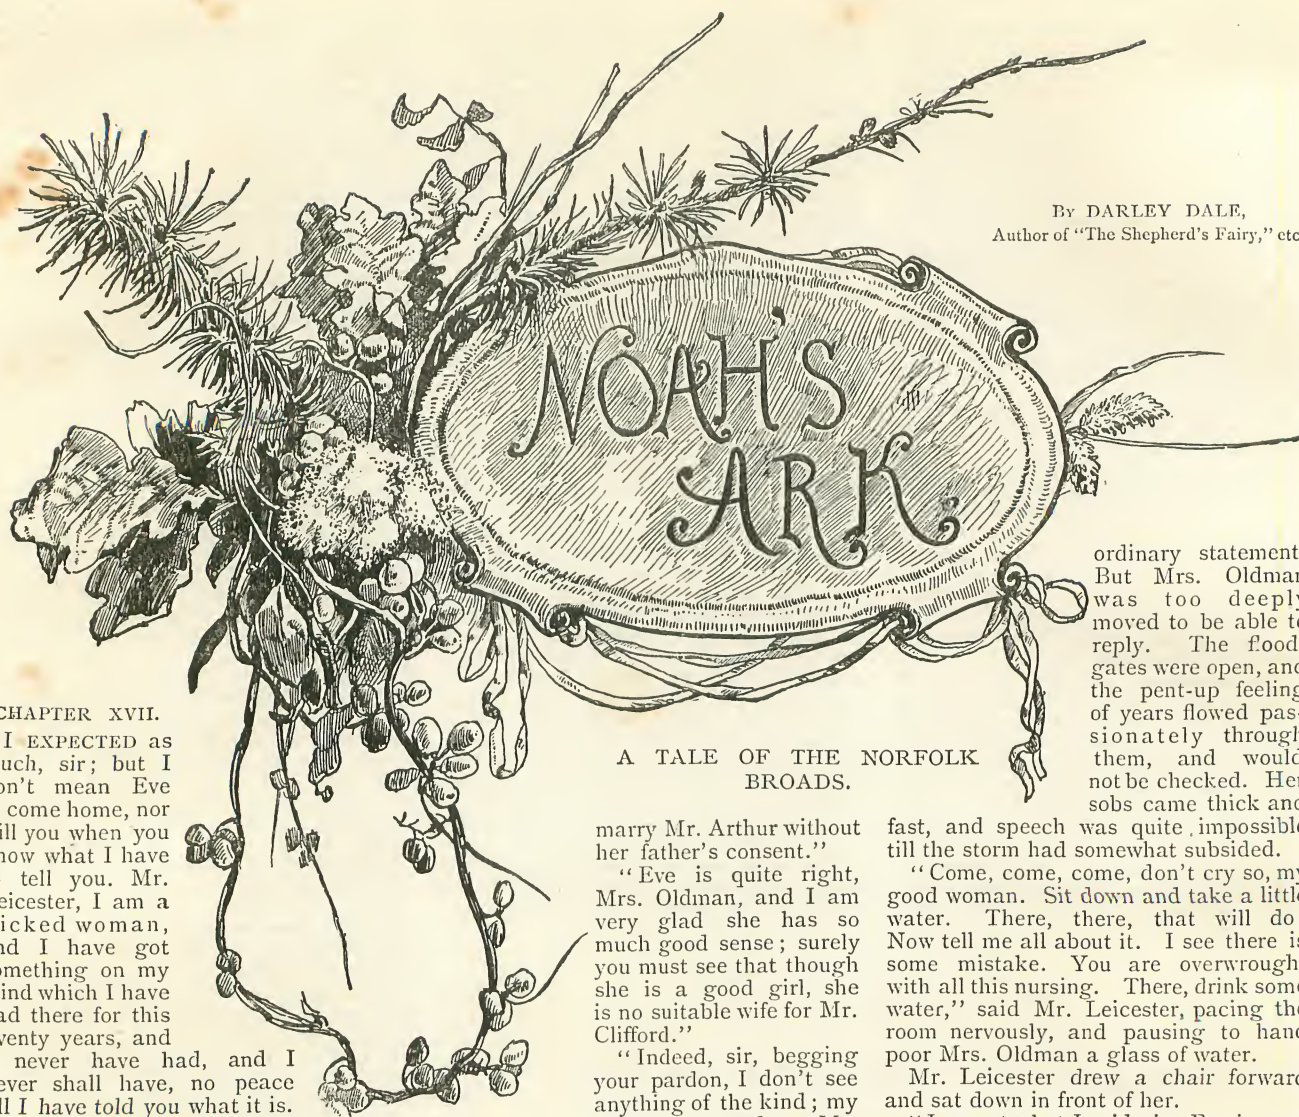

By HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

A MAIDEN went a-roaming
Arrayed in kirtle green,
With sunbeams bright illuming
Her hair of golden sheen;
And in the woodland mazes,
And in the meadow grass,
The buttercups and daisies
Woke up to see her pass.

An idle youth was strolling
Beside the grassy way,
In mellow accents troling
This sweet and tender lay—
"The little birds are mating
In every bower and tree;
I trow some lass is waiting
To be a mate for me!"

The lass in green came dancing
Adown the verdant glade,
And met the lad advancing—
Oh, happy youth and maid!
The last fair snowdrops waited
Their wedding bells to ring,
When gay young Love was mated
With sweet and smiling Spring!

CHAPTER XVII.

"I EXPECTED as much, sir; but I don't mean Eve to come home, nor will you when you know what I have to tell you. Mr. Leicester, I am a wicked woman, and I have got something on my mind which I have had there for this twenty years, and I never have had, and I never shall have, no peace till I have told you what it is. But if Noah was to know it he'd never forgive me. Indeed, I believe it would break his heart; so please, sir, before I tell you what it is, promise you won't tell my old man. I should never dare to face him if he knew."

Mr. Leicester's manner changed. The visit was evidently not an ordinary one; she had come to consult him on a spiritual matter, and the peace she sought was the peace it was his duty to enable her to obtain.

"My good woman, you may be quite sure that anything you may tell me in confidence I shall regard as sacred, though it may be my duty to advise you to tell your husband."

"I could not do it, sir, not if you told me my soul depended on it. How I am going to tell you I don't know. Twenty years have I kept this secret, and many is the night I have laid awake thinking of it, but the longer I kept it the harder it was to tell; and then I saw Mr. Arthur was after Eve, and I winked at it, and I thought he would have married her, and then there would not have been any need to tell anyone; but that wasn't to be; that Farrar must put his finger in the pie, and a nice hash he made of it, and now here is Eve says she'll never marry Mr. Arthur without her father's consent."

"Eve is quite right, Mrs. Oldman, and I am very glad she has so much good sense; surely you must see that though she is a good girl, she is no suitable wife for Mr. Clifford."

"Indeed, sir, begging your pardon, I don't see anything of the kind; my Eve is as good as Mr.

Arthur—b'ess his handsome face!—any day," said Mrs. Oldman, nervously plaiting and unplaiting the border of her pocket-handkerchief.

"My good woman, it is not a question of goodness; surely your own common sense must tell you that—that, in short, Mr. Clifford's wife must be a lady by birth and education, and although I know Eve has had as good an education as my own daughter, her humble parentage makes her an impossible wife for Mr. Clifford."

"May I make so bold as to ask if you would consider Miss Grace a suitable wife for Mr. Arthur, sir?" said Mrs. Oldman, rising from her seat and clasping her hands in front of her over the now limp handkerchief.

"My daughter? A Leicester marry a Clifford? Why, of course I should! My daughter might marry a peer of the realm," said Mr. Leicester, whose besetting sin was pride of birth.

"Then, sir, Eve may very well marry Mr. Clifford, for she is your daughter, and that's the truth!" And with this Mrs. Oldman burst into a flood of tears.

Mr. Leicester sprang to his feet, and turning very pale, haughtily demanded to know what she meant by this extraordinary statement. But Mrs. Oldman was too deeply moved to be able to reply. The flood-gates were open, and the pent-up feeling of years flowed passionately through them, and would not be checked. Her sobs came thick and fast, and speech was quite impossible till the storm had somewhat subsided.

"Come, come, come, don't cry so, my good woman. Sit down and take a little water. There, there, that will do! Now tell me all about it. I see there is some mistake. You are overwrought with all this nursing. There, drink some water," said Mr. Leicester, pacing the room nervously, and pausing to hand poor Mrs. Oldman a glass of water.

Mr. Leicester drew a chair forward and sat down in front of her.

"I meant what I said, sir; Eve is your child, and Miss Grace is Noah's and mine," said Mrs. Oldman between her sobs.

"But it is impossible; you can't mean what you are saying."

"I do, sir, begging your pardon; it is true; Eve is Miss Leicester. Oh, sir, for the love of God, forgive a poor, wicked, vain old woman. I changed the babies when I had yours, which is Eve, to nurse." And once again her voice became inaudible for sobs.

Mr. Leicester began to realise that the woman was speaking the truth, though he could not yet grasp all that her news involved. Her grief, genuine as it was, irritated him, for it prevented her from answering his questions.

"Mrs. Oldman," he said, firmly, but kindly, "this is a very grave matter; try to control your feelings sufficiently to tell me what proof you have that this is true, and what led you to do so wrong and cruel an act."

This appeal took effect; and mastering her feelings, Mrs. Oldman crossed her hands in her lap, and sitting bolt upright, said, in a voice continually broken by sobs—

"If you please, sir, it was like this: When your baby was brought to me it was delicate, and my own was strong and healthy, so Noah insisted I should bring ours up by hand; but after a few weeks my baby grew thin and yours was as strong and healthy as you could wish to see, so without telling Noah I weaned your child and took my own again. I had no thoughts then of changing the children, till one day Noah came in suddenly and sees your child taking the bottle, and he asks me very sharply what I meant by weaning it. 'Bless your heart, Noah,' says I; 'why, don't you know your own child when you sees it? That is Eve,' says I. And Noah he leans over the cradle and looks hard at the child, and the little thing clasped hold of his finger and laughed at him, and says he, 'Well, I shall never make a mistake again, Mary. I shall know the child among a thousand by her eyes and her smile.' I had only told a fib to avoid a scolding, but I knew if Noah found out that I had told him a lie, it would almost break his heart, so I made up my mind I must stick to it, and as soon as he was gone out I changed the children's clothes, and dressed my baby in all Miss Grace's things, and called her Miss Grace, and I put my baby's clothes on your child, and called her Eve."

"It can't be, it cannot be! You must have been found out. Someone would have recognised the children," said Mr. Leicester, unwilling to believe the truth of her confession.

"No one would, except the doctor. All babies are very much alike, sir. He was the only person I was afraid of, and, luckily for me, the children did not want him till they were vaccinated, and then he did not notice, though he and I could prove Miss Grace is my child any day by a birth-mark she has on her left shoulder."

"Then I understand you changed them before they were baptised, so that if your story be true, Grace is really Grace, but your child, and Eve is Eve, but my daughter?"

"Yes, that is the solemn truth, sir, if I was never to speak another word."

"And what do you suppose Noah would say to this if he knew it?"

"Oh, sir, my old man would never forgive me; for mercy's sake, don't tell him."

"I will not, unless you give me permission. I promised you I would not, and I will keep my promise; but have you ever thought what a cruel piece of injustice you have been guilty of to your own child as well as to mine? Grace, as I must continue to call her, not only loves me as her father, but has been a most loving daughter, a most dutiful child to me. Just think what a cruel blow it would be to her to tell her that she is not my child but only an eel-catcher's, though that eel-catcher is a far better man than I can ever hope to be. Why, it is enough to kill her; and this much I shall insist on, she must never know it. As my own child I have hitherto loved and regarded her; as my own daughter I shall continue to treat her. But we must think of Eve as well as of Grace; it is hard to say which you have wronged the most, your child or mine."

"I have been a good mother to Eve, sir; if she had been my own child I could not have loved her more; and now if she is allowed to marry Mr. Arthur, perhaps after all there won't have been so much wrong done to her. Not that I am making any excuses for myself—far be it from me to do so," sobbed Mrs. Oldman.

"She must marry Arthur, and at once too; there is no doubt about that, though I don't see my way to it at present. My good woman, you will be quite ill if you go on crying in this way. Just go into the kitchen and have some dinner, while I think over what you have told me, and consider what is to be done."

And as Mr. Leicester spoke, he rang the bell and told the servant to take Mrs. Oldman into the kitchen and give her some dinner, as she was worn out with nursing her daughter; and then he sat down to think what he ought to do. Many men under similar circumstances would have been inclined to doubt the truth of Mrs. Oldman's story, but much as he wished to do so, Mr. Leicester could not doubt it. She evidently spoke the truth. Eve was his daughter, though unless Arthur Clifford had fallen in love with her and unless Jack Farrar had intercepted their elopement, he would probably never have known it. Still, though in his heart he firmly believed the story, he wished for some confirmation of it, and the first problem he had to solve was how to get this without rousing Grace's suspicions. If he could discover that she had any peculiar mark on her left shoulder, there would no longer be the shadow of a doubt, and he now remembered he had never seen Grace in a low dress. Was this the reason? He must find out. They were going to a dinner party at the Bishop's palace one day that week; he would ask Grace what she was going to wear, and perhaps incidentally the information he wanted would crop up; so he went to the drawing-room in search of her.

"Do you want luncheon, father? It is rather early yet."

"No, my dear. What day is the Bishop's dinner party?"

"Next Monday."

"What are you going to wear, Grace? It will be a grand affair, I suppose."

"That white lace dress of mine you are so fond of."

"It is a high dress, isn't it?"

"No, dear; it is what we call square, open in front and high at the back."

"Is that correct, Grace? Shouldn't it be low for full dress?"

"I suppose it should; but I never wear low dresses, father. If you think it matters, let us send an excuse. I don't care to go, and I daresay you are right; I ought to be in full dress."

"Then order a proper dress, dear. I'll give you a blank cheque," said Mr. Leicester, inwardly hating himself for beating about the bush in this style.

Grace coloured deeply as she answered—

"I could not wear a low dress if I had one, father; there is a large mark on my left shoulder, which would show if I did."

There was no doubt now; Mrs. Oldman's story was true; Grace was not his child; but vexation at the pain he had caused her by his method of discovering the truth prevented him for the moment from realising it.

"I beg your pardon, my darling. Wear what you like; you are always becomingly dressed. I shall want you in my study after luncheon. I want to speak to you about Arthur. Just send me in some sandwiches; I am very busy this morning."

Nevertheless, busy as he was, Mr. Leicester spent the next three-quarters of an hour in pacing his study, during which time he disposed of the sandwiches and decided on the course to be pursued. Then he sent for Mrs. Oldman, who, refreshed by hot mutton, was better able to control her feelings than during her previous interview.

"Well, Mrs. Oldman, I have decided that Eve must not return to the ark; she must be married at once to Mr. Clifford; I will marry them, and if Noah can be persuaded to give her away, so much the better."

"He'll never do that, sir; he will never consent to the marriage, unless he is told Eve isn't his child; I know him so well," said Mrs. Oldman, with a sigh.

"Then there is only one thing to be done; you must tell him. I strongly advise you to do this, not only for Eve's sake, but for your own also. You have deceived him grievously for more than twenty years, and you will not find peace until you have confessed it to him."

"I daren't, sir; I could never have the face to tell Noah that tale; the words would choke me."

"But what is to be done? If he won't consent he must be told. I'll see him at once, and do all I can to get his consent; but if I fail—"

"Then tell him all the truth, sir, please, and I must bear his anger the best way I can."

"Very well, so let it be; and now I have no time to lose, for Grace has promised to drive over this afternoon for Eve. I must have it out with Noah before she starts. Just send her to me, will you? and then I'll go over to the ark and see if I can catch your husband. You had better say nothing to Eve till you see me again, nor to Mr. Clifford if you see him."

Mrs. Oldman made no reply, perhaps because she knew she didn't mean to obey this last injunction, so she curtsied and retired in silence.

"It is all right with parson, sir; I knew it would be when once I had seen him; it is only my old man now that has to be won over, and Mr. Leicester is going to do his best with him; but Noah is a masterful spirit, so I am far from thinking we have won the day yet," was her greeting to Arthur Clifford when he met her, as arranged between them, to drive her back to Eve.

"Mrs. Oldman, you are a witch. How did you manage to convert my guardian?"

But on this point Mrs. Oldman chose to keep her own counsel.

OUR BESSIE.

CHAPTER XVI.

A NOTE FROM HATTY.

BESSIE knew that she should find Edna in her mother's dressing-room—a large, comfortable room, much used by both mother and daughter when they were tired or indisposed. Mrs. Sefton generally used it as a morning-room, and it was fitted up somewhat luxuriously.

Bessie found Edna lying on a couch in her white tea-gown, with a novel in her hand. The pink shade of the lamp threw a rosy glow over everything, and at first sight Bessie thought she looked much as usual; her first words, too, were said in her ordinary tone.

"So you have found your way up at last," she exclaimed, throwing down her book with an air of disgust and weariness; "my head ached this afternoon, and so mamma thought I had better stay here quietly."

"Is your head better now?"

"Yes, thanks; only this book is so stupid. I think novels are stupid now-a-days; the heroes are so gaudy, and the heroines have not a spark of spirit. You may talk to me instead, if you like. What have you been doing with yourself all day?"

Bessie was dumb with amazement. Was this pride, or was Edna acting a part, and pretending not to care? She could break her lover's heart one minute and talk of novels the next. Bessie's simplicity was at fault; she could make nothing of this.

"Why are you looking at me in that way?" asked Edna, fretfully, on receiving no answer; and as she raised herself on the cushions Bessie could see her face more plainly. It looked very pale, and her eyes were painfully bright, and then she gave a hard little laugh that had no mirth in it. "So mamma or Richard have been talking to you! What a transparent little creature you are, Bessie! You are dreadfully shocked, are you not, that I have sent Neville about his business?"

"Oh, Edna, please don't talk about it in that way."

"If I talk about it at all, it must be in my own way. If Neville thought I could not live without him he finds himself mistaken now. I am not the sort of girl who could put up with tyranny; other people may submit to be ordered about and treated like a child, but I am not one of them."

"Edna, surely you consider that you owe a duty to the man you have promised to marry."

"I owe him none—I will never owe him any duty." And here Edna's manner became excited. "It is mamma I ought to obey, and I will not always yield to her; but I have never given Neville the right to lecture and control me; no man shall—no man," angrily.

"Edna, how can you bear to part with Mr. Sinclair, when he is so good and loves you so much?"

"I can bear it very well. I can do without him," she replied, obstinately; "at least I have regained my liberty and become my own mistress."

"Will that console you for making him miserable? Oh, Edna, if you had only seen his face when I gave him your message, I am sure you must have relented. He has gone away unhappy, and you let him go."

"Yes, I let him go. How dare he come down here to spy out my movements? Captain Grant, indeed! But it is all of a piece; his jealousy is unbearable. I will no longer put up with it. Why do you talk about it, Bessie? You do not know Neville—Mr. Sinclair, I mean. He is a stranger to you; he has given me plenty to bear during our engagement. He has a difficult nature, it does not suit mine; I must be trusted wholly or not at all."

"Will you not let your mother explain this to him and send for him back?" But Edna drew herself up so haughtily that Bessie dared not proceed.

"I will never call him back, if I wanted him ever so; but I am not likely to want him, he has made me too miserable. No one shall speak to him; it is my affair, and no one has any right to meddle. Mamma takes his part, and Richard, too. Everyone is against me, but they cannot influence me," finished Edna, proudly.

"Mrs. Sefton was right; I can do no good," thought Bessie, sorrowfully; "it seems as though some demon of pride has taken possession of the girl. Mr. Sinclair is nothing to her to-night; she is only conscious of her own proud, injured feelings," and Bessie showed her wisdom by ceasing to argue the point; she let Edna talk on without checking her, until she had exhausted herself, and then she rose and bade her good-night.

Edna seemed taken aback.

"You are going to leave me, Bessie?"

"Yes, it is very late, and your mother will be coming up directly. I can do you no good; no one could to-night. I shall go and pray for you instead."

"You will pray for me! May I ask why?"

"I will not even tell you that to-night, it would be no use, the evil spirits won't let you listen, Edna; they have stopped your ears too; to-night you are in their power, you have placed yourself at their mercy; no one can help you except One, and you will not even ask Him."

"You are very incomprehensible, Bessie."

"Yes, I daresay I seem so, but perhaps one day you may understand better."

You want us not to think you unhappy, and you are utterly miserable. I never could pretend things, even when I was a child. I must say everything out. I think you are unhappy now, and that you will be more unhappy to-morrow; and when you begin to realise your unhappiness, you will begin to look for a remedy. Good-night, dear Edna. Don't be angry at my plain speaking, for I really want to do you good." Edna made no answer, and yielded her cheek coldly to Bessie's kiss. If something wet touched her face, she took no apparent notice, but Bessie could not restrain her tears as she left the room. "Oh, why, why were people so mad and wicked? How could anyone calling herself by the sacred name of Christian suffer herself to be over-mastered by these bitter and angry passions? It is just temper; Mrs. Sefton is right," thought Bessie; and her mind was so oppressed by the thought of Edna's wretchedness that it was long before she could compose herself to sleep. But she rose at her usual early hour, and wrote out of the fulness of her heart to her mother, not mentioning any facts, but relieving her overwrought feelings by loving words that were very sweet to her mother.

"I think it is good to go away sometimes from one's belongings," wrote Bessie; "absence makes one realise one's blessings more. I don't think I ever felt more thankful that I had such a mother than last night, when Edna was talking in a way that troubled me."

When Bessie went downstairs after finishing her letter, she was much surprised to see Edna in her usual place, pouring out the coffee. She looked a little pale and heavy-eyed; but no one could have detected from her manner that there was anything much amiss. A slight restlessness, however, an eagerness for occupation and amusement, and a shade of impatience when anyone opposed her, spoke of inward irritability. Now and then, too, there was a sharpness in her voice that betrayed nervous tension; but none dared to express sympathy by look or word. Once when she announced her intention of joining Bessie and Richard in their ride, and her mother asked her if she were not too tired, she turned on her almost fiercely.

"I tired, mamma! What an absurd idea; as though riding ever tired me. I am not an old woman yet. Bessie," turning to her, "the Athertons are coming this afternoon, and I have written to the Powers to join them. We must have a good practice, because we have to go to the Badderleys to-morrow, and Major Sullivan will be my partner; he is our best player, and we have Captain Grant and Mrs. Matchett against us."

It was so in everything. Edna seemed bent all that day on tiring herself out. She rode at a pace that morning that left the others far behind, but Richard took no notice; he continued his conversation with Bessie, and left Edna to her own devices.

In the afternoon she played tennis in the same reckless fashion; once Bessie saw her turn very pale, and put her hand to her side, but the next minute she was playing again.

"What spirits Edna is in," Florence said once. "Really I do not know what we shall all do next spring when she gets married, for she is the life and soul of everything," for none of the girls had noticed that the diamond ring was missing on Edna's finger; some brilliant emerald and ruby rings had replaced it.

Edna continued in this unsatisfactory state for weeks, and not once did she open her lips even to her mother on the subject of her broken engagement. Every morning she made her plans for the day. It seemed to Bessie as though air and movement were absolutely necessary to her. When the morning ride was over she would arrange to drive her mother or Bessie to some given place, and the intervening hours were always spent in tennis or archery. When the evening came she would often lie on the drawing-room couch in a state of exhaustion, until she compelled herself to some exertion. "Oh, how stupid everyone is!" she would say, jumping up in a quick, restless manner. "Ritchie, why don't you think of something amusing to do? Bessie, I hate those dreamy old ballads; do come and play some game. Mamma," she exclaimed, one evening, "we must have a regular picnic for Bessie; she has never been at a large one in her life. We will go to Arldley, and Floreñce shall take her violin, and Dr. Merton his cornet, and we will have a dance on the turf; it will be delightful."

Well, to please her, they talked of the picnic, and Richard good-naturedly promised to hire a waggonette for the occasion, but she had forgotten all about it the next day, and there was to be an archery meeting in the long meadow instead.

"Bessie, she is killing herself," exclaimed Mrs. Sefton, for in those days she found Bessie a great comfort. "Do you see how thin she is getting! And she eats next to nothing; she is losing her strength, and all that exercise is too much for her. The weather is too hot for those morning rides. I must speak to Richard."

"She does not really enjoy them," replied Bessie, "but I think she feels better when she is not in the house, and then it is something to do. Mrs. Sefton, I want to speak to you about something else. I have been here nearly a month, and it is time for me to go home."

"You are not thinking of leaving us," interrupted Mrs. Sefton, in genuine alarm. "I cannot spare you, Bessie; I must write to your father. What would Edna do without you? My dear, I cannot let you go."

"Hatty is not well," observed Bessie, anxiously. "She always flags in the warm weather. I don't believe Cliffe suits her; but father never likes to send her away. Christine wrote to me yesterday, and she said Hatty had had one of her old fainting fits, and had been very weak ever since. I cannot be happy in leaving her any longer, though they say nothing about my coming home."

"But she has your mother and Christine. You are not really wanted," urged Mrs. Sefton, rather selfishly, for she was thinking of her own and Edna's loss, and not of Bessie's anxiety.

"Hatty always wants me," returned Bessie, firmly. "I think I am more to her than anyone else except mother. I have written to father this morning to ask what I had better do. I told him that I had had a long holiday, and that I was ready to come home at once if Hatty wanted me."

"Oh, very well, if you have made your plans," returned Mrs. Sefton, in rather a chilling manner; but Bessie would not let her proceed.

"Dear Mrs. Sefton," she said, much distressed at her obvious displeasure, "you must not think that I leave you willingly. I have been so happy here; it has been such a real holiday that I am afraid I am not a bit anxious to go home, but if father thinks it is my duty—"

"Your father is a sensible man. I don't believe he will recall you anyhow. I will write to him myself, and tell him how anxious we are to keep you. That will do no harm, eh, Bessie?"

"No," hesitated the girl, "I daresay he will only think you are all too kind to me." She did not like to offend her hostess by begging her not to write. Her father knew her well enough; he would not misunderstand her. He knew her love for Hatty would never let pleasure stand in the way if she required her. "All the enjoyments in the world would not keep me from Hatty if she really needed me, and father knows that; we are both quite safe with him."

Bessie was perfectly comfortable in her own mind; she was sure of her own motives, and she had implicit faith in her father; but she would not have been quite so easy if she had known that Mrs. Sefton intended to send a little note to Hatty as well. It was only a kindly worded note, full of sympathy for Hatty's little ailments, such as any friendly stranger might write, but the closing sentence was terribly damaging to Bessie's plans. "Please do not let your father recall Bessie unless it is absolutely necessary. We are all so fond of her, and my poor girl, who is in sad trouble just now, is dependent on her for companionship. Bessie is so happy too, that it would be cruel to take her away. She is becoming a first-rate horsewoman under my son's tuition, and is very much liked by all our friends; indeed, everyone makes much of her. If you can spare her a little longer I shall be truly grateful, my dear Miss Sefton, for my poor child's sake." And then followed a few kindly expressions of goodwill and sympathy.

Bessie was rather surprised to receive a letter from Christine the following morning, with a little pencilled note from Hatty inside. "Her father was too busy to write," Christine said. "He had a very anxious case on hand; but he hoped Hatty was rather better that day, and he thought they could do without Bessie a little longer, as her friends seemed to need her so much. He was sorry to hear Miss Sefton had broken off her engagement; it was a very serious thing for any young lady to do, and he hoped none of his girls would act so dishonourably to any man." Hatty's note was short and much underlined.

"Darling Bessie,—You are not to come home on my account. Chrissy is very nice and does everything for me, and I won't have your pleasure spoiled and Miss Sefton's too, poor thing, just because I was stupid enough to faint. It is only the hot weather—oh! it is so hot and glaring here! Chrissy and I cannot imagine how you can ride and play tennis in such heat; but perhaps it is cooler in the country. Now remember, I mean what I say, and that I don't want you one bit. At least, that is a fib in one way, because I always want my Betty; but I am quite happy to think you are enjoying yourself, and cheering up that poor girl—she must be very miserable. Write to me soon again. I do love your letters. I always keep them under my pillow and read them in the morning. Good-bye, darling; you are my own Betty, you know."

"Your loving little HATTY."

"I suppose I must stop a week or ten days longer," thought Bessie, laying down her letters with rather a dissatisfied feeling. "I wish father could have written himself, but I daresay he will in a day or two. I will try not to fidget. I will wait a little and then write to mother and tell her how I feel about things. When she understands how difficult it is for me to get away without giving offence, she will be sure to help me, and six weeks are enough to satisfy Mrs. Sefton."

Bessie spoke of her letters at luncheon-time. Edna heard her with languid attention, but Mrs. Sefton was triumphant.

"I knew they could spare you, Bessie," she said, with a look of amusement, that made Bessie feel a little small. Richard glanced at her without speaking, and then busied himself in his carving.

But that evening as Bessie was pausing in the hall to look out at the dark clouds that were scurrying across the sky, she found Richard at her elbow.

"There is going to be a storm," he said, quietly. "I have been expecting it all day. Edna is always nervous; she hates the thunder. What was that my mother was saying at luncheon, Miss Lambert? Surely you do not intend leaving us?"

"Not just yet, not for another week," returned Bessie, much surprised by the gravity of his manner. "They will want me at home after that."

"They will not want you as much as some of us do here," he returned, with much feeling. "Miss Lambert, do not go unless you are obliged. My sister needs you, and so—"

He broke off abruptly, coloured, and finally wished her good-night.

"I wonder why he did not finish his sentence," thought Bessie, innocently, as she went up to her room.

DRESS: IN SEASON AND IN REASON.

By A LADY DRESSMAKER.

THE homespuns and tweeds manufactured and sold by the Donegal Industrial Fund are well worthy of notice and patronage by those who desire thoroughly well-wearing and warm materials for country and winter travelling wear. The colour is a pretty light grey, and the texture is neither weighty, nor too thick to be worn as an ordinary every-day gown in the country. The homespuns, as well as the tweeds, are hand woven and hand spun, and are considered by experts and good, experienced judges to rival the best class of Highland tweeds in quality and general character. In the matter of woollen materials, great strides have been made in Ireland during the last three years, and the woollen industry is one of the most natural for that country, and one into which she could most profitably enter, as she produces plenty of wool, and manufactures but little of the raw material herself. One of the greatest needs there is the inauguration of industrial training schools, where the manufacture of wool might be taught, as skill, in addition to knowledge, is needed for it. I must not omit to mention the "Hygeia All-Wool Underwear," which is sold by the Donegal Industrial Fund, which is made in Ireland, on handlooms, and is very soft and perfect in both its finish and shape.

One of the most curious fabrics lately revived is the manufacture of mixed glass and material. Mons. Dubus Bonnet, a Frenchman, claims to have invented a new process for glass and silk; fifty or sixty strands of glass being woven together into one thread, which is strong and even, and forms the weft, the warp being of silk. The cloth produced is said to be lustrous and extremely beautiful, and resplendent with brilliance; but the weaving is slow, twelve hours being needed to produce a yard of cloth. Under this new patent great improvements are promised, and it is probable that a new departure in textiles may be the result.

Now that we are said to be returning to fur as a trimming and ornament to our dress, both for day and evening wear, it is very amusing to look up the past history of this comfortable covering in our native country. If one may believe an ancient treatise on morals and behaviour, written in 1371 by Geoffroi de la Tour Landray, the English were the first to set the fashion of furring and edging of garments; and we know that Alfred was probably the originator of the custom of fur being worn as an emblem of royalty. Strutt also tells us that before the Conquest, sables, beavers, foxes, cats, lambs, ermines, squirrels, martens, rabbits, and goats were all used for dress. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries every one who could manage to buy it wore fur; and the Plantagenet kings were constantly occupied with sumptuary laws, in which they classified the people who should wear fur of certain kinds. Under the warlike Edward III., an Act was passed prohibiting the use of fur to all except the king, royal family, and those who derived £100 a year from land. The furs were later on accurately mentioned which might be worn by everyone—peers, judges, every order of the clergy, knights, esquires, yeomen, and artisans; the latter were allowed to wear only lamb, rabbit, cat, and fox. The last Act dealing with clerical furs was passed by Henry VIII., who forbade the clergy to wear any fur but black rabbit, grey marten, fitch, fox, otter, beaver, and "budge shanks," i.e., the fur from the legs of the sheep. The extravagance of the expenditure in furs in those days is constantly remarked upon; and in the year 1361 a nameless chronicler says that England went mad in the matter of ornamental dress, and we gather with some comfort that not women, but men, were the great sinners in that respect in those days, and it was men who wore these expensive and extravagant furs. It certainly shows that the climate was as cold, if not colder, than at present; and as we have constant mention of the Thames being frozen over, we may believe that, with their imperfect methods of eating and living, their sufferings from cold must have been great; and that the fur-lined gowns so constantly mentioned as being worn indoors by men were needed to preserve the natural warmth.

The penalties in money were to be paid to the Crown, but offenders could also be imprisoned. Elizabeth was the last sovereign who tried, I believe, to control fashionable extravagance by laws, and it does not seem that sumptuary enactments were ever successful, because, from their frequency in every reign, one gathers that people went on doing pretty much as they pleased. I am afraid, in our day, if I had the power, I should try to make a law to prevent anyone wearing or killing birds; for entreaties and expostulations seem to have had little effect on this cruel custom.

I must now turn to the practical aspect of fur in this year of our Lord, 1889. Small jackets for out-of-door use are trimmed with broad collars of fur—generally otter, beaver, or sealskin—and an edging of the same is put down the fronts and round the sleeves. They are of various coloured cloths, besides being of black, navy-blue, and seal-brown; and some are lined with fur, grey squirrel or beaver being used. The fastenings are large buttons of bone, or else brandenburg of silk. Many of these jackets have braided or fur waistcoats, or the latter corresponding with the fur of the revers and collar.

These jackets, as will be seen from our illustration, have always tight-fitting backs and double-breasted fronts, which make them much warmer than the ordinary tight-fitting tailor-made jacket. Sealskin jackets are also worn of the same shape as the cloth ones which I have described. Fur capes are not so much seen this winter. Instead of them we find a combined collarette and long boa, the collarette coming deep over the shoulders. Those in beaver and blue fox are very handsome. These two furs, with the addition of black fox, may be called, I think, the fashionable furs of this winter.

The long cloaks, however, carry away the palm, and everyone seems to wear them, and persons of all ages. They are made in many materials, and all are quite as long as the dress. Some are shaped into the back, and appear to set-in quite tightly, while others are pleated-in and tied-in by strings round the waist. What are called Rotondes seem to be straight lengths of the material gathered into a neck-band, or put into yokes. Some are smocked at the shoulders, and some have a plain yoke, which is hidden by three small capes, which are piped at the edges with colour. Others have three deep pleats or tucks at the edge of the front, which fall to the feet; and an opening at the side of the last pleat makes this look as if it had a double-pleated front. The new way of making waterproofs is to make two deep pleats in front, under which are the arm openings, which make the cloak more useful and give freedom to the arms. These loose cloaks that I have been describing are all to be seen in the illustrations of "out-door apparel," where there is also the new

NEW JACKET BODICE WITH WAISTCOAT.

"Hubbard cloak" with long wing-like sleeves over tight ones. Cloaks of plain and striped serge, brocaded woollens, and limousine are worn in the morning in the park or the street, and the same kind of thing is seen in the afternoon, only the material is matelassé, velvet brocade, or Velour du Nord. These are often lined with plush. Ordinary cloaks are lined with shot-silk when a thick lining would not answer. The backs of these cloaks are slit up—though when standing up it is not seen—to enable the wearer to pull them forward when sitting down. Large capes to the waist are seen with Directoire coats, and there are many circular pelerines which are called "cardinals," and are quite loose in shape and style.

The hats are very much prettier than they have been, and the use of felt (very fine and soft), which will bend, and almost take form of itself, is graceful. Some of the wide-brimmed felts are turned up at the back, in three fluted folds, as the straw hats were in the summer. Then there is the boat-shape, which is now called "amazon," which has a slighter degree of curl at the sides than the old boat-shape had; but it is trimmed with one long and handsome ostrich feather, as in former days, the tip falling over the brim and touching the shoulder, in the graceful way adopted of old. Mere ostrich feathers are used this year than have been seen for some time, and they are quite "piled up" on very handsome hats, one hat having a feather long enough to curl round the throat. Galloon is the usual binding for felts, and some are lined with velvet, but the newest trimming is pinked out cloth, which is used both as a binding and a trimming too, and looks very warm and winter-like. In small hats there are many varieties of the toque, which has a turned up brim, sometimes like a turban or Spanish hat. These are most generally worn in the morning, while the wide and graceful Rubens and Gainsborough-looking hats, with their weight of feathers, are worn at afternoon teas, concerts, and at weddings. Veils are becoming quite large, and some are edged with lace and drawn in at the throat in the way I illustrated last month. Some new long veils have been brought out, which reach below the chin, and are of spotted net with a lace edge. It would be strange if we went back to the old long veil of our grandmothers again! Bonnets are both small and large. The "Corday bonnet" is only a small plate-like shape composed of velvet in killings, winding round from the centre of the crown, and a full torsade to give height over the face. The strings are fastened at the top of it; in general the latter are short, and start from the back of the bonnet. Drawn velvet bonnets are seen on both old and young with moiré trimmings. Cloth bonnets with fur trimmings are used to match the dress for morning wear. Black astrachan is used to bind many coloured bonnets, and black feathers are used with it. In general it may be said that black with colours is the most stylish arrangement for both millinery and dresses.

A few words must be given to hair-dressing. The tendency now is rather to lower the very high style we have been wearing, and to make the heads small and very compact-looking; sometimes covered with small curls. The hair is drawn more backwards, and is high at the back, the front parting being shown, and the curled fringe light and fine. We have also, I think, to expect the "Catagan," now that we have gone so far with the other "Empire" styles. The hair looks very pretty when dressed in this way for young people, one objection, perhaps, being that unless the hair be naturally wavy, it has to be a good deal crimped.

In the way of new materials, we find that silk poplins are more used than they have been for some years; so it is to be hoped that Ireland will have her turn now, for poplin is a very handsome and well-wearing material. Woven borderings to materials are now more employed than ever they were, and arranged from the very narrow to the extremely wide. It seems as if stripes and checks would give way before these bordered materials. One of the colours most seen is green, a light shade called "lime," or "melon," which is worn as sashes to black or white dresses, and trimming to black bonnets, and it looks very well for young girls.

The change in the style of riding dress as seen in the Row at present is quite remarkable. Boots of tan leather, cut-away jacket bodices, with checked waistcoats, caps of cloth, or those felt hats with dented-in crowns, which we used to call "Tyroleans," with feathers and ribbons; all these are seen on lady riders, and certainly look dreadful. A weekly contemporary, well known to everyone, is very much troubled on this subject, and pointed out in its columns a short time ago, that if this went on the Englishwoman would have to abdicate the empire peculiarly her own, and would no longer be "the best-dressed and best-looking woman in the world on horseback." There is one comfort, perhaps, as we have numbers of American and foreign ladies in London, that some of these startling people may not be English. As many of my readers live in the country, they will be interested, I am sure, in any change of this sort.

I had nearly forgotten to say that red has much returned to favour, and we see red hats and red bonnets in great profusion. The new reds are deep in hue, and very handsome. They are called "amaranth red," and "madder red," and a very fine Indian red. There are also several pretty new blues of a dark shade.

While upon the subject of the "Empire dress," I ought to have said that the sash is tied at the left hip, the loops hanging down. The band is wide and straight in front, and narrows down on each side to where it starts from on the left side. It is generally mounted on a stiff foundation, to prevent its being bulky, and the folds are kept quite thin and small, so as to look full, and yet be devoid of bulk.

We have been so often asked for the "jacket bodice" represented in the "New Gallery" illustration, at page 121, that it has been selected for this month's paper pattern. The pieces consist of vest, one side, collar, the jacket, two sleeve pieces, cuff, front, back, side-back, and straight revers—in all, nine. This pattern is now very generally used for all ordinary gowns for daily wear. It is simple and easily made. Four and a half yards of 27-inch material would be sufficient.

All paper patterns are of medium size, viz., thirty-six inches round the chest, with no turnings allowed, and only one size is prepared for sale. They may be had of "The Lady Dressmaker, care of Mr. H. G. Davis, 73, Ludgate Hill, E.C.," price 1s. each; if tacked in place, 6d. extra. The addresses should be clearly given, with the county; and stamps should not be sent, as so many losses have occurred. Postal notes should be crossed, but not filled up with any name. Patterns already issued may be always obtained. As the object aimed at is use, not fashion, the Lady Dressmaker selects such patterns as are likely to be of constant use in making and re-making at home, and is careful to give new hygienic patterns for children as well as adults, so that the readers of the "G.O.P." may be aware of the best methods of dressing themselves. The following in hygienic under-clothing have already been given:—Combination (drawers and chemise), princess petticoat (under bodice and petticoat), divided skirt, under bodice instead of stays, pyjama (nightdress combination). Also housemaid's or plain skirt, polonaise with waterfall back, Bernhardt mantle, dressing-jacket, Princess of Wales jacket and waistcoat (for tailor-made gown), mantelette with stole ends, Norfolk blouse with pleats, ditto with yoke, blouse polonaise, princess dress or dressing-gown, Louis XI. bodice with long fronts, Bernhardt mantle with pleated front, and plain dress-bodice suitable for cotton or woollen materials; Garibaldi blouse with loose front, new skirt pattern with rounded back, bathing dress, new polonaise, winter bodice with full sleeves, Irish wrap or shawl cloak, blanket dressing-gown, emancipation suit, dress drawers, corselet bodice with full front, spring mantle, polonaise with pointed fronts, Directoire jacket-bodice, striped tight-fitting tennis or walking jacket, honeycombed Garibaldi shirt, new American bodice instead of stays, new Corday skirt with pleats, new jacket-bodice with waistcoat.

CHAPTER IV.

"FEARING FOR NOUGHT."

SUNDAY morning. Deep, cool shadows lying on the sunny hills; every breath of the soft summer breeze laden with the fragrance of flowers; golden sunshine flooding everything. The big west doors of the church were fastened back, and out on the shimmering dancing air rang the sweet words of the hymn—

"Oh, what the joy and the glory must be,
Those endless Sabbaths the blessed ones see!"

For a full year now had Miriam Stewart worshipped, Sunday by Sunday, within the walls of that grand old church, and not in vain had she listened to the sound and faithful teaching of Mr. Rivers. The work of the Holy Spirit is in most hearts a progressive work, and it was so in Miriam's case. As yet, her spiritual life was but feeble, but He who will not "quench the smoking flax" was leading her on. The past year had not been without its lessons. Sunday after Sunday, the empty places in Colonel Maxwell's pew reminded her of the deep trouble through which Hope had been called to pass. A short time after receiving the news of Robert Atherton's death, Colonel Maxwell and his daughter had gone abroad. The Grange was let to a rich manufacturer with a large family, and the Leighs did not care to go there more often than they could help. Hope wrote constantly to Margaret, and when for a short time the regular letters ceased, great was the anxiety felt by all. After a month's delay came a short letter, telling of the sudden illness and death of Colonel Maxwell. Hope wrote that her aunt was with her, and that they would shortly be returning to England. Her loving faith shone through the dark clouds of trouble, and her only comment on it was, "It is the Lord, let Him do what seemeth Him good." It was of Hope that Miriam was thinking on this bright Sunday morning. The hymn before the sermon was ended—

"Low before Him with our praises we fall,
Of Whom, and in Whom, and through Whom are we all."

The last soft notes of the organ died away, and Mr. Rivers, in his clear, deep voice, gave out the text.

"The first chapter of the Book of Job, and the ninth verse: 'Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought?'"

The words went right to Miriam's heart, and she sat with her eyes fixed on Mr. Rivers, and her face growing quite white, when, after briefly touching on the history of Job, he proceeded to bring the subject home to his hearers.

"Are there not many now," he asked, "who stand in Satan's place and take Satan's words on their lips? They see some neighbour perhaps better off than themselves, surrounded maybe with all the comforts and luxuries that wealth can give, and yet at the same time gladly using that wealth to serve and honour Him who gave it all. Of such a one they cry, 'Doth he serve God for nought?'"

Of the rest of the sermon Miriam heard not one word. Had not she stood in Satan's place, and taken Satan's words on her lips? Had not she over and over again cried of Hope Maxwell, "Does she fear God for nought?" Miriam spent the rest of the day alone. She asked Margaret, in a wonderfully softened way, if she would kindly let Netta and Milly go with her to the Sunday-school, and Margaret, quite pleased that Miriam should ask a favour of her, gladly consented, and she kept the little ones with her until their bedtime. At nine o'clock the next morning Mr. Rivers was sitting in his somewhat barely-furnished study, when his servant announced: "Miss Stewart wishes to speak to you, please, sir."

"I am very glad to see you," he said, shaking hands with her warmly.

Then, being an observant man, he saw something was troubling her, so he said kindly, turning a low chair to the open window—

"Will you sit down here for five minutes just while I finish a letter? Then I am at your service."

"Am I hindering you at all?" asked Miriam, nervously playing with a book he had handed her to look at.

"Not in the least. My time is always gladly given to my people; with me, it is 'first come first served;' so we shall not be disturbed."

A few moments' silence, with only the sound of Mr. Rivers's pen going rapidly over the paper and the chirping of birds among the trees in the garden. He wished Miriam to speak without reserve, so when he had put down his pen, he turned to her, and with a kind smile said—

"Now let me hear if there is anything troubling you on which I can throw light, or in any way help you."

"Will you tell me why you chose that text yesterday morning?"

It cost Miriam an effort to speak, and he saw it, and, like Nehemiah, "prayed to the God of heaven" that he might be enabled to help her.

"I chose it as I choose all my texts," he answered; "after due thought and much prayer that I might be directed to a passage of Scripture that might be helpful and profitable to some among the congregation."

Then Miriam told him how often she had said and thought that Hope Maxwell would not have been such a bright and loving Christian if she had not been surrounded by so many blessings; that the text yesterday had shown her that she had acted Satan's part, and that perhaps God had let all these sorrows come upon Hope in order to prove to Miriam that, like Job, Hope could say, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

Mr. Rivers could have smiled at poor Miriam's misery if it had not been so very real, and he knew how a smile at the wrong time may hurt. She evidently looked upon herself as the direct cause of all Hope Maxwell's troubles. He listened attentively to every word she said, and then told her, very lovingly, that although God had permitted her to see the process by which He was refining His gold, yet it was God and not Miriam who had lighted the furnace into which the gold was to be cast. After a short and earnest prayer that Miriam's murmuring thoughts and words might be pardoned, and a calm and contented mind be given her, she went home much comforted. From that day all the household noticed a difference in her. She resolutely tried to take a more cheerful interest in what concerned others, and to go about her daily occupations,

"Wearing no cold, repulsive brow of gloom."

In a few weeks a pretty little house not far from the Leighs was being repaired, outside and in, for the reception of Hope Maxwell and her aunt. On the day when the travellers were expected, Margaret and Miriam were running in and out all day.

They put flowers in every room, and did all that loving thought could suggest to give the small rooms a homelike appearance.

"Now they should be here in five minutes," said Margaret, giving a last look round.

"Then I had better go; Hope will like to see you alone," replied Miriam.

"Now, Miriam, I thought you had given up saying things of that sort. Here they are; I'll run to the door, and you stay there to welcome them."

Margaret was off like a shot, and in a few moments the door was opened, a great deal of luggage put into the little hall, the station fly had driven off, and Hope Maxwell was standing face to face with Miriam. She was as beautiful as ever, but the happy childlike look that had been in her face before was for ever gone, and in its place was the calm, unchanging light of the "peace that passeth understanding." She kissed Miriam affectionately, and then, with her usual forgetfulness of self, she waited on her aunt, and was only anxious she should not do too much. She was Colonel Maxwell's only sister, and there was so much that was like the Colonel about her that Margaret was charmed.

"I know she will make Hope happy," she said, as the girls were on their way home.

As time went on Miriam and Hope became very true friends. The trouble both had passed through drew them together.

"Trouble softened you, Hope," said Miriam, one afternoon, as she watched Hope holding up a little white frock she was making, and looking at it with a tender smile. The frock was for the baby sister of one of her Sunday-school children. The two girls were alone. Miss Maxwell had gone to spend the afternoon with the Leighs, and Miriam had caught at the chance of having a few hours alone with Hope. "Trouble softened you, and it only hardened me."

"Perhaps you didn't think enough of Him who sent it," said Hope.

"It seems to me when I look back," said Miriam, thoughtfully, "that I wanted, if I served God well, to have something for it; I mean success, or popularity, or distinction in some way, and—"

"You lost sight of the best thing of all—More careful, not to serve Thee much, But to love Thee perfectly," answered Hope.

"If you put the question to your own heart—For what are you serving God?—what answer should you give, Hope?"

"For love alone. And is not love the strongest motive power in heaven or on earth? Love makes all labour light; it is the thought of God as my loving Father that alone enables me to face my daily life cheerfully. I know that hereafter, when life's night is passed, I shall see Him and all my dear ones,

'Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.'

And knowing this, I can go on my way rejoicing. Life need never be hopelessly dreary while there are those whom we can help and comfort. You and I, dear Miriam, have both lost those whom we love most and best; then let us resolve that henceforth we will do all we can to live for the happiness of others. We can do it, just in our own home and our ordinary daily life, if we are always on the look-out for opportunities."

Miriam Stewart found at last that the way to get love is to give love, and never now is the old thought in her heart—

"I care for nobody, no, not I,

And nobody cares for me."

Very many care deeply for her.

Let not any girl who reads this little story think Hope and Miriam must have had rather a dull time of it, for to make others happy is the way to be happy, and to prove it true, I say—

"Go and do thou likewise."

THE FAIRY-TALE SISTER.

By LILY WATSON.

CHAPTER II.

In a former article a plea was put forward on behalf of fairy tales, and it was pointed out that the elder sister or friend who ministers to the longing of the child-heart for imaginative lore, need not consider herself as wasting time or indulging a merely idle fancy.

It remains to add a word or two as to the chief storehouses of fairy tale, that are to be consulted by the "Fairy-Tale Sister," or the "Märchen-Schwester," as the Germans would call her. The willingness to tell the children stories is something, the power of dramatic and interesting narration is still more; but when these are given, it is needful to know what to consult, and to possess a good source whence can be drawn the materials for the delightful task.

Certain fairy tales are "in the air," so to speak. Everybody knows them. "Cinderella," for instance; "Silverhair and the Bears," or "Red Riding Hood." The history of some of these stories is very interesting, for their origin can be traced back to the early days of our race, and they are found under varying forms in the literature of widely distant lands. Their lineage and development would form material for a long essay, but lie somewhat outside our present scope. These elementary fairy tales will doubtless be first chosen by the sister, who will tell them as they have been told to her. To begin with, children of two and a half or three years old are usually highly delighted by "The Wolf and the Seven Young Kids," or "Silverhair and the Three Bears."

These are simple in outline, deal with animals about which infants always like to hear, and are sufficiently dramatic without being too harrowing. For once again, anything horrible is to be avoided; and "Red Riding Hood" and "Bluebeard" may very well wait their time.

The two great storehouses of fairy tales are the collections of the Brothers Grimm and Hans Andersen. With regard to Grimm's stories, the sister who makes them her own must use discrimination. Any stories that uphold courage, tenderness, faithfulness, unselfishness, are good; any that place trickery, cruelty, or falsehood in a favourable light are intrinsically bad.

For instance, no child would be the better for hearing such tales as "The Wonderful Musician," "A Good Bargain," "The Little Farmer"; and ugly and frightful images are to be avoided, like those of the "Man who could not Shiver." But the majority of the stories are charming and guileless. How pretty, for instance, is the legend of "Little Snow-White" in her forest home! "The Little Brother and Sister" is a touching and innocent tale, dwelling upon what often forms the theme of these stories, brotherly and sisterly love. "Snow-white and Rosy-red," and "Madam Holl," contain excellent lessons.

A very frequent moral of these stories is the superiority of character to circumstance. The poor and despised younger son, the neglected stepdaughter, come to honour; the gruff bear or poverty-stricken wanderer turns out a prince in disguise! In this fairy world wrong is redressed, vice is punished, goodness triumphs in the end. Poetic justice is the law, and although this may not be the rule of the world, it is well for the children to be early familiar with a high ideal of society, in which the poet's dream is realised:

"I can but trust that good shall fall

At last—far off—at last, to all,

And every winter change to spring."

Hans Andersen is undoubtedly the prince of story-tellers. The pathos and the loveliness of many of his conceptions entitle them to a high rank in literature, and there is so great a variety in their subjects that they are adapted to children of all ages. The little ones will be delighted with "The Brave Tin Soldier," "Tommelise," "Ida and the Flowers," and "The Wild Swans," to take a few almost at random from the treasury. And "The Forsaken Mermaid," "The Snow Queen," "The Ugly Duckling," "The Ice Maiden," are adapted as well for children of a larger growth. No one is or ought to be too old to appreciate these, but very young children are better fed with simpler imaginative food.

It is a mistake to strain a little child's emotions too strongly. Pity and tenderness are easily stirred, but it is better not to work upon both by such stories, for instance, as "The Little Match-seller," or "The Angel." The child will feel intensely, and it is kinder not to tell him anything too pathetic while he is very young; there is plenty of time for the development of these emotions.

"The Snow Queen" contains a most beautiful lesson, and will charm the imaginative child who is old enough to appreciate it; the picture of the chill Northern splendours, where little Gerda's nature is slowly freezing, until her old playmate, Kay, comes to thaw her back to life and love, is one of power and great picturesqueness. While children are little it is far better to tell than to read a story from Grimm or Hans Andersen. Unless the narrator is incapable, she can clothe it in more intelligible language, better adapted to her hearers, than the printed page contains. She can fill in and amplify details, especially with regard to the somewhat bare and skeleton-like outline of the stories from Grimm's collection, and the practice is excellent for her descriptive powers.

Armed with good editions of these two authors, the "Fairy-Tale Sister" may think she has enough imaginative food to satisfy the most eager demands. But as the children grow older she cannot afford to neglect the collections of tales by Perrault and Madame la Comtesse d'Aulnoy, in which such charming legends as "Beauty and the Beast," "The Yellow Dwarf," and the "White Cat" are found.

There are some most delightful modern French fairy tales that the present writer has translated aloud to the ravished ears of more children than she can remember. They are by Madame la Comtesse de Ségur, and Léon de Laujon, and appeared in a French magazine first published in 1857, called "La Semaine des Enfants." The wonderful pictures with which they were illustrated, drawn chiefly by Gustave Doré, acted beforehand as a powerful stimulus to curiosity, and "a tale from the French book" has many and many a time proved a solace in the illnesses and disappointments of childhood. The names of the best are "Blondine, Bonne-Biche et Beau-Minon," "Le Bon Petit Henri," "La Sœur du Petit Poucet," "Le Père Barbeau," "Follette," "Le Petit Homme Rouge."

Of German fairy tales, "Undine" holds the first place. Sweet and winning creation of the poet's fancy, she will never be forgotten, and all young people (one can hardly say children), whether they can read German or not, should make themselves familiar with her story. The effect of such romance is pure and elevating, quickening the power of imagination, and providing the youthful fancy with sweet and graceful forms, that shall never cease to people its dim recesses. "Undine" is more real to many an English reader than if she had been a historical personage. Free from idle sentiment, the legend is full of tenderness, beauty, and pathos. Who is there that has not recognised something of the power and terror of Kühleborn in wandering through mountain forests, and coming suddenly upon a leaping torrent? These beautiful stories translate something of the mystic awe felt by the true lover of Nature in her inmost haunts, and in so far they are an allegory.

But we are wandering a little from the subject of fairy-tale telling to children. It would be a pity to omit the modern stories of George MacDonald, one of which, "The Light Princess," is especially beautiful. Holme Lee's "Legends of Fairyland" is a charming present for a child.

There is one source of fairy tales not to be neglected, and that is the legendary lore of ancient Greece. No more entrancing stories are to be found for boys or for girls than the adventures of Perseus, Theseus, or the Argonauts in their voyage for the Golden Fleece.

"They were the first that ever burst Into that silent sea."

To be conversant with these is to be conversant with the dim beginnings of European history. By far the most beautiful répertoire of stories such as these in the English language is Kingsley's "Heroes." Oh, the charm of that book! can it ever be forgotten? Here a decided exception may be made, for the stories should be read, not told at second-hand. The sister who wishes to please her schoolboy brothers cannot do better, provided they are lads of average intelligence, than buy a copy of this book and read them one of the stories—read it sympathetically and expressively in the evening hour, when lessons are done. The present writer will never forget the witching charm of Kingsley's rendering of those classic tales, read aloud by her father in the evening to an entranced circle of children. It is a great pity Charles Kingsley did not write more of these Greek fairy tales—e.g., the histories of "Midas and the Golden Touch," "Bellerophon and Pegasus," "Circe," "The Garden of Hesperides"—into his exquisite English. "Tanglewood Tales" is an American collection of the same legends. But why, oh why! did Nathaniel Hawthorne, who had so delicate and mystical a touch in his tales for grown-up people, allow these beautiful relics to be jocularly handled by his wretched Eustace Bright, the supposed narrator? Contrast the two in almost parallel passages.

Hawthorne thus introduces Quicksilver, as he is pleased to call Hermes.

"It was a brisk, intelligent, and remarkably shrewd-looking young man, with a cloak over his shoulders, an odd sort of cap on his head, a strangely twisted staff in his hand, and a short and very crooked sword hanging by his side. He was exceedingly light and active in his figure, like a person much accustomed to gymnastic exercises, and well able to leap or run. Above all, the stranger had such a cheerful, knowing, and helpful aspect (though it was certainly a little mischievous into the bargain), that Perseus could not keep feeling his spirits grow livelier as he gazed at him."

This, on the other hand, is Charles Kingsley's style of describing the appearance of Immortals to men:

"Perseus wondered at that strange cloud, for there was no other cloud all round the sky, and he trembled as it touched the cliff below. And as it touched it broke and parted, and within it appeared Pallas Athené, as he had seen her at Samos in his dream, and beside her a young man, more light-limbed than the stag, whose eyes were like sparks of fire. By his side was a scimitar of diamond, all of one clear precious stone, and on his feet were golden sandals, from the heels of which grew living wings. They looked upon Perseus keenly, and yet they never moved their eyes, and they came up the cliff towards him more swiftly than the sea-gull, and yet they never moved their feet, nor did the breeze stir the robes about their limbs; only the wings of the youth's sandals quivered, like a hawk's when he hangs above the cliff. And Perseus fell down and worshipped, for he knew that they were more than man."

The stories of Norse mythology are also very fascinating. Thor the mighty, the crafty Loki, Baldur the beautiful, Freya the fair and indiscreet, thronging in their city of Asgard, people the dim past with great and lovely and wonderful forms. The storehouse for these stories is the "Heroes of Asgard," by A. and E. Keary, a fascinating book.

One last source from which the "Fairytale Sister" may draw inspiration remains yet to be mentioned. That is her own imagination! If she has any power of constructing a story, let her begin with a fairy tale to her young audience. Many a one who has in mature years become a successful authoress first proved her talent in this way. Power will grow with the using, and when the child-listener craves for "a story of your very own, not one out of a book," the improvisatrice will feel that she has obtained a reward for her pains. Perhaps in later years a public of larger growth will listen to her with approval. And at any rate, if she is always ready to uphold the beautiful and the good, to draw pictures of loveliness that shall not be forgotten, her efforts will by no means be in vain. For, as Mr. Ruskin says, "Imagination will, in the minor necessities of life, enable us, out of any present good, to gather the utmost measure of enjoyment by investing it with happy associations, and in any present evil to lighten it by summoning back the images of other hours; and also to give to all mental truths some visible type in allegory, simile, or personification which shall more deeply enforce them; and finally, when the mind is utterly outworn, to refresh it with such innocent play as shall be most in harmony with the suggestive voices of natural things, permitting it to possess living companionship instead of silent beauty, and create for itself fairies in the grass and naiads in the wave."

BIRD LIFE IN FEBRUARY.

BY A NATURALIST.

"FEBRUARY fill dyke" is a common rustic saying, and there is much truth in it generally; but now and again February has all her dykes and open waters frozen hard up—black ice, the boys and countrymen call it, and whilst these slide and skate to their heart's content, the birds are suffering terribly.

The mallard or wild duck, one of the most wary of birds, will come to any warm spring that he can find in search of food. If you disturb him he will only take a circling flight for a mile or so, and then pitch down again. I know certain spots in sheltered hollows where the springs rise, and there is no freezing there in the hardest winters. Snipe come there for food and shelter.

Anyone looking at a wisp of snipe hanging in a poulterer's shop would have the impression—unless he were in some measure acquainted with birds—that this bird is easy to find; but it is far from being so; his beautiful head and back, mottled and streaked with rich brown, grey, and warm buff, blend so softly with the dry tussocks and brown peat of his feeding-ground, that you may almost place your foot on him before he rises with his zigzag flight; Master Bleater, the moorfolks call him. There is something about his appearance that attracts the attention of the least observant. I look on him as one of the aristocrats of his species. When his mate is hatching her eggs on the tussocky moor, he goes through some extraordinary antics, for he springs aloft in the joy of his heart, and with a "chic! chic! chic!" to a very great height. Then descending again with great rapidity, he makes a most peculiar humming kind of noise, not easily described, which is no doubt caused by the wings being held in a certain position; a piece of wood with a hole in one end, to which a string is fastened, which little boys swing round and round their heads, and call a hummer, gives a very good notion of it.

The snipe is a bird eagerly sought for; in fact, he is a blessing to some of the poor moorland folks—they spring for him in the moist boglands very successfully. Three or four brace of snipe in the course of a week of hard weather help to keep the pot boiling, or they fetch a good price as a table dainty. With his long bill he bores for food in soft places. Its nerves are very sensitive, as they need be, for the food as a rule is mostly out of sight.

Moorhens wander about very much in hard weather, and become to a certain extent tame.

On and about the moorland farms they will feed with the poultry.

The little grebe or dabchick will leave his icebound quarters and fly or scuffle to some tree roots or the bottom of a hedge, and make the best of it. An inland county boy I knew was much mystified by finding one; he could not understand the little fellow's beautiful feet, with their leaf-like oar blades, for he found the bird in a coppice far from water. With some slight misgivings he placed it in his jacket pocket, and showed it to a friend of mine as "wuth at least two shillin'." The friend got a large basin of water, placed Mr. Dabchick in it, and to the rustic's astonishment the strange little bird began at once to paddle and dip, and then made his toilet in most deliberate fashion. In his native haunts he is very shy and difficult to approach.

The gulls keep company with rooks in the fields, and feed with them, miles inland, in hard and stormy weather; for when the ice breaks up and floats in all directions the gulls fare badly. Even the drift on the long shore freezes directly the tide ebbs. The common gull and the blackheaded gull suffer most; the larger kind, such as the great blackbacked gull and the lesser blackbacked gull, fare comparatively well, for they feed like marine vultures, on the tide. A dead sheep—a common sight in winter on the large grazing flats of our marshlands close to the sea—is a banquet to them. All gulls will follow the plough in quest of worms, grubs, and all the numerous insect pests that do damage to the crops; the quantity they devour must be enormous. I once captured a common gull in order to show a sceptical friend how much and what its crop contained; his astonishment was great. The gull was then let go, unharmed.

Starlings search in all directions for insects in some form or other; those lying hid for the winter, and the larvae that would come to life in the warm springtime. Birds wantonly killed, or through mistaken notions about them, are a great loss to the general community; and it has been proved that those which have been held in the greatest disrepute are really the most useful. Nature left to herself keeps her children evenly balanced.

Winter, as well as ignorant man, kills thousands of birds. But there are localities where, but for their existence, man would not be able to live at all during the dreary winter months.

MORLEY HALLS.

By ANNE BEALE.

Unlike the hear of magician's wands, and sometimes think we see them wave. If there were such mystic symbols we should almost believe they had been employed in the transformation of the once luxurious Lotus Clubs into the habitable, homelike Morley Halls. The magician was the Christian philanthropist; the wand, prayer. Scarcely three years ago we wandered through the countless rooms of the Lotus Clubs, then empty, deserted, unfurnished, cheerless; now we find them a centre of activity, filled, furnished, cheerful, and with a new name. In the winter of 1886 they were converted into the head offices of the Young Women's Christian Association, and 316, Regent Street is at the present moment as active in schemes for the benefit of young women as is its opposite neighbour, the Polytechnic, for young men.

Let us once more roam through the innumerable rooms, and see for ourselves how the void has been replenished. Even in the entrance hall, where formerly Oriental lounges were the principal feature, a dépôt for pure literature reigns triumphant, and books, texts, and illuminated cards are offered for sale at a discount of three pence in the shilling. When will buyers and sellers be content to purchase and vend at a fair and fixed price? It would be less troublesome for all parties.

The Lecture Hall, formerly, we believe, a ball-room, greets us first. This is capable of seating 300 people, and here religious meetings of various kinds are held, none, perhaps, more interesting than the Sunday afternoon Bible class, when some 250 young girls assemble for religious instruction. At one end of this lofty hall is a platform for teachers and speakers, at the other an entrance to the Welbeck restaurant. Here we pause to recall that a few years ago some of the young women who frequented this restaurant united in prayer to Almighty God for enlarged premises, and now the partition dividing them from the then Lotus Clubs has been thrown down and an extra dining-room secured. When we consider that from four to five hundred women engaged in business in the neighbourhood dine here daily, and that refreshments are obtainable at all hours and at very moderate prices, we readily understand what a boon the new dining-hall must be. During the season the average was from seven to eight hundred. We have ourselves seen it so crowded at about one o'clock, that we have had to "bide our time" to be served by the ready waitresses. When our time came and we had a good hot dinner for sixpence, we were well assured that more space was very desirable indeed!

This "space" we soon enter upon, and find another of the old halls converted into a dining-room, filled by the overflow from the restaurant. Truly, women are superabundant. Still, they have no time to lose, and the small monosyllable "work" seems written on their brows, and the hurry of business mingled with their movements. Three times a week, when meals are over, this room is utilised of an evening as a gymnasium. A hundred girls joined the class during the first month, and it is said they develop strength and muscle under Ling's Swedish exercises. The apparatus that hangs against the wall is curious, and so are the ornamental Japanese doors which will remain as mementoes of the clubs. One shilling and threepence a quarter will give the "poor lassie" tired of sitting or standing all day, the chance of changes of posture and muscular strengthening.

The "chances" she has in this great building are as numerous as they are wonderful. From the restaurant and gymnasium we mount a flight of stone stairs to the Welbeck Home, for "young ladies in business." On the first floor is the sitting-room, where young women, either in or out of situations, are variously engaged: some in scientific dressmaking, others in different occupations. One is dressing a doll for a competition—and we hope she may get a prize; another is seated in the window, also at work. The latter is out of employment, and tells us "that this is her only home, for she has no parents." This sad tale is, alas! often repeated during our wanderings through these labyrinthine halls.

Evening educational classes are held here as well as at all the principal institutes, where not only dressmaking, scientific or Anglo-Parisian, but other useful arts, can be acquired at moderate charges. Indeed, what cannot be acquired here? Another flight of stairs, and we see sleeping accommodation; a third, ditto.

"Upstairs, downstairs, in my lady's chamber," might be the motto of our halls. Nearly sixty cubicles belong to this portion of them, and they are always full, while applicants are waiting for vacancies. Very pathetic are the stories told in connection with these tiny bedrooms, and very touching is their ornamentation. Girls of all ranks fly to these hospitable walls, which might almost be called a city of refuge. It seems sacrilegious to pry into the secrets of the sanctuary, but a glance shows that each little tabernacle is a sort of home, where all the treasures are enshrined. Books, photographs, illuminated cards, ornaments, line the wooden walls, and the character of the occupants can be divined by the neatness and prettiness of the cell; for truly there are many small hives collected under this, our monster hive. The bees that frequent them are mostly regular workers, but there is a travellers' room, appropriated to those who seek lodging for a night or so. In the Central Institute, 16a, Old Cavendish Street, is located the actual "Travellers' Aid" Branch of the Association; but here, also, weary wanderers can find a night's lodging. From nine in the morning till ten at night the doors are open to all comers, and no virtuous girl, if unprotected, will knock in vain. Policemen, railway porters, and various officials are now alive to the agencies for sheltering and aiding young women, and send them without scruple to the Y.W.C.A., when they find them alone or in danger. They come from station, street, or park, often in peril of starvation or worse; and among the dwellers in our halls may be found wanderers from far Australia, or from other of our colonies. And foreigners, speaking a strange language, are not "sent away empty."

This hurries us from the Welbeck Institute and its many cubicles, to the Continental division of the society, and the office of the International Union. More passages and endless stairs bring us to a small apartment whence large results proceed. Here earnest ladies are working for their foreign sisters, who recount pitiable tales of governesses and servants alone in a strange land. Not long since a German girl, who knew not where to turn for a night's lodging, was brought by a policeman. She proved both respectable and grateful, for when, after due inquiry, a situation was found for her, she sent the first pound of her earnings to the Home. But this is merely an isolated example, since on an average 150 foreigners come weekly for help or advice. A foreign registry is kept for governesses and other employées, open from 11 to 4, and on Saturdays from 11 to 12. This branch is formed for the good of women all over the world. It would benefit English girls abroad and foreigners at home, which seems an anomaly; but many English girls are craving for situations abroad, in order to perfect themselves in some foreign language, and to impart their own in return, and the secretary earnestly invites attention to this fact. If foreign ladies would apply, their situations could be filled for a moderate salary.

The International Union aims at linking together all societies formed to benefit women, and spreads from Europe to Asia and America. Its members are legion, and from this central office extends an almost universal system of protection for all who seek it, according to certain rules. An article of its constitution expressly states that the association is intended to aid every young woman, "whatever her nationality, creed, or occupation." Although its central office is at Neuchâtel, each country has its own office, that for England being, as we see, at 316, Regent Street. It works amicably with the Y.W.C.A., and at Morley Halls it is difficult to disentangle the threads that unite them. Doubtless the special fund, Bible classes, and library for French, German, Italian, Swedish, and Norwegian girls are utilised by both.

While we write, we hear a friend say, "Why, there ought not to be a naughty girl in the world since so much is done for the class." A sentiment we endorse, and we hope all our girls will show their gratitude to their heavenly and earthly friends by purity and holiness or life and conversation.

Another short and bewildering journey brings us to the Servants' Home. Fortunately we have experienced guides, or we should come to grief. A comfortable sitting-room for servants out of work explains itself. At the moment it is full of women of various ages.

They are most of them engaged in needle-work, and look rather despondent, for if situations are not speedily procured, they can but wonder what is to become of them. However, they are in good hands, since the employment agency at 17, Old Cavendish Street is doing its best for them, and Christian love is surrounding them. During one year the beds were used 4,561 times, and there are rarely fewer than twenty servants in the Home. Of course their stay varies in extent according to circumstances, or, alas! sometimes to means, for they pay for bed and board, not exorbitantly, still they pay, and this branch is nearly self-supporting. Spiritual as well as temporal aid awaits them here, in Bible classes and prayer-meetings, concerning which many have written grateful letters when in situations.

Their dormitories are very comfortable, and thirty-three beds are available. One is pointed out as to be occupied for this night only by a servant en route for Brisbane. She is not only safely housed, but to-morrow, God willing, will be accompanied to her vessel by one of the ladies connected with the Travellers' Aid. A letter addressed to the lady superintendent, with a request for the rules of this Home, will receive an immediate answer, and no respectable woman will be refused admission who is able and willing to submit to them.

A roundabout, spiral staircase takes us downstairs again, and we find ourselves after some more intricate wanderings in the office for the "Business Agency," where shop assistants, milliners, dressmakers, and the like come in search of occupation. There is no want of applicants for work, but great need of employers who will engage them. The secretary earnestly asks for such, and assures the heads of firms and other agents that they can be "well suited" at small expense and little personal effort. She says that the tales of privation and sorrow told within those narrow walls would almost make them speak; and that her heart is constantly torn by the appeals for aid to maintain, not only the petitioner for labour, but often whole families dependent on her. One poor girl had the burden of an invalid mother and younger brothers and sisters. Another, of a helpless father; and are all in need of aid and sympathy.

Sympathy! Yes; that is what they all crave, and they get it here. A milliner, whose soul was downcast by continual rebuffs, read something in THE GIRL'S OWN PAPER which induced her to seek this help. She was hopeless, and was sure nothing would be found for her. "We will ask God to help us," said the secretary; and they knelt down and prayed. The next day a situation was found. Grateful letters and gifts of money to the association succeeded, and better still, an acknowledgment of the efficacy of prayer. But this is only one of many instances, and we hear of broken-hearted daughters of our poor clergy and others, seeking aid not only in this, but in all the branches of these great institutions. Oh! why will our young sisters crowd up to London?

This question is asked day by day in the waiting-room, which is free to all. From 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., and on Saturdays from 2 to 6, "they come, they come!" They have, at least, temporary rest in this apartment, with the privilege of entering the library on the payment of one halfpenny, where they may look through the advertisement sheets of the daily papers, for situations, or write a letter, or turn over the pages of a book.

We pause on the threshold of the library to wonder and admire. We see a large room handsomely furnished with couches, tables, and easy chairs; the walls hung with beautiful paintings of flowers and texts, executed by a friend, and surrounded by books, shrubs and flowers in pots, and ease everywhere. We enter, and are greeted by a photograph of Lord Shaftesbury, the lamented friend of rich and poor. Many ladies are seated or reclining on the couches, searching the newspapers or reading. One from India has a scientific book in her hand; she would fain get missionary work. But every kind of pure literature, from science to fiction, is represented. One penny a day, twopence a week, or one shilling per quarter will enable the subscriber to use this reading-room from half-past seven in the morning to ten at night. There is no extra payment, save for writing-paper and envelopes when required. Says the lady superintendent, "Sometimes every couch is occupied by the weary seekers for employment, who come for rest and sleep as much as for literary food." Very patient, if not very weary, must be the young lady who sits all day as secretary near the door.

But how good and patient are all the ladies employed as secretaries or helps in the various departments we have seen! They are evidently "friends all round," and ready to assist one another as well as the applicants at their various departments. Christian cheerfulness is the blessed gift of the Holy Spirit, and it reigns here in spite of much that is depressing from without. This is kept alive by prayer-meetings, Bible classes, ladies' Bible readings, missionary prayer-meetings, and other pious accessories, which arouse dormant energies and stir up flagging faith. At least a hundred individuals dwell in the halls, which are open to all members for religious as well as secular uses. An annual subscription of six shillings constitutes a pass-holder, and makes her free of the gymnasium, library, reading-room, social teas and popular lectures, to say nothing of the ladies' cloak-room, parcels office, and lavatory.

We are not surprised that members increase, since in London alone there are five hundred thousand young girls, numbers of whom surround the Morley Halls.

We cannot better take a temporary leave of them than by accompanying the kind and self-forgetting lady superintendent to her small private sitting-room, if a place subject to the constant influx of individuals can be called private. It was in a corner of this singularly unostentatious apartment that a little company of young girls met regularly to pray to Almighty God for increased space. They were at that time limited to the Welbeck Institute, of which this room is part. Who shall dare to say that prayer is not answered? Who shall affirm that the Great Giver of all good gifts did not open the way from the smaller house to the larger in response to the innocent petitions of His youthful and believing suppliants? None but the blind sceptic. Therefore we close this sketch with the texts, "Pray without ceasing." "Knock and it shall be opened unto you." "Ask and ye shall receive." "I will pray to my Father, and He shall give you another comforter."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

ONE OF YOUR GIRLS.—We do not know whether the Guild for Aid in Home Duties train ladies'-maids, but you might write to the secretary, Mrs. Henslow, Zeals Rectory, Bath. You would require to be a fair dressmaker and hairdresser, and be capable, tidy, and clean, with pleasant, respectful manners and address.

W. M. A.—The Sunderbunds is a wild tract of swamp and forest, which terminates the sea-face of the Delta, through which the united streams of the Ganges and Brahmaputra find their way into the Bay of Bengal. The area is estimated at from 5570 to 7530 miles. The population is very sparse; both ricecutters and woodcutters only come for the season. The name is probably derived from the jungles of Sundri trees, which are used for boat-building. Cultivation is extending at present, but tigers are numerous, as well as other wild animals, and the climate is dangerous to Europeans. An enormous boat traffic is carried on between Calcutta and East Bengal, through the Sunderbunds, and from them the firewood used in Calcutta is mostly obtained.

A DAUGHTER OF ALBION.—The spelling and the composition seem very good, and the writing will improve in time. Many thanks for your kind letter. We are glad that you appreciate our paper.

ANXIOUS TO KNOW.—Perhaps the Utopian Reading Society (Secretary, Miss Gibb, Glenlyon, The Avenue, Beckenham, Kent) might suit you. If it should not prove to be a "Half-hour" Reading Society, there is one conducted by Miss Duckworth, Elmswood, Mosely Hill, Liverpool. The subscription is one shilling, payable in advance.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A CONSTANT READER.—The passage, "She sat like patience on a monument, smiling at grief," is taken from Shakespeare; you will find it in his Twelfth Night. October 1st, 1866, was a Monday. June 9th, 1868, was a Tuesday. September 24th, 1870, was a Saturday.

ANXIOUS LIZ.—The first London Board school was opened July 12th, 1873, in Whitechapel.

BRIGHTON sends us a few verses on the words "Jesus called a little child unto Him." We are sorry for her distress on the loss of the child, her little scholar; but she has comfort in remembering her own endeavours to lead her to her Saviour. Out of eight verses the word "sweet" occurs in seven of them. We regard the giving way to such a state of mind as she describes as sinful. She seems in a most unhealthy, morbid condition of mind and body.

VERITAS (Hospital for Incurables).—We advise you to write to Messrs. Maclure, Macdonald, and Co. for a copy of "The Story of a King's Daughter," and the editor of that little report of an admirable society may be able to give you the address of the secretary of the "Shut-in Society" of invalids. We think it is an American society, but it may have a branch in England, and if not it would not be difficult to organise one for the mutual comfort of sufferers like yourself.

MAY.—We do not think any of our girls do well when they marry a godless or irreligious and unliking man. If they love God themselves, how sad will be the home, and how great the division of interests! If a man loves a girl very truly, he will try to improve himself in order to win her, we think.

A THANKFUL GOVERNESS.—There is a Home for Governesses at 44, Fornosia Street, Maida Vale, at a charge each of 10s. 6d. a week. Also the Ladies' Home at 53, Abbey Road, St. John's Wood, which supplies medical attendance as well as board and lodging, at from 13s. to 16s. a week. A recommendation from a subscriber is required; hon. sec., Miss Alcock, 22, Somerset Street, and Miss E. D. Simpson, 44, Porchester Street, Hyde Park, W. Also Governesses' Home, 47, Harley Street, W., at 15s. a week; admission by ladies' committee. And the Home for Unemployed Governesses, 9, St. Stephen's Square, Westbourne Park, W.

CARRIE.—We know of nothing to recommend for your friend, except change of air to a mountainous or hilly country. The steady use of gymnastics will sometimes help, as well as rubbing and out-of-door exercise.

KATHLEEN.—The new book, "The Girl's Own Indoor Book," is in one volume, not in parts. 2. We should think the painting has been kept in a damp place, and the spots have been the result.

SWEET SEVENTEEN is clearly too young to think of marriage at present, and so she had better tell this to the young man in question. When she is older and wiser she will know what she wants, and had much better delay.

NEKAYAH.—The lines you enclose are not "blank verse." Each line should consist of ten feet, but the breaks and full-stop periods must fall in irregular distances. Lines cannot run regularly on to the tenth foot, as in Heroics. You should study the intervals in a blank-verse poem of one of our first poets.

A SURREY IDYLL.

By LILY WATSON.

CHAPTER I.

"Who could have believed that at so short a distance from town we should be stranded like two shipwrecked mariners!"

The tone of this exclamation showed a sense of deep personal injury. And yet the driving rain that was streaming down the window of the little dull waiting room at a Surrey country station was decidedly impartial in its assaults. Had it not been for a certain touch of good humour in the voice, one would have been disposed to class the speaker among those spoiled children of the world who seem to imagine that even inexorable Nature ought to make things smooth and pleasant for their special benefit!

The occupants of the waiting-room were four. First the speaker, a slight, graceful young lady, clad in grey, with fair hair and merry blue eyes, but a pallor of complexion that showed her to have been recently an invalid; another girl, similarly dressed, a little older and more robust in appearance, with soft brown hair and a gentle gravity of expression; a homely village bride, whose red face was disfigured by the staring orange blossoms in her limp white tulle bonnet; and a middle-aged bridesmaid, also red and homely, and bedizened in white. The light heliotrope dresses of the two latter were spotted with rain, and they wore an indescribable aspect of damp bedraggled finery and disappointment, very piteous to witness. Without, in the booking-office, the bridegroom was tramping about and exchanging cheery observations with the station-master. His wedding finery was fortunately of too substantial a character to be damaged by bad weather!

The bell rang, the wedding party hurried off to catch the up train, and the two sisters, Olive and Blanche Woodford, were left alone.

"What can induce people to make such preposterous objects of themselves just because they happen to have been married?" exclaimed Blanche, merrily. "Did you ever see such a contrast as between the faces of those two women and their headgear? I could scarcely help laughing as they sat there, so conscious of their hideous finery—poor things!"

"Poor things!" echoed Olive, the elder, far more sympathetically. "I was so sorry for them. They had evidently been caught in the rain, and their fine clothes that they had taken so much pains about were all ruined. I think it was most pitiful, for I am sure they could not afford the loss. And how cold they must have been in those white lace scarves!"

"Why couldn't they spend their money on a good thick ulster apiece, instead of such absurdity?"

"Well, I don't think I should like to be married in an ulster, though it is the Englishwoman's national garment. Would you, Blanche?"

"If I had a red face, I would not make a perfect spectacle of myself with white tulle and orange blossoms," retorted Blanche, "especially on a day like this!"

"You know it is only the beginning of September, and it was a glorious morning, so they might be excused. Then, don't you think there is something pathetic in the poor women trying to make themselves charming in the best way they know?"

"I think there is something very pathetic in our being kept here like this," replied her sister, weary of the subject. And she began to revert to the speculations with which she had greeted the fact of the "trap" from their farmhouse lodgings not being at the station to meet them. The heavy rain that had come on since the train left Victoria made this comretemps really a serious one.

Olive and Blanche were orphan girls, and lived with their unmarried brother, a curate in a populous London parish. Their means were slender, and as Blanche, after a slight but trying illness, was ordered change of air, rooms had been taken by letter in a Surrey farmhouse, far from village or station. This inauguration of their visit was not a very encouraging one.

"Pray let us see if we can't do something, Olive. I am sure the waggonette is not coming," urged Blanche. And the elder sister went on the platform to consult the station-master and porters, all to no avail.

"Was there a fly to be got?" "No, there were no flies in those parts. There might be one at the 'Red Lion,' at Heathcote, about three miles away, and there might not. He charged very dear, too, did the man, even if you could get him."

"Was there no other means of getting a conveyance?"

The station-master looked vaguely round the dripping horizon and away to Leith Hill.

"Well, Mr. Brooks—he was a farmer in these parts—would be bringing his milk to the station in about three hours' time; perhaps he would take the ladies up to Miller's in the milk cart, but he couldn't say; they wasn't on the best of terms, wasn't Brooks and Miller's."

"What a savage place we have come to!" exclaimed town-bred Blanche, half in fun, half in earnest.

"We must get someone, then, to go up to Miller's and see after the trap," said Olive. But the official looked doubtful. "Miller's" was more than three miles away; they couldn't be spared, couldn't the porters. Perhaps a lad from the village might happen to come, and then they would send him—if he could go.

This was all most dubious comfort, and Olive began to feel really concerned. It was one of her objects in life just now to shield this delicate sister from discomfort, and Blanche's white face appealed to her in mute reproach. As they stood on the platform talking to the station-master a young man in a mackintosh and leggings came suddenly out of the booking-office; a tall, stalwart fellow, with the ruddiness born of Surrey air on his cheeks. He would have looked like a prosperous farmer, if that class were not extinct in England just at present, but he was evidently not town-bred, "not a club habitué," Blanche inwardly remarked. To Olive's surprise the station-master instantly appealed to the new comer as "Mr. Roger Dale," and related her perplexity. She withdrew a few steps.

"I had better go to the village and see what conveyance I can find. I will do it with pleasure," observed the young man, with some awkwardness of manner but true kindness.

"Oh no! thank you; I could do that—only I understood there was no chance of getting any fly there," said Olive. "And I would rather not hinder your time."

"I will find something or other on wheels," replied the stranger. "And as for my time, I was only going to Horsham; there's no hurry about that."

"I really cannot trouble you," began Olive, decidedly, but he had disappeared.

"Well, the Surrey manners and customs are certainly primitive," began Blanche, in her mirthful tone. "First we can find no means of escaping from this station; next comes a worthy farmer and adopts our cause as if he were our brother, or, at any rate, a very near relation. I wonder what Alan Graeme would say to this? He will think he ought not to let you go roaming about the country alone."

There was not much brightness in Olive's responsive smile. She had been engaged for three years to a young Scotch doctor in Edinburgh. He was clever, but poor, and all his efforts and work by day and by night were not yet successful in providing an income that would enable him to marry. So Olive, although she looked forward to the future hopefully, and was not afraid of poverty, had occasionally a little sinking of heart; the distance was so great, and money was so scarce with both of them, and Alan's marvellous powers were so slow in winning recognition!

In about half an hour's time the rumble of wheels was heard, and Roger Dale appeared driving an unmistakable light cart, of the description used by tradesmen.

"This is the best I could do," he explained. "I borrowed it from the grocer, but he had no one to drive it, and as I have nothing to do this wet day, I will be very happy to drive the ladies up to Miller's myself."

"But you are going to Horsham; we would rather not trouble you."

"It doesn't matter in the least; in fact, it will be a convenience, for I shall drive on to Horsham, after putting you down at Miller's, instead of going by train," explained Roger. "Perhaps you will spread some shawls to sit upon; and then they must send down for your luggage."

"You'd better, miss," urged the station-master. Then in a confidential undertone he added, "Mr. Roger Dale, he's well known in these parts, and he's always ready to do any one a kindness."

Unconventional as the proceeding seemed, there was really nothing for it but to accept Mr. Dale's offer. Seated on the floor of the cart, on a carpet of shawls, with umbrellas forming a tent over their heads, the two Misses Woodford allowed themselves to be jolted rapidly along, down the hill from the station, up the hill again, and along a broad road with a far-reaching prospect (if they could only have seen it) on either side. There were the fertile undulating plains of field and wood: the "blessed country," as it is well called in the inscription on Leith Hill Tower, that stood upon its purple ridge yonder, and seemed proudly to survey the scene.

"Rosalind, Celia, and Touchstone in the forest of Arden!" observed Blanche, in a whisper.

"Be quiet, Blanche; he will hear you!"

"My dear girl," retorted Blanche, peeping up at the waterproof back of their driver, "you may be sure he has never heard of any such personages. He will think they are some people we know at home."

"Don't make fun of anybody who is kind to you," reproved Olive. But her flippant sister only laughed in reply.

At length the cart left the road, drove down a long avenue; then in front of a haystack, a miscellaneous collection of fowls, a duck pond, it went bumping and thumping over ruts, until it reached a gate. The rain had ceased, and the girls were thankful to alight.

"Here, you Jack! Come here. Where is that trap?" shouted Roger, angrily.

"Jack," a loutish youth of seventeen, came and sheepishly held the gate open for the ladies to pass through. They could not repress an exclamation of delight at the beautiful old farmhouse which broke upon their sight. A flagged tiny path led between grass and standard rose-trees to a porch. The whole front broke into projecting gables, large and small, below which the latticed casements peeped forth from climbing roses, and the old timber-work contrasted with the stone. The fruit trees of the kitchen garden shaded the side of the house. The roof was beautiful with the rich tint of age; even the chimney in its massive tall outline was picturesque. In the door stood a stout, round-faced woman in short print skirt and woollen jacket, consternation struggling with hospitality in her broad countenance.

It was soon explained after all. Mrs. Miller was "not much of a scholar;" in plainer terms, she could neither read nor write! The child who did deputy for her mother in this respect had mistaken 3 p.m. for 5 p.m. Blanche, who sent the post-card foretelling their arrival, was rather given to vagueness of outline in her figures. Olive turned to thank Mr. Dale very heartily for his kindness, but he had gone, and she saw the cart speeding along the distant avenue.

The door led into a large, old-fashioned kitchen or hall, with a vast open chimney and polished "dogs," a tall clock in a shining oaken case, a corner cupboard, a wooden settle by the fireplace, and a cabinet with glass doors, behind which old china cups peeped forth. No work more menial than the sorting and mending of linen was ever permitted in this sacred apartment, which Mrs. Miller looked upon with pardonable pride. The real working kitchens lay away to the left. A door to the right admitted the delighted guests into their large sitting-room, with its long, low lattice window, looking first into a garden breathing fragrance from every wet leaf and flower; then away across undulating, descending fields towards the ridge of hills. Here was an ample couch covered with old-fashioned chintz, a corner cupboard again, and a fireplace in which stood a great pot of roses. The good-natured hostess fussed about, explaining, apologising, asking for orders, all in a breath, and with the circumlocution and lack of sequence peculiar to her class.

"Mr. Roger Dale? He's the son of old Squire Dale, he be; he lives about three mile from here, in the Manor House. They do say he's worth a deal of money. He needn't hire a cart to go to Horsham, that he didn't. But oh, dear! deary me! to think that the young ladies should have had to be so put about!"

From the house-place a flight of steps led to a narrow uneven gallery; but the delicious bedrooms that opened out of it! To Olive and Blanche, accustomed to town quarters that looked over a waste of chimney tops, the large airy chambers with their white-curtained four-posters smelling of lavender, the short dimity curtains at the latticed windows, were inexpressibly tempting and restful. The largest room was instantly apportioned to Blanche, and the girls were glad to lay aside their wraps in preparation for the huge tea Mrs. Miller was zealously preparing below.

Blanche was enthusiastic about every detail, and quite sure she should get "as strong as a horse" directly. Olive was doubly delighted on her own and her sister's account. And indeed the Londoner who could not be pleased with a Surrey farmhouse would be very ungrateful. Of all havens of rest, refreshment of body and mind, and homelike comfort in pure, sweet air, within easy distance of town, they certainly bear away the palm. Mr. Roger Dale—"Touchstone" as the mischievous Blanche persisted in calling him—came in for a share of the sisters' conversation.

They would have been surprised as they sat early the next morning at work in the porch, wondering at the energetic but somewhat desultory farming of Widow Miller and her sons, could they have known that their cicerone of yesterday was discussing them with a near neighbour of "Miller's" in a field of stubble not very far away. The two young men had come out to shoot partridges, but Roger's mind was full of something else besides the sport.

"Do you know who has taken Miller's farm?" he inquired; "I drove two ladies up yesterday, but never heard their name."

"I was over there the day before, and the good woman gave me the whole history," rejoined his friend. "The girls are called Woodford; orphans; sisters of a bachelor London clergyman with whom they live—younger one has had an illness; come down here to recruit for a couple of months."

Roger had suddenly stopped short.

"Well, what's the matter now?" inquired his friend, with impatience.

"Why, that name has rather curious association for me. Woodford—it was the name of a fellow who would marry father's younger sister long ago; and as father was her guardian and opposed to the marriage, there was a fearful storm. He never saw them afterwards. By the bye, they are both dead!" exclaimed Roger, new light breaking in upon him; "why shouldn't these be their children?"

"It would be a curious coincidence," said the other, "but if I were you I should veil the fact from your governor. He is not likely to want family quarrels raked up again at his time of life."

"I don't know about that. I should like to find up some cousins in this dull place——"

"And make Squire Dale in a towering rage? I should let it alone. Let sleeping dogs lie! that's my advice."

"I shan't take it, then," retorted Roger. "I shall find out, somehow or other, if I am right."

"Then you will probably repent it," observed the other; "but if you want to shoot any partridges this morning we had better not stand here all day."

The stolid Roger was in an unusual state of excitement, and followed his friend, full of inward speculation as to whether the strange coincidence were really fact, or only a suggestion of his own fancy.

HINTS ABOUT HOUSEKEEPING.

BY MEDICUS.

In any section of social or political economy, reform—if conducted carefully, thoughtfully, and with no semblance to the headstrong, heedless rush of revolution—should always be welcomed, and is always welcomed by the wise.

Well, as I have written it, that first sentence of mine must stand. I admit it sounds rather ponderous, and only hope its severity will not frighten my gentle readers from scanning this article of mine. After all it is nothing very dreadful or weighty I am going to write about, something rather nice in fact. I sing of the kitchen and cookery.

There is a semi-smile curling round your lips as you read: I can see it with the eye of my imagination. You think that this will be a somewhat dry sermon, and for once in a way you are half inclined to turn over the leaf and miss your "Medicus."

But as a rule I do not write in a dry-as-dust style; I have too much fire and fun in me, doctor though I be. Moreover, I do not think that I ever gave our girls anything but good advice. What I have to propose may seem very outré to some of you.

"You are going to propose, Mr. Medicus, that we should disport ourselves in the kitchen and learn to cook; and spoil both hands and complexion."

Well, yes, I am going to propose something akin to what you say; but if you do as I shall tell you, I promise you that you shall neither spoil hands nor complexion, but that both shall be improved, and that the work—if work it may be called, which is really half play—shall be good for your health, and good not only for your eyesight, but your insight as well. I promise you also that it shall make you more happy, better able to enjoy your walks or your rides, and able to sleep more sweetly and soundly at night. Over and above all this it will give you a new power—the power to make others happy and comfortable, your brothers for instance; and I can assure you nearly all men are ogres to a certain extent. When a man is hungry and does not see a prospect of getting anything reasonable to eat, he may talk and smile and all that, but he is merely acting, he is not on good terms with himself nor with the world around him. These are psycho-physiological facts, and no one can gainsay them. You can hardly credit what I say perhaps; very well, give my compliments to your brother and ask him if I am not right.

I am of the opinion that a good dinner or an honest "tea" can give as much genuine enjoyment to a friend as any music you can bring out of your piano, or I elicit from my old Cremona. If so, is there not quite as much honour and glory to be got from being able to cook as from being able to play?

Hear what splendid John Ruskin has to say on this very subject.

"What does 'cooking' mean? It means the knowledge of Medea, and of Circe, and of Calypso, and of Helen, and of Rebekah, and of the Queen of Sheba. It means the knowledge of all herbs, and fruits, and balms, and spices; and of all that is healing and sweet in fields and groves, and savoury in meats; it means carefulness, and inventiveness, and watchfulness, and willingness, and readiness of appliance; it means the economy of your great-grandmothers, and the science of modern chemists; it means much tasting and no wasting; it means English thoroughness, and French art, and Arabian hospitality; and it means, in fine, that you are to be perfectly and always 'ladies'—and, as you are to see imperatively that everybody has something pretty to put on, so you are to see, yet more imperatively, that everybody has something nice to eat."

As my readers are not all Girton girls, let me say a word or two about the individuals mentioned in the above extract. Medea then, if all classical history be true, was one of the most clever ladies who ever lived. They called her a sorceress, or enchantress, and there might have been such people in those days; anyhow her knowledge of herbs and other odds and ends was so great that she was easily able to extricate her husband Jason from unparalleled troubles and woes, enabling him to conquer his enemies and perform the most wonderful labours that the world has ever read of. She was a true woman, even if she was an enchantress.

Circe was very learned too, but made a bad use of her capabilities, which only shows that knowledge, if not rightly applied, may work a deal of woe. I never liked Circe, and would not name one of my dogs after her.

Calypso, though, was a greatly-to-be-admired and much-to-be-marvelled-at lady. She was the goddess of silence. I do not myself like a silent lady. She makes me think of Paddy's parrot. But nevertheless silence, we are told, is golden, and it certainly is so in the kitchen, for if the tongue wags much the hands will not. So splendid John was right in bringing in Calypso.

Fair Helen of Troy you all know about. She was very beautiful and very clever, and it was not altogether her fault that there was war about her. We gather from this mention of Helen that it is possible to be beautiful even when making an apple-dumpling or stuffing a turkey.

With all reverence let us pass from this heroine of ancient history to a name far nobler, to a story far more touching, far more full of beauty, far more true to the nature and simple grace of womankind—the story of Rebekah. I need not tell it. You know it as perfectly as I do. But the first picture or scene therefrom comes up before my mind's eye as I write. It is the evening of what has been a sweltering, broiling day—a day in which the sun has been blazing fiercely in a sky of cloudless blue, but is now declining red and fiery towards the western hills—a day on which the dust has burned beneath the feet, and weary camels and tired men have struggled slowly citywards from the wilderness, and knelt or thrown themselves down by a well. People come and people go, but heed them not. Will no one draw a drop of water from the depths of that great tank, that the tired travellers may drink and be refreshed?

At last there comes a beautiful but simple maiden with pitcher on her shoulder. Her innocent looks embolden the servant of Abraham to beg that he may drink a little water. All the kindly woman's nature comes gushing out then. She feels not only for the man, but for the dumb beasts with their pleading eyes. She draws water for all.

Though told but briefly in the Book of books, it is easy to fill in the lights and shades of such a life-story as that of Rebekah's. It is evident she was all that a wife, mother, and mistress of a house ought to be, and that she did not think it derogatory to her great beauty to prepare with her own hands the savoury meats that were to grace her husband's table. So much for Rebekah.

The Queen of Sheba was a lady, but one who thirsted for knowledge; else why her visit to the great King Solomon?

And now to draw nearer home, both as regards time and place. A great many girls—well, let me say young ladies for once in a way—complain that after they leave school they have really nothing to do, which they can do heartily and with right goodwill. They take up "fad" after "fad," and these fads blaze brightly enough while they last, but like a will o' the wisp they soon go out, and those who adopted them are more in the dark than ever.

Parish work is a favourite with many in the country, and if gone into with energy it is really a good thing. But I suggest not only that cooking in a rational way should be learned, but the management of the servants, and the whole household as well. I say boldly that the married man whose wife can superintend and manage his house, and properly supervise the domestics without friction or crossness, and who knows to a nicety when the dinner is properly cooked, and what is needed to make it a success—without waste or stinginess—is blessed above the generality of men. An old proverb says that when poverty comes in at the door love flies out at the window. Well, I do not know about that, but I have known many cases in which a bad dinner sank love for the time being to about three degrees below freezing point. It is getting less and less the fashion for men to marry for beauty or personal attractions alone. Those that do so generally repent it before long. Let us take a rough and ready example. Jones has married a beauty, but she does not know how to cook a potato, nor how long the simplest joint takes to do, and the servants therefore are the real mistresses in the house, and do pretty much as they please. There is a general slatternliness everywhere, and a topsy-turvy air in kitchen, scullery, and pantry. The cook, perhaps, is good-natured, but she cannot get the others to work up to her; so dishes are spoiled and meals are seldom or never ready at the regular time, though if only for health's sake they ought to be "to a tick," as the saying is. Jones has been slaving away in his office all day, and has a little distance to walk through the mud and rain, but he has visions of a brightly lighted dining-room, a well-spread table, and a comfortable fire; and the very thoughts of such home comforts banish weariness and ennui. But the vision flies away when he enters his house. His wife is at the piano, "trying over something." Even from the hall he can hear the sounds of laughter in the kitchen, and Mrs. Jones wheels round as he enters the room. "Dinner won't be ready for half an hour yet, dear." Poor Jones! He simply sighs, and perhaps goes away and smokes. Can you blame him?

Now there are schools for cookery almost everywhere. I am not much taken with them, and I speak advisedly when I state that as a rule the branches taught are tooknick-knackish, too Frenchified. Girls learn little at them, and what they do learn they forget. Englishmen are wholesome, solid eaters. I maintain that English girls ought to be taught English cooking first, and let the fricassees follow. And this they must learn at their own homes, in their own kitchens, with their own fingers in the pie. It would be cheaper far and better to give the cook—honest soul—an extra pound a month and let her be the preceptor.

But mothers should let their daughters take entire management of the household for months at a time, they themselves merely supervising. The girl who is thus honoured should give orders to tradespeople; should get the bills and pay the bills; should see that she gets tender meat from the butcher, wholesome vegetables from the greengrocer, and justice from all; she should see, too, that things are done at the right time, that rooms are properly aired and dusted and set in order; and above all things she should study the dispositions of those under her, and be able to give orders with calm and unruffled dignity, never either losing her temper or being for one moment too familiar. If she lives in the country she ought to know how and when to gather shrub-fruit and herbs for preserving, and also how to manufacture jams and jellies. A girl that can do all this, and do it cheerfully, is a treasure in her mother's house, and when she comes to have a house of her own she will be a blessing.

As to the actual cooking, what I most earnestly desire to impress upon my readers is the necessity of learning to prepare the essentials of a good meal before going into the fine art business. As it is, the teaching of cookery usually begins at the wrong end, just as some people in China begin their dinners with nuts, sweets, edible bird-nests, and jim-jams, gradually working down to the solids and finishing off with the soups.

As to books on cookery, all that I have ever seen are too intricate, too voluminous, and altogether confusing—what our cook calls "worriting, sir." Moreover, the authors who write them seem to glory in bad French. Why dishes at a table should not have straightforward English names has always been a puzzle to me. But I trust there is a good time coming, when the people of these islands will feel independent enough to stand on the dignity of their own cuisine, and call a haddock a haddock.

It must not be forgotten, however, by would-be girl-housekeepers that the serving up of a meal is one-half the battle. The appearance of a well-laid table positively takes the digestion and appetite by storm: immaculate linen, shining plates, glittering glass and silver, and a flower. O, we must have a flower, be it ever so humble!

For breakfast, dinner, or supper! there is always plenty of things to ring the changes on, and change there certainly should be every day, and every meal should be served with the regularity of a ship's chronometer. But beware of fuss; beware of talking much or giving many orders to the servants in the hearing of those around the table. It is here that Calypso should come in; and do not forget it, please. Many a man's dinner has been completely spoiled and his digestion deranged for the day by hearing servants nagged at during the process of bringing in the dishes.

At a future day, with our Editor's kind permission, I may have something more to say about food and health; meanwhile let me conclude with a word or two of advice to our little housekeepers.

Do everything calmly and quietly. Take time to think. I want you to find home-cooking a healthful employment, and if you worry yourself you will get nervous, and nervousness spoils both sleep and complexion, and digestion also. The cooking of any dish should not spoil your appetite by any manner of means. But you are not to bend too much over the range, nor heat the face and hands to an uncomfortable degree.

Finally, you must give yourself just a quarter of an hour's rest to cool down in your own room before appearing at table. Half an hour would be better. Do not hurry even in dressing.

A LONDON ART SCHOOL.

By ONE OF THE PUPILS.

In all arts, no matter how great the individual talent, instruction in the various technicalities of the special branch of art, and a sound foundation, undoubtedly save time. Firstly, as, owing to the perversity of human nature, a self-taught student invariably begins the wrong way to work, and has then laboriously to unlearn; and, secondly, one gets at once the quickest and best style of working by adopting the teacher's method, arrived at by him after years of practical experience. Look at most amateurs' half-finished drawings, and you will see what I mean. If a water-colour sketch, all crispness of touch and clearness are early lost, the washes being muddled about whilst wet, owing to no settled knowledge of how to produce the effects aimed at, trusting to chance to find out how to get them; and fate, alas! is rarely favourable. Perhaps, however, an inferior oil painting is worse, hopelessly smeary and slimy, all brush work lost, and the paint drying into lumps and hard edges. As I have personally suffered these adversities in both branches of painting, I can speak feelingly. From a tiny child I have always drawn (horses being my speciality), and have studied them and their ways deeply. Without this study it is useless for anyone to take up this particular subject, as the British public are far too "horsey" to tolerate a badly-drawn "gee," and also the endless varieties of character and action can only be successfully attempted or even seen by a real horse-lover. One great reason of the popularity of Landseer's and Rosa Bonheur's works is the insight shown into a horse's mind and thoughts. Almost anyone after a little study of anatomy can draw a moderately correct animal, with the proper amount of legs, and generally a very strong development of mane and tail, but without the speaking look and small marks of character that distinguish one horse from another.

BEFORE THE MASTERS OF HER ART.
(From the painting exhibited in the Royal Academy by W. A. Menzies.)

My education in drawing was the ordinary schoolroom one of copying from feeble lithographs, etc., with the exception of one term at a provincial school of art, where I won a South Kensington prize for original sketches of horses. Soon after this I went to stay with an artist in London for a short visit, and whilst there my paintings were seen by Mr. Heywood Hardy and others, who all prophesied success, but deplored my want of technical excellence. One well-known old artist in particular urged me whilst there was time to lay a solid foundation, and regularly ground myself in drawing. He told me he was "too old to do this himself, but he felt the want of it severely every day."

Taking the advice so kindly given, I made diligent inquiries for a good and cheap art school, and at length fixed upon Mr. Calderon's, in St. John's Wood. It is considered one of the best in London; the percentage of his students successfully passing the examination into the Royal Academy schools is larger than any other, also several Royal Academicians have entrusted the art education of their sons and daughters to Mr. Calderon, a convincing proof of their opinions.

The terms are very moderate, only six guineas per quarter, exclusive of the evening classes; easels and stools are supplied by the school. There are six masters, including the principal, Mr. Calderon, three attending every alternate day. When I first joined there were 160 students, elderly men and women, youths of both sexes, and children from eight years old and upwards. For those who prefer it there is a ladies' room and a lady teacher. The ground floor of the school is divided into three class-rooms—the antique, the painting room, and the aforementioned ladies' room.

Perhaps a short account of my life there, beginning with the first day, may best give the information that other struggling artists besides myself may be anxious for. I had capital rooms, board and lodging, for thirty shillings per week; and there is also a boarding-house in connection with the school. School hours begin at 9.30, so I presented myself very punctually with two paintings to show the masters, that they might be able to judge what course of study would be best. Several girls had already arrived, and good-naturedly pointed out the dressing-room, and introduced me to the master for the day on his arrival. The two sample paintings I began by showing him were of horses with landscape; and as I was sure of my horses' anatomy, the master was very complimentary on my "evident talent," and credited me with an all-round knowledge of drawing I did not possess! He told me to join the life-class, and took me to a little office in the school, where at certain hours you can buy canvases, paints, etc. I bought a canvas, and was then placed amongst a circle of students ranged round the model, an exceedingly pretty, refined woman, with pitiful dark eyes, quaintly dressed in grey, with amber touches of colour. I felt so sorry for her, as she used to grow whiter and whiter from the fatigue of keeping in one attitude from 10.0 a.m. to 12.30, with five minutes' "rest" every hour. How eagerly she watched the clock, and at the hour jumped down from the platform for a stretch, and then began to knit a sock for her baby.

About an hour after I had begun to try and draw just the head and shoulders of the model, the master came round to inspect, and found my attempt so faulty in drawing that he advised me, if I had courage enough, to begin at the very beginning of Mr. Calderon's drawing course, and work my way up through all the stages. As I had had a picture accepted by the Royal Academy, and published a financially successful book of "Hunting Sketches," this was a great blow to my pride, but I agreed to the proposal, and settled to begin in the afternoon.

It was now 12.30, and all the students made a regular stampede for lunch. At this hour a window is opened in one of the rooms round the school-yard, and through it, as at a refreshment stall, soup, coffee, buns, etc., are served out to hungry purchasers. After the first day, when I brought sandwiches, I used to get a cup of boiling water from the refreshment window, and make myself soup from a pot of Liebig's extract. All sorts of cooking used to go on over the dressing-room fire—even chops! Some of the girls had their own kettles and saucepans, which they kept in lockers, with pots of jam, tins of biscuits, etc.; also last, but in many cases not least, dry shoes to change on their arrival. With astonishment I watched the girls eating dry sandwiches, and still drier sponge cakes, with only an orange or apple to slake their thirst! Many, regardless of red noses and indigestion, used to read over their lunch, not novels as I fully expected, but such books as Ruskin's, Carlyle's, and Emerson's Essays. At 1.30 school begins again, and I set to work at the "beggarly elements." I was given a cast of a freehand ornament, to be drawn the exact size. I began putting it in with loose, sketchy lines, and in an hour thought it finished; but when the master saw it he said, "Those sort of lines are not allowed here," rubbed it all out, and then, sharpening my pencil to a needle's point, drew a delicate, firm, prolonged line as a pattern. At 4 p.m. the afternoon schools end. Many used to stay for the evening classes as well, refreshing themselves in the interval with tea.

So ends my first day's adventures, and I will wind up with a description of the course of instruction as far as I have gone.

After a bout at the freehand casts, I began to try for my "Pass" (so called from the word being written by Mr. Calderon on any successful drawings sent in for examination), to be promoted to a more advanced stage, for at this time I was doing the same work as a tiny boy of eight, who, by the way, became a fast friend of mine! The "Pass" work may be sent in for examination every Saturday or Monday before 10, and consists of a large sort of design in relief on a cast. There is a choice of two, and in a weak moment took the "Alhambra design," a terribly intricate pattern supposed to be a copy of a portion of the Alhambra. The other "Pass" subject is a very involved looking lily or passion-flower, with foliage, in rather high relief. In addition to doing one of these, an ordinary cast of an ornament must be enlarged exactly in proportion and to scale.

After a hard week's work at the Alhambra, I had drawn it all in; but it was such an intricate and fully covered design, that if one took one's eye off for a second it took a good hunt to find the place again. I took this "Frankenstein's" monster to Mr. Calderon on Monday, but after carefully looking at it he pointed out several places where the lines were not fine and good, nor did my rendering of the design sufficiently explain itself; in fact, he said it was "too amateurish!" I worked away at it again, and after two days had, at last, perfected the "Alhambra," and then began on my other "Pass" work, viz., the enlargement. I settled to make my ornament one-third larger than the original, which, alas! involved me in endless arithmetical calculations, sums of long division and rule of three. Had I chosen an even number, say three or four times as large, I should have escaped this complication. Before sending my papers in they were looked at by one of the masters, and signed with his initials, and on Saturday afternoon I left them in the office. To my great joy, on Monday I found the joyful word "Passed" signed on the drawings, and later in the day was complimented by Mr. Calderon himself on the style of the work!

"Outline features" was the next step. Four of each feature, viz., nose, eyes, mouth, and ears, had to be drawn in outline, with the smallest amount of shading (all done with charcoal), and in four different positions, each set of features on a separate sheet of cartridge paper. These I "Passed" quickly, and then began shading. Armed with a bottle of chalk powder, stumps, and a fine pointed piece of india-rubber, I was planted on a donkey easel before a very simple-looking cube, and began to shade it. For about two days I toiled away, trying to get anything like an even surface of shadow, but I only made terribly smeary-looking marks, and here and there jet black spots. My fellow-students were very kind in trying to help me, pointing out the way that had helped them, and encouraging me by saying I wasn't a bit stupid in not being able to do it at once, as they had taken quite as long, and many had taken a fortnight or three weeks, to get into the knack. On the third day I found out the trick of the work, and when I had finished the cube a student told me she had been sent by one of the masters to look at it, on account of its "superior manipulation." The next step, after doing the cube, is to try for a "shaded Pass." A cast of apples or plums must be faultlessly shaded, and then a set of "shaded features." Then comes outline heads, and finally heads and full-length figures, exquisitely shaded and finely stippled.

At this stage of my career I and several other of the students went, by Mr. Calderon's permission (rather grudgingly given, as he said "everyone wished to rush at once into painting heads, regardless of weak drawing, so always remained amateurs"), alternate days, into the painting room, beginning first by painting a cast in monochrome. In the "rests," or as a little relief from the severe technical work, we used to make little fancy sketches on the margin of our paper. The tiny sailor boy was capital at taking likenesses, and did several for me of students working near him. An Irish girl was first-rate at dogs; she drew some playing the violoncello, piano, and drum, with great spirit and humour; another had drawn a gruesome picture of a man dangling from the gallows by moonlight. My speciality was horses, and it seemed such a physical relief to let one's pencil go with a good fling in a horse galloping, rearing, etc. It used to be a great amusement to go round and look at all the variously ornamented boards. One of the masters, seeing some of my sketches of horses, said, "If you would only draw other things with the same knowledge and love that you show in horse-drawing, you could do anything."

The life in this paper may sound hard and irksome, and the hours long, but everyone seemed very happy, and in earnest. I enjoyed my first term intensely, and had the pleasure of feeling a real improvement in my power of drawing and command of hand, and am eagerly looking forward to again enrolling myself as a "Calderonian."

SOPHIE TURNER.

A TALE OF THE NORFOLK BROADS.

WHEN Mr. Leicester reached the ark, he found all Noah's goods and chattels which were movable standing outside, while Noah, with his jersey sleeves rolled up, and armed with a pail and a broom, was washing the door.

"Good-day, Noah. Why, you look as if you were on the move."

"No, sir; I have been having a good clean up before my little girl comes home. I have just finished though; if you don't mind sitting down outside for a few minutes, I'll soon have the place fit to ask you into."

Mr. Leicester sat down, not sorry to have a few minutes' respite before he dealt the blow it was his duty to deliver; and in a little while Noah proudly asked him to walk into the ark and see if it was not fit even for Eve.

"It is as fit as love can make it; but, Noah, would it be a great trial to you if Eve never returned?" said Mr. Leicester, looking hard at his host.

"She has not deceived me a second time, has she, sir?" said Noah, sharply, a shadow coming over his fine face.

"No, no, nothing of the kind; only I have changed my mind; and, after earnest consideration, I have come to the conclusion that Eve and Arthur had better be married at once, in fact, I will marry them at my own church to-morrow if you will consent."

"It seems very sudden, sir. You and I were quite agreed that the marriage was most unsuitable, and must never take place. May I ask what has made you change your opinion?"

"I would rather you did not ask me, Noah. I would rather you trusted me, when I tell you I have reason to change my opinion, and I now think it would be wrong to oppose the marriage; in fact, I am now as anxious it should take place as I was only yesterday to prevent it; though of course I am aware it must strike you as very inconsistent."

"Well, yes, sir, I won't deny it, it does. At the same time I am quite sure you would not change your opinion without a reason, and I don't see my way to changing mine without a very good reason. It seems to me, sir, God has shown my little Eve as plainly as possible that this marriage is not His will for her, therefore I cannot consent to it."

"I don't see that, Noah; but for Jack Farrar the marriage would in all probability have taken place, and I can hardly think he was doing God's will when he kidnapped Eve."

"Not consciously, but unconsciously I believe he was. I suppose God's will is fulfilled by evil men sometimes. But, however that may be, I am sure an unequal marriage like this cannot be for Eve's happiness; in a year or two Mr. Clifford will be tired of her, and then he will be sorry he married beneath him, and my little girl will be miserable," said Noah.

And to this opinion he adhered, in spite of all Mr. Leicester's arguments, until after half an hour's useless discussion, Mr. Leicester reluctantly decided he must tell him the truth.

"Well, Noah," he said at last, "I am sorry I cannot convince you, for it now becomes my painful duty to tell you something which will, I know, grieve you very much. The truth is, I have altered my opinion in consequence of something your wife has told me. She has been to see me this morning, and confessed to me that when she had my child to nurse she changed the babies, and therefore Grace is really your daughter, and Eve is mine!"

"It can't be true, sir; I never knew Mary tell a lie; but I fear she is so puffed up because Mr. Arthur wants to marry Eve, that she has invented this tale to induce you to consent to the marriage," said Noah, stroking his long white beard after his manner when troubled.

"No, Noah, I assure you, incredible as it may seem, Mrs. Oldman has told me the truth. She has deceived us all for twenty years, and I must do her the justice to say she is very penitent; she dare not tell you herself, though I have strongly urged her to do so, but I can have no doubt of the truth of her story; indeed, I have sufficient proof that it is true to satisfy a court of justice. Now you see why I am anxious this marriage should take place; as Eve is my daughter, all objection on the ground of inequality of birth is removed, and neither you nor I have any other reason to object."

"Excuse me for a minute or two, Mr. Leicester; this stroke is almost harder than I can bear," said Noah, with a gentle dignity that was very touching as he left the ark to hide his emotion. We will not follow him, for the storm that he had to weather, though brief, was very heavy, and when, a quarter of an hour later, he returned to the ark, his noble head was bowed, his blue eyes red with weeping, and he sank on to a chair as if he were exhausted after some violent physical exertion.

"Noah, my dear friend, this is a great trial for me as well as for you; let us try and help each other to bear it. I propose to say nothing about this to anyone; let it remain a secret between us three. There is no need to tell Grace or Eve; it would only grieve them both. Let me keep Grace, whom I have loved as my own child, and do you continue to regard Eve as your daughter, since she is to marry Arthur Clifford; and you will not raise any further objection?" said Mr. Leicester.

"I have no right to do so," said Noah, sadly.

"Then, in point of fact, she has lost nothing, for if she had been brought up at the Rectory I could not have wished her to marry better. But Grace would lose a great deal if she were told the truth; in fact, it would be quite impossible for a girl brought up as delicately as she has been to come and live here as she would insist on doing if she knew you were her father," said Mr. Leicester, glancing round the little kitchen, in which, clean as it was, he utterly failed to picture Grace at home.

"True, sir; Grace has all to lose, and Eve all to gain," said Noah, slowly and thoughtfully.

"Not quite all. Grace would gain a better father and mother into the bargain, while Eve would lose both father and mother, for I exceedingly doubt her ever loving me as she loves you. I have thought it all well over, and for all our sakes, but for Grace's more than all, I think we must keep this secret, at any rate during our lifetime, unless your fears with regard to Arthur are in danger of being realised, and then we may consider whether it would be well to tell him the truth; even then I should bind him to secrecy, for Grace's sake. I am afraid I appear very selfish in considering Grace so much."

"No, sir; for you see she is my daughter, not yours, whom you are considering," said Noah, with a faint attempt at a smile.

"True. Well then the best thing we can do is to drive over to Bridgham at once, and tell the young people we have decided to remove our opposition; we need not give them any reason, and they had better be married here tomorrow. Let Eve and her mother remain where they are till then, and I'll marry them: you shall give Eve away. I'll pick you up at my gate in half an hour's time; and by the way, Noah, there is one other thing we must both do—I hope I have done so already—we must forgive your poor wife, for I assure you she is very unhappy, and dreadfully afraid of your anger."

"Poor Mary! I won't be too hard on her, sir, though she has deprived me of my daughter," said Noah; but he had no opportunity of speaking to his wife that day, as since while he was at Bridgham Mrs. Oldman scrupulously kept out of his way, for she guessed when she saw him arrive in Mr. Leicester's dog-cart that the latter had told him of her confession.

Neither Eve nor Arthur manifested any curiosity as to why Mr. Leicester and Noah had so suddenly altered their opinion; they were too glad that it was so to care to know the reason of the change. At first Eve hung back, and pleaded that she might stay another week where she was, but Arthur whispered perhaps Noah and his guardian would change their minds again if they postponed the wedding, whereupon Eve gave a blushing consent. Weddings are generally allowed to be very stupid affairs, except to the parties most nearly concerned; but there was one peculiarity about this wedding which deserves to be mentioned, and that was the extreme nervousness of Mr. Leicester, whose voice was at times scarcely audible; and surely seldom was a stranger group gathered round the altar rails.

Eve dressed in a travelling-dress which Arthur had ordered in her trousseau, looked not only a lady, but a beautiful woman; the delicacy of her appearance only added to her beauty. On one side of her stood her bridegroom, Arthur

Clifford, a look of haughty defiance on his face, as though he challenged the whole world to say one word against his bride; on the other side stood Noah, in his broadman's dress, a grand-looking man, but evidently a fisherman; though he might well have sat to an artist as one of the apostles. By him stood Mrs. Oldman in her Sunday best, a prey to many emotions, fear of the coming interview with her husband predominating; and behind Eve stood Grace Leicester, the skirts of her white dress sometimes touching her real father. And one person in the church thought she looked fairer than the bride; that person was Adam Day, who remained in one of the front seats throughout the service, thinking of many possible reasons for their sudden approval of the marriage, until suddenly, as he glanced from Noah to Grace, the truth flashed upon him.

He had always thought these two beings strangely unlike the rest of mankind; they seemed to him to be denizens of another world paying a visit to this workaday one; but to-day, as he glanced from the grand face of Noah, standing with calm dignity a little behind Eve, to the slight and graceful figure robed in spotless white, he thought it looked like the face of an angel; but a glance at the handsome but as evidently worldly couple whose hands were being joined in holy matrimony dispelled this fancy, and then the sudden thought occurred to him that they were father and daughter.

"Kindred spirits, I always knew they were," mused Adam, "but never till this moment did it occur to me that they were actually related, and yet as sure as I am Adam Day Grace is Noah's child; she is strikingly like him too, though no one seems to have noticed it; her blue eyes are the fac-simile of Noah's, and I have no doubt he was as fair as she is when he was a child: she is tall like him too, and there is the same indescribable something, I hardly know what to call it—an intangible impression of purity and saintliness clinging to them both; it is not an expression, nor can I define it, but it is there for all that, and I never met anyone else who had it—not even the Rector. I have often wondered how Noah came to have a child so strangely unlike him as that wilful little Eve, but never till this moment did I suspect the truth. Mrs. Oldman changed the children and confessed it yesterday, hence this wedding, otherwise Noah would never have yielded, I am sure; that is why he is so grave to-day too. I thought he was not well when he came into church. Grace, my darling, I shall win you after all!"

But this thought drove Adam out of church to walk away into that strange solitude nowhere to be obtained in such absolute perfection as among his native broads, there to consider what change the discovery he had just made would make in his own plans. He cared not where he went, he was so happy; he scarcely felt the ground he strode over, he wanted to get away from the rest of mankind, and be alone with his joy; all human intercourse just then would have jarred upon him. But these sleepy lagoons, their calm, still, sluggish waters only disturbed by the leaping of a trout or the cry of a sea-bird; these great green pastures, with their sleepy cattle grazing peacefully among them; these rivers with their reaches creeping lazily on to the sea, pausing now and then to spread their shallow waters into a broad, and then concentrating their forces into a river again, and flowing slowly on, to pause again and again to widen their banks before they reached the sea they were so loth to gain; these calm, sleepy waters did not disturb his meditations; he was as disposed to linger in his thoughts as the rivers in their broads; and the white sails of the yachts or the brown sails of the wherries, rising here and there on the horizon, were no hindrance to his musings. On he walked, mile after mile, through meadows and across marshes, until at last sheer physical fatigue made him pause, first to rest and then to consider where he was, for he had paid no attention to where he was going; so throwing himself down on the grass to rest, he took a brief survey of his position.

He found himself about two miles from Bridgham, and consulting his watch, he came to the conclusion he might, if he made haste, just catch Arthur Clifford's yacht on the point of sailing, for he knew he and Eve were to drive back to Bridgham, and sail from there directly after the wedding. He would like to see the last of them, and then he would hire a boat and row back to Windham, and go and see Noah, for the result of all his meditations was that he must tell Father Noah the discovery he was certain he had made, and ask his advice. Accordingly he set off for Bridgham, but on reaching it he found the yacht had already sailed, so he went into the inn and ordered some dinner. He was waiting for it when he heard a woman sobbing in the next room, the door of which was ajar. Now Adam hated to see a woman's tears, so when the landlady brought him his dinner, he asked who was crying in the next room.

"Oh, sir, it is poor Mrs. Oldman. She came over to see her daughter sail, but she was too late; they had been gone an hour when she arrived. She walked most of the way, and she is tired out, what with nursing and one thing and another; but I am now going to see if I can't get her to have some dinner."

"Let me go; we are old friends. Put another place at this table. I'll get her to dine with me."

So saying, Adam rose, and knocking at the open door, went in without waiting for an answer.

"SHE WAS STANDING AT THE GATE EVIDENTLY WATCHING THEM."

"ONLY."

ONLY a little tiny spark,
Falling so softly down;
In one short hour a frightful glare
Shall rouse the sleeping town.

Only a little spiteful word,
A scarcely noted sneer,
Finding a sunny, joyous heart,
Leaving behind—a tear.

Only a careless, mocking smile,
A foolish, ill-timed jest:
It quenched the dawning of a love
Too weak to bear the jest.

Only the shadow of a doubt,
The whisper of a friend:
It sent two lives to grieve apart,
Mistaken to the end.

Only a little broken toy,
Shabby, and old, and torn:
It woke the memory of a loss
Too heavy to be borne.

Only the little daily wants
Left at the gate of Prayer,
Taking, instead, the golden spoil
Won from the Master there.

Only a weak and suffering life
Laid at the Saviour's feet,
Shedding a warm and steady light
Into the darkening street.

Only a look, and nothing more,
So tender, yet so sad:
It filled one heart with bitter shame,
It made the angels glad.

OUR BESSIE.

CHAPTER XVII.

"TROUBLE MAY COME TO ME ONE DAY."

BESSIE had hardly fallen asleep before the storm broke. A peal of thunder crashing over the house woke her; the next minute a flash of lightning seemed to fill her room with white light.

"What a terrific clap! It must have woke Edna," she thought, and just as she was summoning up resolution to cross the dark passage in search of her, there was a hasty tap at the door, and Edna entered, fully dressed, and with a candle in her hand.

"Edna! what does this mean? You have not been to bed at all," exclaimed Bessie, regarding her friend with dismay. Edna's pale, disordered looks excited her alarm.

"No," she returned, in a tone of forced composure, as she put down the candle with a shaking hand; "I was too nervous to sleep. I knew the storm was coming, and I sat up and waited for it; but I could not stop by myself any longer. Did I wake you, Bessie?"

"The thunder woke me, and I thought of you. I am not a bit frightened; but one cannot sleep in such a noise. Hark at the rain; a perfect deluge! Come and lie down beside me, Edna, dear. You look quite wan and exhausted."

"I have been thinking myself stupid; but I am still too restless to lie down. I feel as though I never want to sleep again, and yet I am so tired. Ah, you don't know the feeling! One seems on wires, and all sorts of horrid, troublesome thoughts keep surging through one's brain, and there seems no rest, no peace anywhere." And she shivered, and hid her face on the pillow as another peal broke over the house.

Bessie did not speak for a minute, and then she said very tenderly—

"Edna, dear, I know all about it. I am quite sure that you are miserable; I have known it all the time. Pride does not help you a bit now; in your heart you are sorrowful and repentant. You would give all you have in the world to bring him back again." But Edna silenced her.

"Don't, Bessie, you are torturing me. I cannot bear sympathy; it seems to madden me somehow. I want people to think that I don't care—that it is all nothing to me."

"Ah, but you do care, Edna."

"Yes, I know I do," in a despairing voice. "I will own, if you like, that I am very miserable, but you must not take advantage of me. I am weak to-night, and I seem to have no strength to brave it out. Don't be hard upon me, Bessie; you have never been in trouble yourself. You cannot put yourself in my place."

A great pity rose in Bessie's heart as she listened to Edna's sad voice. "No," she said, gently, "I have never known real trouble, thank God, except when Frank died. Mine has been a very happy life; but trouble may come to me one day."

"Yes, but not through your own fault," replied Edna, in the same dreary, hopeless voice. "There is no trouble so hard to bear as that. To think that I might have been so happy, and that my own temper has spoiled it all! Let me tell you all about it, Bessie; it will be a relief, even though you cannot help me, for to-night the misery is more than I can bear." And here she hid her face in her hands, and gave vent to a few choking sobs. Bessie only answered by a quiet caress or two, and after a few moments Edna recovered herself.

"I was unreasonably angry with Neville that day, but I never guessed that my passion would overmaster me to that extent. Oh, Bessie! why, why was I never taught to control my temper? Why was my mother so cruelly kind to me? If I had been brought up differently—but no, I will only reproach myself. If Neville had been more masterful—if he had shown more spirit; but there again I am ungenerous, for nothing could exceed his gentleness, but it only exasperated me. I was bent on quarrelling with him, and I fully succeeded; and I worked myself up to such a pitch that I almost hated the sight of him. I wanted to be free—I would be free; and I told him so. I was still in the same mind when you brought me that message, but, all the same, something seemed to whisper to me that I should live to repent that day's work; but I would not listen to this inward prompting—I would be firm. Bessie, I verily believe some evil spirit dominated me—I felt so cold, so inexorable, so determined on my own undoing. For one moment I quailed, and that was when I saw Neville drive away from the house. I saw his face, and it looked so pale and sad. Something within me said, 'Call him back, and he will come even now;' but I was too proud to give the sign. I wanted to do it, but my demon would not suffer me, and in a moment he was gone. Oh, Bessie! how I suffered that night and the night after. But my pride was strong. I would not let people see how unhappy I was. But I want him back now. There is no one in the world like Neville—so gentle, and brave, and good; but I have lost him, and I deserve to lose him, for I was never worthy of his love." And here Edna broke into bitter weeping, and for a little while there was no comforting her.

"Oh, how selfish I am," she exclaimed at last, starting up. "I have only made you miserable, and, after all, no one can do me any good. Don't look at me so reproachfully, Bessie; you are very dear and good to me, but you cannot put yourself in my place."

"You are wrong," returned Bessie, quickly. "Though I have never been through your experiences, I can still sympathise with you. If I were in your position, Edna, I would not speak as you are doing now, as though there were no hope for you, and as though everything were only black and miserable. There are no depths of human suffering deep enough to hide us from God."

"Oh, but I am not religious, Bessie. I am not good, like you."

"Please don't talk so, Edna; it only pains me to hear you. Let me tell you how I think I should try to feel in your place. I would try to bear my trouble bravely, knowing that it had come through my own fault. I do do wrong we must surely take our punishment. Oh, I know it is easy to talk, but all the same this is how I would strive to carry my burden."

"Ah, but such a burden would crush any girl."

"You must not let it crush you, Edna. Your will is very strong; why do you not will this one thing—to become worthy of Mr. Sinclair. I do not say that things will be the same between you; I know too little about the world to guess how a man acts under such circumstances; but if you care for him really—if indeed, he stands so high in your estimation as a good man whom you have misunderstood and wronged, then, even if you lead your lives apart, you may still try to live nobly that he may think of you with respect. You may still let his influence guide you to a higher and better life. Would not this make things more bearable?"

Bessie's words, spoken with intense earnestness, seemed to stir Edna's mind, rousing it from its bitter apathy of hopeless remorse and grief; a faint light came into her eyes.

"Do you think I could grow better—that Neville would ever hear of me? Oh, I should like to try. I do so hate myself, Bessie. I seem to grow more selfish and horrid every year. I thought Neville would help me to be good, but without him——" And here the tears came again.

"Without him it will be doubly hard. Yes, I know that, Edna, dear; but you must lean on a stronger arm than his—an arm that will never fail you. Now you are utterly exhausted, and the storm is quite lulled, do go back to your own room; you will be able to sleep, and it is nearly three o'clock."

"And I have kept you awake all this time," remorsefully. "Well, I will go; the pain is a little easier to bear now. I will think over your words; they seem to have a sort of comfort in them. Yes, I deserve to be unhappy for making Neville so wretched. Good-bye, dear Bessie; you are a real friend to me, for you tell me nothing but the truth."

Bessie kissed her affectionately, and then Edna left the room; but Bessie found it difficult to resume her interrupted dreams; the splash of the raindrops against her windows had a depressing sound, the darkness was dense and oppressive, a vague sadness seemed to brood over everything, and it was long before she could quiet herself enough to sleep. Strangely enough, her last waking thoughts were of Hatty, not of Edna, and she was dreaming about her when the maid came to wake her in the morning. Edna did not come down to breakfast; the storm had disturbed her, Mrs. Sefton said.

"I think it must have kept you awake, too," she observed, with a glance at Bessie's tired face.

Bessie smiled, and said a word or two about the wild night, but she did not speak of Edna's visit to her room. Afterwards she went up to prepare for her ride, but during the next hour Richard noticed she was not in her usual spirits, and questioned her kindly as to the cause of her depression. Bessie made some trifling excuse; she had slept badly, and her head ached; but in reality she could find no reason for her vague discomfort. The morning was fresh and lovely, and bore no signs of last night's storm. Whitefoot was in frisky spirits, but she found herself looking at everything with melancholy eyes, as though she were looking her last at the pleasant prospect. In vain she strove to shake off the uncanny feeling, and to answer Richard's remarks in her usual sprightly fashion. The very effort to speak brought the tears to her eyes, and she had the vexed feeling that Richard saw them, and thought something was amiss, for he told her very kindly to be sure and rest herself that afternoon.

Edna was in the front garden when they returned; she was standing at the gate evidently watching for them. Bessie thought she looked very pale. As Richard lifted her down Edna opened the gate.

"You have had a longer ride than usual, have you not, Richard? Bessie looks very tired. Will you take off your habit, or will you go into the drawing-room? Your brother has just arrived, Bessie."

"My brother! Do you mean Tom? Oh! what does he want with me? Hatty must be worse." And here Bessie's numb, unaccountable feelings quickened into life. "Oh, Edna, speak—what is it?" And Bessie grew pale with apprehension.

"Hatty is not very well," replied Edna, gently, "but Mr. Tom will tell you himself."

"Yes, go to him," whispered Richard; "your brother will be your best informant; don't wait to ask Edna." And Bessie needed no further bidding. Oh, she knew now what that vague presentiment meant. That was her last ride—her last everything, she told herself as she hurried into the house. Of course, Hatty was ill, very ill—perhaps dying—she always knew she would die. Tom's boyish face looked unusually grave as he caught sight of Bessie. She walked up to him and grasped his arm.

"What is it, Tom?" she said, almost clinging to him.

Poor Tom was hardly equal to the occasion. He was young, and hated scenes, and Mrs. Sefton was looking at them both, and he felt uncommonly choky himself; but Edna, who had followed Bessie, said, promptly—

"Don't be afraid of telling Bessie, Mr. Lambert; she knows that Hatty is not so well. You have come to fetch her, have you not, because Hatty has had another bad fainting fit, and your father thinks her very ill?"

"That is about it," blurted out Tom. "Can you get ready and come back with me, Bessie? Hatty asked for you last night for the first time, and then father said I had better come and fetch you; so I took the last train to London, and slept at Uncle George's, and came on this morning."

"And Hatty is very ill?" asked Bessie, with a sort of desperate calmness that appeared very ominous to Tom, for he answered, nervously—

"Well, she is pretty bad. Father says it is a sudden failure of strength. It is her heart; and he says he always expected it. He never did think well of Hatty, only he would not tell us so—what was the use? he said. But now these fainting attacks have made him anxious, for he says one can never tell what may happen; and then he said you must be fetched at once."

"I suppose we can start by the next train, Tom."

"Yes, by the 3.15; there is none before that. We must catch the 6.5 from Paddington, so you will have time to look about you."

"Let me help you," exclaimed Edna, eagerly. "Mamma, will you send Brandon to us?" And she followed Bessie.

Richard came into the room that moment, and took possession of Tom, carrying him off to the garden and stable-yard, and trying to make the time pass in a less irksome manner. Richard could show his sympathy for Bessie in no other way than this, and he felt sorry for Tom, who was feeling awkward among so many strangers, and was trying to repress his feelings after the fashion of young men.

"I am afraid your sister is very much cut up about this," observed Richard, presently.

"Oh, yes, she will take it uncommonly badly, she and Hatty are such chums."

"Yes, but I trust that your sister is not dangerously ill?"

"Well, she does not seem so to me," replied Tom, vaguely. "She is weak, of course; anyone would be weak after such an attack; but she looks and talks much as usual, only she is too tired to get up."

"And it is her heart, you say?"

"Well, my father says so. You see she has always been weakly, but there never seemed much amiss to us; and now my father says that he never expected her to make an old woman, and that there is something wrong with her heart, and he is afraid that she may go off in one of these attacks, and that is why he wants Bessie to come home at once."

"Yes, I see; it looks very serious. Oh, there is the luncheon bell. I have ordered the carriage round directly afterwards, so you will be in plenty of time."

When the two young men returned to the house they found Bessie in the dining-room. She took her old place by Richard, and made some pretence at eating. Once, when Richard spoke to her, begging her to remember the long journey before her, she looked up at him with a faint smile; that smile, so gentle and childlike, haunted Richard during the remainder of the day.

Bessie was battling bravely with her feelings all luncheon, and during the short interval that elapsed before the carriage was brought round she managed to say a few words to Mrs. Sefton, thanking her for all her kindness, and just before she left the house she found an opportunity to speak to Edna.

"Edna," she whispered, holding her friend's hand, "you will not forget our talk. I shall be thinking of you even when I am with Hatty." And then for the moment she could say no more.

"Will you come, Miss Lambert?" urged Richard, gently. He had followed the girls, and had overheard this little speech; but Bessie did not heed him.

"Will you try to be brave, Edna?" But her voice was almost inaudible.

"Go with Richard, Bessie, darling; he is waiting for you." And then Bessie got into the carriage.

She looked back and waved her hand as they drove away, but this time there was no smile on her face. Edna was standing in the porch, and the afternoon sun was shining on her face and hair and white dress, and her large, wistful eyes were full of sadness. Bessie's lip quivered, her heart ached. How beautiful it all was. The world seemed glorified in the sunshine; everyone they met seemed happy, and yet Edna was wretched, and Hatty ill—perhaps dying; and a great black cloud seemed to overshadow everything, a sense of terror and confusion, of utter chaos. "In the midst of life we are in death." Why did those words come to Bessie? Just before the train moved, Richard broke the silence.

"You will let us hear how things are, Miss Lambert?"

"Oh, yes, I will write to Edna."

"And you will take care of yourself?"

"Yes, thank you."

"Things may be better than you expect; one can never tell." He stopped, and looked earnestly in her face, and she could see that he was very much moved. "I wish you could be spared all this, but I know you will do your best for everybody. I won't tell you now how we shall all miss you; the house will seem very empty when I go back."

"You have been very good to me, Mr. Sefton; thank you for everything."

"No one can help being good to you," he replied, gravely. "Good-bye, God bless you." The train moved on, and he lifted his hat and stood aside.

"Oh, how kind everyone is," thought Bessie, as she leant back wearily and closed her eyes. Was it all a dream, or was her beautiful holiday really over? Alas! the dull aching consciousness told her too truly that it was sorrowful reality.

VARIETIES.

THE WEAKER VESSEL.

The minister of a parish in Scotland was called some time ago to effect a reconciliation between a fisherman of a certain village and his wife. After using all the arguments in his power to convince the offending husband that it was unmanly in him, to say the least of it, to strike Polly with his fist, the minister concluded—

"David, you know that the wife is the weaker vessel, and you should have pity on her."

"Well then," said David, sulkily, "if she's the weaker vessel she should carry the less sail."

WORDS OF AFFECTION.

"Posies" for rings used to be very fashionable. We take the following from an edition of the "New Academy of Compliments," published in 1741.

"This was not sent in compliment."

"Let us share in joy and care."

"In thy breast my heart doth rest."

"The love is true that I.O.U."

"Despise not me for I love thee."

"Of all the rest I love thee best."

"The love I owe I fain would show."

"What I call mine shall all be thine."

"My love by this presented is."

"Heart and hand at your command."

"The sight of thee is life to me."

"In constancy I'll live and die."

"I am yours while life endures."

AN INQUISITIVE SERVANT.

Talleyrand had a confidential servant excessively devoted to his interests, but for all that superlatively inquisitive. Having one day intrusted him with a letter, the prince watched his faithful valet from the window of his apartment, and with some surprise observed him coolly reading the letter en route. On the second day a similar commission was confided to the servant, and to the second letter was added a postscript in the following terms:—

"You may send a verbal answer by the bearer; he is perfectly acquainted with the whole affair, having taken the precaution to read this previous to its delivery."

Such a postscript must have been more effective than the severest reproaches.

ON THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

A lame Spartan joined the ranks of his countrymen, and was laughed at by them for venturing his life at such a disadvantage.

"I come to fight, not to fly!" was the reply of the heroic cripple.

HOW A ROBBER WAS CAUGHT.

There was a young woman left in charge of a house during the absence of her master and mistress in the country. One night on her going to bed she took a good look in the looking-glass and said to herself, smiling complacently—

"How handsome I look in this cap!"

When she rose in the morning she found the house robbed. She was taken into custody on suspicion of being concerned in the robbery; but on being tried was acquitted.

Some time afterwards, as she was walking in company with another servant girl, a man in passing said softly to her—

"How handsome I look in this cap!"

This expression forcibly struck her mind, and she at once concluded that he must be the man who had robbed the house. She seized hold of him with the utmost courage, and assisted by her companion held him fast till he was taken charge of by the police. The man confessed that he was, indeed, the robber, and that he had heard her use the expression when he was hiding under the bed previous to his robbing the house. Robbing was a hanging matter in those days, and the man subsequently paid the penalty of his misdeeds on the scaffold.

RIGHT OR LEFT.

Suppose a person takes an even number of coins or counters or anything else in one hand, and an odd number in the other, there is a simple method by which to tell in which hand the even number is.

Ask her to multiply the number in her right hand by an odd number, and the number in her left hand by an even: then let her add the two products together and tell you if the total sum be odd or even. If it be even, the even number is in the right hand, and if it be odd the even number is in the left hand.

CHARACTER THE BEST SECURITY.

"I owe my success in business chiefly to you," said a stationer to a paper-maker, as they were settling a large account; "but let me ask how a man of your caution came to give credit so readily to a beginner of my slender means?"

"Because," replied the paper-maker, "at whatever hour in the morning I passed to my business, I always observed you without your coat at yours."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EDUCATIONAL.

WILL B.—could learn shorthand from one of Pitman's little manuals, which are to be found at any stationer's at an extremely moderate price. She might get a few lessons later on.

MARION GIBB.—We are happy to give a notice of your Utopian Reading Society, and to say that although the session commenced in October, members can qualify for a prize by making up the lost time. (Secretary, Miss Gibb, Glenlyon, The Avenue, Beckenham, Kent.) Miss Impey, former secretary, has resigned.

AUTUMN LEAF.—Apply to Miss Hedge, secretary of the Society for Studying Languages by Correspondence, Lyndhurst Lodge, Chelsea Road, Southsea, Hants. Subscription, ten shillings and sixpence half-yearly; and two prizes given, consisting of ten shillings and five shillings. We have no special educational club in connection with our paper.

MISS JOHNSTON.—We have pleasure in giving our girls the benefit of an introduction to their notice of your Reading Club, entitled The Haute Vue Reading Club. The quarter days are the 1st of February, of May, August, and November. Three months' holidays allowed in the year, a longer period than that accorded by any other of such societies (of which we know). One shilling entrance fee, and one ditto retiring fee. No other subscription.

MUSIC.

STORM.—If the piano be an old one we do not know what could be done with it. You might ask your tuner; he would know the exact state it was in, and could say whether exchanging it could be managed.

FRANKIE.—An American lady has for the last two seasons given drawing-room entertainments of whistling in London; and a famous masculine whistler also gave some concerts, but we cannot say whether it will become a usual thing or not. We see nothing "wrong" about it.

CHRYSE.—It is said that the sound of hammers on an anvil suggested to Handel the theme of the musical composition to which he has given the name of the "Harmonious Blacksmith." (See "Life of Handel," Schoeeler.) "J," the seventh consonant in the English alphabet, is an addition to it of comparatively modern date; its immediately preceding letter "I" having formerly been used as a substitute for it. As in the German language, it seems to have represented the letter "y" in some words. "I" and "J" were formerly identical in form, though not in sound, and we owe to the Dutch printers the advantage of a change to distinguish the two letters from one another. It is to be regretted that so many writers are careless about this distinction, and they confound both the capital I and T likewise, which creates a difficulty for the reader.

ART.

PEPPER'S GHOST.—We have pleasure in naming the Jubilee Sketching Club; secretary, Miss Nelly Baker, Mildenhall, 324, Camden Road, N.; the yearly subscription two shillings. The pictures may be executed in oils, water-colours, pen and ink, or any other style. Two prizes are given at the end of the twelvemonth. Send a stamped envelope for copy of the printed rules. Members may put a price on their pictures if they wish to sell them.

KATE E. COLMAN.—We gladly inform our girls of the Rover Sketching Club, of which you are the secretary, and give your address, Bridge Street, Peterborough. In brief, the rules are that only original sketches are received, a fairly high standard required, a knowledge of perspective essential. A specimen sketch to be sent in by the intending member, and their works will be criticised by an artist. Annual subscription, five shillings.

JOCELYNDA and "DONOVAN."—Beware of how you take your subjects from other people's works. If you want to avail yourself of them, you should obtain their leave. Of course, suggestions for work may be gathered anywhere, and can be carried out, without dishonesty towards anyone, or infringing their copyright. Remember that we speak without personal knowledge of what you are going to do.

WORK.

ROSALIND does not say how the stain was made, nor what caused it; so we cannot give advice.

ONE OF YOUR GIRLS.—We know nothing of the paper you enclose. The only way for you to find out what you want would be to write to some of the people who are employed, and whose addresses are fully given on the circular, enclosing a stamp for a reply.

NELLY.—You could trim your brown-braided jacket with fur round the neck and down the fronts, and at the cuffs. It need not be edged with fur, unless you like. Jackets are more worn without than with it at present.

AN ENGLISH GIRL.—We have never given any articles on Macramé lace. A small manual may be very cheaply obtained at any shop where work is sold. The best way would be to get some friend to teach you. 2. We should think you could dispose of your books by advertising them.

STONECROP.—You would probably be able to restore the colour to your black kid gloves by using a little of Judson's black dye. You could apply some according to the directions on the bottle. If this would not do there are many patent glosses or revivers sold for kid boots and shoes, some of which would answer for black gloves we should think. Black ink will answer when the seams become white and bleached.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AN IRISH GIRL.—The 18th of March, 1873, was a Tuesday.

AMY S. WOODS.—The Pinafore and Prize Society, an offshoot of the Grosvenor Reading Society, which "has, as its sole aim, the glory of God and the good of His poor," must have a share in our sympathy. "Members of the Pinafore Society are not

D. P.—We regret that we are not acquainted with the hymn you name. Perhaps the beautiful one beginning with—

"Shall we gather at the river, Where bright angel feet have trod," would suit you equally well. It is No. 451 of the Rev. J. Mountain's collection, called "Hymns of Consecration and Faith."

BARBARA.—We suppose you mean "Her Majesty's Nursing Sisters" (the distinct title given to them). They must be all ladies by birth or education, and must have gone through training in a good civil hospital. Their headquarters are at Netley, and application should be made to the lady superintendent (or matron). They are popularly called "Grey Sisters." If your sight be good, though short, we think the spectacles would not prove an objection.

AN ANXIOUS INQUIRER AFTER SALVATION.—We think there is a little too much you in your letter. What are you daily trying to do for Christ? How are you living to Him? You must remember that the test of the Christian is not the saying of "Lord, Lord," but "by their fruits shall ye know them;" and it is in living His life that we shall see Him as He is.

ADA.—There are ideas in your poem: go on and prosper; but you must study the rules of poetry, and write correctly.

MACKENZIE.—The words were not intended as a falsehood, and though they were differently understood from what you thought or wished them to be, we do not see that you can blame yourself. But it is better not to make trivial promises such as these, for it leads to difficulties with truth, in daily life.

CURIOSITY.—The "grain of mustard-seed" of which our Lord speaks as the smallest of all seeds is not that of our English tree, the Sinapis nigra, but was of a tree called by the Arabs khardal, the Salvadora Persica, one having numerous branches large enough to be used by the birds for roosting places, yet of which the seeds are exceedingly small, and unusually so with reference to the dimensions of the tree. Many statements and also strong expressions, which create surprise and are perplexing to a modern and Western reader, are capable of most satisfactory explanation. Of this you may always rest satisfied, and wait patiently and trustingly for a solution of the difficulty, sooner or later, or else it may be when we shall "no longer see through a glass darkly, but face to face."

LACEL.—Pea-flour would not be good for you, nor would potatoes; but oatmeal porridge and good brown bread, with any fruit, such as roast and stewed apples, prunes, or pears. We should also leave off tea and coffee for a time.

JACK POINT.—Germany was revolutionised by the great reformer Luther, and now what is known as Lutheranism is the religion of the Court, and the chief portion of the country—viz., the north, and of Prussia. It is also the religion of Denmark and Sweden. The doctrines are mainly embodied in the "Augsburg Confession," and in the Formula Concordia of the Lutherans. Their first university was founded at Marburg by Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, in 1527.

EDINA.—The newspaper cutting about which you ask our opinion is a curious one, and well-meant. But we think that Godly people make a great mistake in fixing dates respecting our Lord's second advent. It is a dangerous thing to do, as the passing over of certain periods named by them without the fulfilment of their predictions "causes the enemy to blaspheme." At least we believe that the end is near, nearly nineteen hundred years nearer than when the New Testament prophecies were written, and whether coming for all, or only for one, we should daily bear in mind our Divine Master's words, "Watch ye therefore, for the Son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not."

MARIANNA.—The colour of the water both of the ocean and the various rivers has perplexed many inquirers. According to Mary Somerville, the water of some in equatorial America is white, in others a deep coffee colour, or dark green when seen in the shade, perfectly transparent, and of a bright green, like some of the Swiss rivers and lakes when ruffled. Sir R. Schomburgk thinks they (the dark rivers) are stained by iron in the granite. The Rio Negro, which is black, does not stain the white rocks, which is a curious fact.

ROUGH QUESTIONERS.

obliged to be members of the Church of England." The object of the society is "to supply the destitute children attending National schools with tidy and decent clothing." This is indeed a valuable work, for the extreme need of even one decent article of clothing exhibited by a large proportion of children attending these schools—not to speak of the almost state of famine in which they pursue their course of learning (multitudes going without having any breakfast), should be made known as widely as possible. Members subscribe one shilling annually, and one garment half-yearly. Manager, Miss A. S. Woods, Merton, Thetford, Norfolk.

FLORA.—We think that both women and girls should take an intelligent interest in everything that goes on in the world, to make them pleasant companions to fathers and brothers.

EVELYN BURTON and GWENLIAN "IN EARNEST."—We regret we can make no use of the poems so kindly sent us.

INQUISITIVE SAL.—Your query, "What do we know apart from matter?" seems a strange one in a Christian country. If you study the Holy Scriptures you cannot fail to see that when God breathed into Adam's nostrils "man became a living soul," and that our blessed Lord has redeemed both soul and body, and will raise to everlasting life all those who believe on Him, and whose faith is "a living faith," not a dead one without works.

HIGH SCHOOLGIRL.—A "carpet knight" means one who is invested with the title of "knight," which is essentially a military distinction, but who is not a soldier nor a naval officer, but a civilian only, and whose title has not been won in the original and orthodox way on a field of battle, but has been conferred for civil service on a carpeted floor.

CHAPTER II.

THE Manor House, in which dwelt Roger Dale with his old father, was to all appearance an ideal home. It stood in the midst of a hundred acres of arable, wood, and pasture land, from almost every part of which the spectator could look down on the surrounding country. Far away the pall of smoke that hung over London could faintly be discerned; and sometimes a shaft of sunlight would strike out a brilliant gleam on the horizon, revealing the spot where stood the Crystal Palace. But from the house itself none of these things could be seen, for it was surrounded by a dense belt of aged forest trees. It was of red brick, tapestried with ivy, from which the birds were ever flying, and of castellated form. The French windows, back and front, opened upon a lawn of velvet smoothness, for it had been cut and rolled for more than a century; and beyond the lawn stood the majestic forms of elm and oak, with dim sylvan recesses between. Outside the woodland came the fields and the farm. Roger acted as steward to his father, and was out and about the estate all day, overseeing, directing, arranging—a healthy, outdoor life, but one strangely incongruous for a young man of means. His father had, since his wife's death, led a secluded existence; and near as the house was to London, in one sense, for practical purposes, it was far—far from a station, remote from neighbours, engrossing in the claims of the estate. Besides, the father's will was law, and he chose his son to remain near him. Roger was of a good-tempered, pliant disposition, but he often chafed sorely under the restraint and his father's impatient temper.

It was a bright September morning, but Squire Dale was indoors. In a great armchair he sat, listlessly looking at a few logs smouldering in the grate. The room was large and lofty, but neglected in detail. Its great table and sideboard showed it to be a dining-room, but the odour of stale tobacco smoke hung about it; there was no freshness in any of the furniture, which was of ugly mahogany and horsehair; the gay-patterned Brussels carpet was worn, and there was a comfortless aspect about the place strangely at variance with its dignity of proportions. On entering the room one felt the same shock of incongruity, as if, in a noble picture gallery, a staring oleograph or two should appear on the wall.

Roger had returned from his morning's shooting, and was standing opposite his father, a grizzled old man with a spare figure and sharp features.

"I don't know what's wrong with me," ejaculated the Squire. "I want to go round to the stables and speak to Smith, but I am cold to the very heart." As he spoke he Misses Woodford had surprised Squire Dale on horseback; he had got wet to the skin, and, as Roger suspected, on coming home had lingered in the stables, giving directions about his horse. But there was little effusion or power of expression between father and son.

"I'll tell him all about my adventure of yesterday; it may amuse him, and lead to my finding out about these Miss Woodfords," shivered, though it was a bright warm morning.

"You got wet through yesterday in that heavy rain, didn't you?" asked Roger, anxiously. "Did you change at once?"

"When I could find time," rejoined his father, with a scowl; "at my time of life it's too late to begin fiddle-faddling like a woman." Roger lingered about; he felt sure his father was not well. The heavy rain to which he owed his introduction to the thought Roger, and sitting down opposite the Squire he related in full detail the occurrence of the day before.

Squire Dale listened with intense interest, staring at his son from under his bushy eyebrows.

"What were the young women like?" he inquired.

Roger gave a full description.

The old man sighed, and gazed into the smouldering logs.

"I may as well tell you," he said, at length.

"I suspect, Roger, that these Woodfords have a nearer connection than you think with us. My sister Olive married a man of that name against my orders. I was her guardian. I hated the fellow. She disobeyed me, and we agreed to part company in this life. It was many and many a year ago." The old man spoke dreamily and with unwonted softness in his tone. "You've scarcely heard her name; but she is dead, and these I judge (especially as you say the eldest is called Olive) are her girls."

"Wouldn't you like to see them?" suggested Roger, in great excitement.

His father was by no means used to the melting mood, and the obstinacy and roughness of his nature made his son anxious to seize the present opportunity.

"Nay, nay," said the Squire, though without bitterness. "It's best to leave well alone. She chose her way, I mine. Yet when we were children we were great friends, were Olive and me."

Further conversation was interrupted by the entrance of a servant to lay the cloth for luncheon. The Squire chose to be his own housekeeper, and as he was inclined to be illiberal besides being short-tempered, and the place was a very lonely one, with few attractions, the natural result followed—he was badly served. The cloth was tumbled, the glass was dim and streaked, the silver was far from bright, and a large pot of straggling fern was the table's only ornament.

The luncheon to which the two men sat uncomfortably down was solid enough, but unappetising. The Squire could touch no portion of the great leg of roast mutton and suet pudding. He drank glass after glass of port, and then returned to crouch over the fire again.

"Tell the cook to make father some soup," ordered Roger.

But the distant butcher had been and gone for the day, the thriftless cook had no "stock" ready, and the thin greasy decoction that came up after an hour or two disgusted the master.

"Here, take this stuff away," he shouted. "What's come to all the servants, I don't know, I'm sure! There's not one of you worth her salt." And away went the housemaid, with a bang of the door that foretold her intention to give warning on the morrow.

Roger began to be alarmed, and urged his father to see a doctor.

"That idiot from Moorhead? Not I."

All he could do was to persuade the Squire to go and lie down, which he did, grumbling.

"I wish we had some woman about the place with a head on her shoulders," reflected Roger. "I am sure father is ill, and wants nursing; but the servants are as stupid as they can well be. . . . Why shouldn't I go across to Miller's and talk to the Miss Woodfords—aye, and tell them I am their cousin. The eldest one knows about illness—she had a kind face. I'll do it!"

The next step was to change his shooting garments for morning dress of what he considered unexceptionable fashion, and to place a flower in his button-hole. Then Roger found himself, in a condition of much nervousness, wending his way to the farm. The wide landscape, bathed in the soft golden light of the September afternoon, stretched away in exquisite beauty as far as the eye could see;—fields of stacked corn, reaches of pasture-land with grazing cattle, copses with the thin blue smoke curling faintly upwards to tell of a cottage habitation among the trees. Familiar as was the picture, Roger could not help thinking, after all, there was much charm in the country life against which he had often rebelled. He thought so still more when he reached Miller's. The front garden was all fragrant and radiant with the pomp of standard roses, and the Gloire de Dijon hung its yellow treasures softly against the dark timbered walls. The beautiful gabled front would have allured an artist to sketch it, and, in fact, Blanche Woodford was sitting on a little camp-stool in the garden engaged in that occupation. Olive sat sewing in the porch, directing her glance now and again to her sister with a smile.

"There is Touchstone! Rosalind, look!" softly cried Blanche, who had dubbed herself Celia, and persisted in her little joke about the forest of Arden, styling worthy Mrs. Miller "Audrey."

"Do behave properly to him, Blanche," returned Olive, trying to frown.

Roger heard nothing of the colloquy, but felt greatly abashed as he entered the little gate.

Blanche dropped her pencil and rose to greet him with a bright kind look in her eyes that had no malice in it; Olive, remembering his timely help, gave him a welcome, and offered him a seat in the porch.

"We scarcely feel you are a stranger, Mr. Dale," observed Blanche. "Audrey—I mean Mrs. Miller—tells us you are the son of her landlord. Perhaps you have come to see her, or your property?"

"I am glad to be able to thank Mr. Dale for his kindness of yesterday," remarked Olive, with the gentle iciness of manner that characterises the English girl in speaking to people whom she "does not know." And a pause ensued, during which Roger's face grew redder and redder.

"Now or never," he thought in desperation, and suddenly blurted out, "I have come to see my cousins."

The faces of Olive and Blanche were a study to behold, and Roger hastily proceeded to explain the details of the coincidence he had learned.

"I think it must be so," he concluded. "Woodford is not an uncommon name; yet the Christian name too—and—can you throw any light upon it?"

"I believe my mother had a brother with whom she was not on good terms; and her maiden name was Dale. I am called Olive Dale Woodford," was the reply. "We have scarcely ever heard of him, and had no idea he lived here."

Olive was about to add that she believed him to have been very unjust to her mother, but she paused in time, only adding, "It is very extraordinary."

"I am not your cousin, Mr. Dale, even if you are right," interrupted Blanche.

"No; my sister Blanche is only my half-sister. Our father was twice married, and Horace and I are the only children of my own mother, of whom you speak."

A certain haughtiness in the young lady's manner seemed to add, "And as your father behaved cruelly to my mother by your own showing, I do not wish to make more of that relationship than is necessary."

"The fact is, I am in trouble," pursued Roger. "My father is ill, I'm afraid. I can't do anything with him. He's of a curious disposition. Our servants are not very first class, and we lead a lonely life. I thought you might perhaps be so kind as to suggest something."

The forlorn aspect of the poor young man instantly worked a revolution in the hearts of both girls. They had been regarding him as the representative of a family feud, and since Olive cherished with passionate loyalty the image of the mother she could dimly remember, she was not ready on the spot to make friendly overtures. But to hear that she was needed! That touched the spring of womanly tenderness at once.

"You will have some tea with us; then we can talk it over," said Olive.

And Roger quickly found himself sitting in the farmhouse parlour before a meal whose delicate freshness and daintiness contrasted strongly with the more plentiful repasts at the Manor House. An old china punch-bowl, full of roses, stood in the centre of the table. The dainty bread and butter, delicious preserves, and the fragrant tea with its cream were tempting to the worried guest.

"I wonder why we can't have cream?" he reflected. "And our tea isn't in the least like this. I suppose the water doesn't boil."

It was very pleasant, too, to find himself in the society of two bright and kindly girls, who did all in their power to assuage his home anxiety.

Olive strongly urged him to fetch the doctor, whether his father liked it or not; and she hesitatingly added that if she could be of any use she would come to the Manor House. Roger gratefully thanked her, and departed to go round by Moorhead, the nearest town, on his way home, in search of professional assistance.

The next day was eagerly anticipated by Olive and Blanche, for their brother had promised to run down, and they looked forward to pouring this new and wonderful intelligence into his ears. The Rev. Horace Woodford was highly delighted with "Miller's," and duly astonished and interested at the relationship that had been discovered.

"Let bygones be bygones; if they wish to be friends it is not for us to hold back," he advised.

"We're not at all sure the Squire does wish it," replied Olive.

"At any rate, we will go and inquire at the Manor House," decided the clergyman.

And on the morning after his arrival Horace and Olive wended their way to ask after the sick Squire.

The anxious face of Roger startled the visitors on their admittance.
